PRESBYTERIAN HIST. SOC. OF CALIFORNIA

The Christian.

☞ To avoid delay it is requested that all letters relating to business matters should be addressed to the firm, Messrs. Morgan and Scott, and not to its individual members. Letters of a personal nature should in every case be so marked.

Communications for THE CHRISTIAN should be addressed to the Editor, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C. All Advertisements should be sent to Messrs. John Haddon and Co., Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

☞ The Publishers request that all orders for THE CHRISTIAN by post, and remittances for same, be addressed to "THE CHRISTIAN" POSTAL DEPARTMENT, BOUVERIE HOUSE, SALISBURY SQUARE, LONDON, E.C. Cheques and Post Orders to be made payable to Messrs. John Haddon and Co. at that address. (For Subscription rates, see Page 1 of Cover.) Postcard or stamped envelope should be enclosed if receipt is desired.

Notes & Comments

The New Year's Outlook. The outlook for the country during 1902 is not very exhilarating. The war in Africa still drags on its weary and sanguinary course. The air is filled with prognostications of failing trade, and with warnings to our manufacturers that our commercial supremacy is in grave peril. We are surrounded by the openly-expressed hatred of continental neighbours. The prospect of useful legislation during the next Parliamentary session is as remote as it was last year. There are few signs of spiritual revival and vigour in the religious world. There is, indeed, a marked absence of hopefulness in all directions. Yet this is a call upon us to look up, not down, and to quicken our faith in God. All national deliverances come from Him; it is his hand that controls the destinies of nations as well as individuals, and unless we turn our hearts to Him, there is little hope for us as a people. During the forthcoming days of united prayer, one of the subjects for earnest petition should be the welfare of our beloved country.

Impatience with God. Experience of ourselves and of others reveals that there is deep reason for the oft-repeated injunction of Holy Scripture to wait patiently on the Lord. For persons of a certain temperament, waiting is the hardest condition that can be imposed upon them. It is much easier to be doing something—to be making a display; but to wait, and to wait long, without receiving from God any indication of his will, this is a difficult thing to do. Yet if we firmly believe that He is Supreme Master and Infinitely Wise, there ought to be no difficulty in waiting for his signal. It is impossible that He can act unwisely, or fail to act at the right time. They who lose patience with Him, and act independently of his indications to them, always end by doing badly. Abraham, unable to understand the Divine delay in fulfilling the promise to Sarah, acted on his own initiative, and took Hagar to wife, with the result, as Dr. Marcus Dods has pointed out, that Ishmael was born, and of him came the Arabs, and of them came Mohammed — the most terrible foe of Christianity. So from one man sprang, on the human side, Christ and his greatest antagonist. What a price to pay for impatience with God!

The Support of Christian Work. On all hands the past year was found to be one of great anxiety by Christian workers, owing to the demands arising from the South African war and other causes. Yet it is gratifying to recognise the deep practical devotion that has saved many organizations from distress, if not disaster. The donations received during the year from our readers, as acknowledged in THE CHRISTIAN Donation List, and paid over by Messrs. Morgan and Scott to the various missions indicated, amounted to the encouraging sum of £15,717 16s. 2d. The new year has also opened well with a total for this week of £1,037 10s. 8d.

The Ethics of Giving. Even a glance at the religious press will confirm the opinion, so often expressed, that the Church of Christ as a whole does not yet understand the ethics of giving to the cause of the Saviour. Two great religious bodies have still, after two years, to make urgent appeals to their members to complete what is for each a modest sum for the Century Fund. Several great missionary societies are annually behind with their funds, and the deficiencies are generally met by the liberality of one or two wealthy persons. In particular, the London Missionary Society is in serious straits just now, and numberless institutions have practically to play the beggar in order to survive at all. One thing is certain, that many do not understand either the obligation or the art of giving—for there is an art in it. As for the reason of this holding back, Dr. Forsyth recently said:—

> It is the religious state of so many. They lose private religious habits. They lose therefore an earnest and religious life. They lose the convictions worth living and spending for. They lose sympathy.

Many, thank God, possess consecrated purses, but the consecration needs extending to the entire Church.

Religious Respectability. We are glad to find an Anglican contemporary writing plainly and sharply against that religious—or rather irreligious—respectability which, in public places for worship results in

> Those unblessed with means being huddled into undesirable seats, or kept standing in a draughty porch the while more favoured mortals are cosily placed.

Yet, in view of this protest, it is a little singular that the leading article goes on to brand as "cant" the often-repeated statement that the "people" prefer the mission-hall to the church. None who are really acquainted with life amongst the people will controvert the fact that vast numbers of them do prefer the mission-hall, for the one reason that there they are made to feel at home. It is quite certain that so long as any church or chapel cherishes the exclusive spirit, and makes it patent that there is a gulf between rich and poor, the latter will give the place a wide berth. It is a glaring self-contradiction when, in theory, all who worship are equal before God, whilst in practice social differences are emphasized.

A New Series by Mr. Meyer. With the present issue, our esteemed friend Rev. F. B. Meyer commences a new series of articles upon the lives of SAMUEL AND SAUL (see p. 12). Those who have read his former gems of Scripture biography will welcome this series as a valued study of two lives, whose interweaving draws out their sad dissimilarity. We may be sure that Mr. Meyer will make the prophet speak again with a message greatly needed in modern times.

To Save the Children. On page 19 will be found some details concerning the great and special effort, in the direction of a Simultaneous Mission, which is to be put forth during the coming months by the Sunday-School Union. It is most important that Christian people should seriously interest themselves in the matter, and not allow either ignorance or prejudice to hinder what may be a manifest work of God.

The Late Anna Shipton. The departure of this well-known Christian author has aroused considerable interest in the many works that came from her pen; and Messrs. Morgan and Scott are willing, as already intimated, to make special arrangements to enable the friends of the late gifted writer to circulate her works freely among such as would be benefited by them. Particulars may be had on application.

Daniels Come to Judgment. Temperance folk are so often held up to ridicule, as being either irresponsible pietists or ill-balanced fanatics, that it is quite refreshing to find strong pleas put forth by hard-headed men of the world like Mr. T. P. O'Connor, M.P., and Mr. John Burns, M.P. Yet each deals, not with fancies, but with facts. Speaking to journalists, Mr. O'Connor says:—

> It won't do you the least harm if you are a teetotaler. You may lose something, but you will gain tenfold. I believe in half a century from now no man will rise to the height of any profession, in the field, in the forum, or at the desk, who is not a teetotaler.

The following is to working-men from Mr. Burns—and he ought to know!—

> While it had taken the 12,000,000 members of friendly societies fifty years to save £40,000,000, no less than £160,000,000 was spent every year by the nation in drink. People blame the British workman, who was accused of restricting his output. The fault he had to find with them was their unrestricted intake!
> Last year the total amount of time lost in England from strikes by working men and women averaged half a day per worker per annum. But the amount spent in drink, betting, and sport, represented from thirty to fifty days per worker per annum. That accounted for much of the restriction of output, diminution of skill, loss of time, degradation of moral faculties and mental incapacity. If they wanted to stop this, they must sweep away the bookmaker and the publican.

Magistrates and Drink. The Manchester justices at a large special meeting, under the presidency of the Lord Mayor, to consider licensing questions, have passed resolutions in favour of increased powers to enable justices to deal with the three glaring evils of > the unrestricted sale of drink in clubs, the shocking intemperance amongst women caused by grocers' licences, and the profusion of ill-conducted, badly managed, grossly unfit beerhouses licensed before 1869.

As an influential deputation will be sent to the Home Office on the subject, it is to be hoped that more prominence will be given to the recommendations already made by the Royal Commission on Licensing, which are strongly in favour of reform. As Manchester has no fewer than 2,968 licensed houses, or one to every 183 of the entire population, it goes without saying that the drink curse is rampant in that city, and that limitation and reform would be called for even if there were not the additional evil of the grocers' licence to contend against.

The State of the West End. A deputation is to wait on the Government with a view to draw its attention to the state of our West End streets at night. The wonder is that this has not been done long since. The West End of London after nightfall is a disgrace to civilization and an outrage to morality. The open solicitation to vice and uncleanness which is permitted by the authorities, awakens wonder in the minds of foreigners, and stamps London before all the world as (apparently) the most vicious of modern cities. This social evil is an open sore, malignant and poisonous to the well-being of the nation. The only plea ever urged in defence of the supineness of the authorities, is that it is better that there should be an outlet for vice than that it should be driven out of sight; which ignores two great principles —that impurity is a totally unnecessary and fatal evil, and that the present state of things is the chief cause of its widespread prevalence in the city which is the heart of the Empire.

The New Act for Youthful Offenders. On New Year's Day there came into effect an Act dealing with youthful offenders, from which we hope much. By its provisions, any youth under sixteen, who is charged with an offence, may, at the discretion of the court, be placed in the hands of any "fit person" who will undertake to look after him. Provided the "fit person" can be found—and Christian men must be alert here—this is infinitely better than branding a first offender with the shameful, and, perhaps, life-long mark of the penitentiary. Reformation is a thousand times better than simple punishment. Another thing, special in this Act, is, that where parents and guardians have, through wilful neglect or direct abetting, allowed their children to get into trouble, they themselves will be fined for breach of responsibility. We trust this provision of the Act will be rigidly enforced, since it touches the heart of much of the crime which abounds.

Child Toilers. It is to be feared that the official report of the Committee on Child Labour which has just been issued will not receive the attention it deserves, as times of militarism, unfortunately, are not favourable to the discussion of social subjects, however forcibly they may bear upon the national welfare. It is startling to find from its pages that outside the huge army of about 100,000 "half-timers"—children working half the day and attending school the other—there are many who begin work at 3 a.m., and who "are put to work every available hour when they are not at school," and who receive wages of but 1s. 6d. per week; and also many who "directly they are six years old" are put to work at brickmaking and other occupations which are tabulated under the head of unwholesome and unhealthy. The Committee, as is becoming usual, recommend that County and Borough Councils should have powers to pass bye-laws dealing with occupations still unregulated by law; but surely the circumstances call for Parliamentary treatment on a wider basis.

Proselytism in Church Schools. It is frequently asserted by the friends of "Church" or "denominational" schools that the "conscience-clause" is an adequate safeguard for all Nonconformist parents who have to send their children to them. The following extract from the Church Review, which is quite naïve in its simplicity, throws an instructive light on this contention. It first quotes a paragraph from the parish magazine of St. Mary Magdalen's, Paddington, which, speaking of its "voluntary" schools, says:—

> Many a little dissenter, so-called, has been taught the Catholic faith in these walls, as, though the Conscience Clause is there, it has only once been used to withdraw a child from religious instruction. We know many an instance of these children, when older, coming forward by their own act for confirmation entirely from the sound teaching (!) they had received in their schooldays, and becoming very firm, good Churchpeople.

On this the Church Review remarks, with commendable candour, "It is when Church Schools—whether in town or country—are so used as to bring about results like these that we feel enthusiastic in their defence"—which is simply an enthusiastic defence of the most flagrant spirit of proselytism!

Missionaries for Wales. Perhaps the Roman Catholic Bishop of Menevia sees a possibility behind the recent agitation for a revival of the Welsh language, for it is stated that he has brought to Llanwr two French priests from St. Malo, "who have acquired a knowledge of the Welsh tongue," and who have to make use of no other languages that Latin and Welsh. There has been much boasting from time to time over the alleged spread of Romanism in Protestant Wales, but it certainly does not seem that the small demand for Welsh-speaking candidates for the Romish priesthood can be met in the Principality.

Grass Blade Criticism. The pedantic criticism of the Bible which founds its judgments upon letters and individual words, and from these professes to deduce the existence of a variety of authors and a variety of dates, has hitherto lacked an appropriate name whereby to describe it. A leading preacher suggests that it may be happily described as "grass blade criticism," since the Bible is a grand unity—a marvellous landscape of Divine truth, and the methods of these pedants is to ignore the tout ensemble of the landscape, paying exclusive attention to minute details. If a man, bidden to report upon a certain landscape, provided himself with a microscope and examined each blade of grass separately, he might have an exact acquaintance with blades of grass, but he would know nothing of the grandeur of the larger view of field and garden. The truly scientific principle is, first the whole, and then the parts.

Carapace or Vertebræ. In one of his recent sermons at Westminster Abbey, in reference to Indian missions, the late Bishop of Bombay gave a striking illustration of the vital difference between the Christian conscience and that of the Hindu, a comparative statement which is well worth remembering by those who are interested in the evangelization of the East. He said:—

> The difference between the Christian conscience and Hindu conscience is this—the difference between the animal which has an external skeleton, and the animal which has an internal one. In the South Kensington Museum this morning, I saw a tortoise with the outer shell taken off. Within that external skeleton lay the sensitive part of the creature. Such is the Hindu system. An external fabric for human life, of minute rules and regulations laying down what you are to do, and what you are not to do in every possible situation of life, leaving nothing to principle, nothing to initiative; but reducing life to a minute series of positive obligations. To the Christian conscience there is an internal skeleton of principle on which the whole fabric of life is built up.

The Veil upon Israel. The truth of the apostolic word, "blindness in part hath happened unto Israel," is as marked to-day as ever, only it would appear as if the form of the blindness had changed. Amongst the intelligent Jews there is less of that ferocious hatred of Jesus than there used to be; indeed some sort of respect is paid to him. An American rabbi who went to Oberammagau to see the Passion Play, declares that the Gospel narrative of the rabbinic hatred of our Lord is untrue, and that, on the contrary, Jesus and the Pharisees were never in opposition! Of course the Crucifixion has another explanation. The real purpose of the American rabbi is to account, in a new way, for the dispersion of his people, and he adopts the naïve method of accepting an effect without an adequate cause. Verily, St. Paul is true—the veil is upon their hearts. Learned rabbis may find it acceptable to tone down the Gospel record, but they cannot ignore nineteen centuries of history, and history has only one explanation for the scattering of this people.

Temperance Forward Movement.

THE remarkable demonstrations held in connection with the Million Pledges Crusade ceased, as pre-arranged, in December. So great was the interest aroused, that it has been decided, as already announced, to extend the efforts of Dr. Henry, accompanied, as before, by the Fisk Jubilee Singers.

A large council of reference will represent prominent bodies and gentlemen all over the kingdom, while Mr. Robert Scott will undertake the direct management of the movement, which will be called "The Twentieth Century Christian Temperance Campaign." Already a large number of applications for meetings have been received. The plan will be to spend more time than hitherto in a given locality, and to make the meetings more evangelistic in their character. It is keenly felt that the special hindrance to evangelistic work is the drink, and that temperance reform, put upon Scriptural grounds, will sustain a vital relation to soul-saving endeavour.

No new organization is contemplated. The effort will be made to strengthen existing temperance societies, unify the temperance forces, federate the Christian churches for temperance work, protect the children from the ravages of strong drink, save the victims of this awful curse, deliver the nation from its supreme peril, and promote the glory of God, in a Christian civilization. The Campaign will make its home in the churches, and its primary appeal is to Christian people to accept responsibility for the success of a rational and Scriptural temperance reform.

The pledge-signing feature will be pushed with vigour. What is known as the Frances Ridley Havergal pledge will be used in the meetings. It reads as follows:—

> In view of the great dishonour done to our most gracious God and Saviour; and in consideration of the damage, temporal and eternal, to our fellow creatures through the use of strong drink, I agree to abstain from all intoxicating liquors as beverages; and to discountenance their use by others.

The new campaign will begin on January 23 in Nottingham, where Dr. Henry and the Jubilee Singers will spend a week; thence to Dublin for nine days, and later to Leicester, Bradford, Wolverhampton, &c. It is earnestly hoped that all interested in temperance work will pray for the success of this noble endeavour. "Through our God we shall do valiantly, for He it is that shall tread down our enemies." Letters should be addressed to Mr. Scott at 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C.

"Beginning Again."

WHEN a stone is thrown into a pool, immediately the face of the water is disturbed; an ever-widening circle is formed, within which several smaller ones appear. Such, according to a popular but erroneous idea, is Life—centuries, decades, years, months, weeks, and days all forming circles on the surface of the sea of Time; and as these recur people often think they are, as it were, "beginning over again."

But this cannot be. We are not standing still, nor are we moving in a circle to return at intervals to where we were. The earth comes back each year to the point from which it started; the sun runs its same daily course from east to west; the snow returns to the same old hills, and the ice to the same old streams. But each year bears us on to something new. May this, in the best and truest sense, be to each of us a Happy New Year.

Life is not a circle; we do not occupy the same position that we held a year ago. We are moving, ever onward, along a road marked out for us by an unseen, an all-powerful, and, thank God, an all-wise hand. Our life is no mere tidal ebb which will soon turn into a flow; but a steady and perpetual ebb, from which there will be no cessation till all ebbings cease, and the eternal flow begins.

The true picture of life, then, is not a series of yearly circles, but a long road ending at last in the great unknown. Men join it at different points; they travel along it for different distances—perhaps no two men in a generation possessing exactly the same length of life—and they leave it at as many different points as those at which it was begun. Each New Year's Day is, as it were, a milestone along the way; and every one we reach finds us, not at the point from which we started, but a mile—a year—nearer to the end. Nor is it without reason that life is ordained to be a progressive, and not a circular journey.

1. Man is a rational being, and possesses FACULTIES OF PROGRESS AND DEVELOPMENT.—He passes from childhood to youth, and from youth to manhood, increasing in knowledge and developing in strength. He is not always learning the same things, nor traversing the same intellectual ground, as year by year goes by, but his life is one of progress.

In a country brickfield or a mill we often see a horse blindfolded, going round and round a well-trodden path, turning a shaft for some elementary or menial purpose. No good horse is set to such work as this; but only one whose best days are over, rendering it unfit for a more important service. We, too, are destined to a grander, nobler task than that of a circular life, because we are possessed of faculties which would become dwarfed or paralyzed if put to such a use, instead of growing in grace and in ever increasing strength.

2. "BEGINNING AGAIN" WILL NOT ATONE FOR THE PAST.—As men enter upon a new year, how often do they make resolutions to "turn over a new leaf;" or as a year draws to a close, if they are dissatisfied with their mode of life, they will say, "Oh well, we must go on as we are for the present, and start fresh next year." Thus they condone misdeed and failure under promise of reform, and that promise is but too often like the proverbial piecrust, "made to be broken."

There are two things to be considered in this idea of "turning over a new leaf." It will not blot out or destroy the past; and in course of time the end of the volume will be reached, when there will be no more leaves to turn. What then? Rather let us secure pardon for the past, and seek for grace to preserve the remaining pages of Life's book without spot and blameless. The blood of Christ was shed for the remission of sins that are past; the power of God is able daily to keep us from falling.

3. GOD'S DEALINGS WITH US ARE VARIOUS.—If we walk or ride round a certain portion of country continually, we recognise a variety of objects that we have passed and noticed before. But this seldom happens in Life. As one star differeth from another in glory, so does each year possess characteristics peculiarly its own.

Our circumstances are found to differ greatly from year to year. Not often can we say, "This happened last year," or "I remember being in an exactly similar position the year before." One of our first difficulties in the New Year is to remember the altered date at the heading of our letters. Again and again we find ourselves inserting the old familiar figure of the previous year. So, too, sometimes we fain would cling to circumstances of the past. But it cannot be. When Father Time sweeps out the old year, we bid farewell to the characteristics which marked its presence with us. Nor are our friends the same. Many are the faces which linger in our memory, of beloved ones of the past now lost in the shadows. But we look forward and haste unto the time when we shall clasp them to our hearts again. Nor are our trials the same. Every year brings its own—fresh and varied; but the past is past, and there are fewer troubles ahead for us to meet than there were a year ago. Nor are our pleasures the same. The simple joys of childhood for most of us are gone; and many look back upon things which pleased them in their youth as vanity and vexation of spirit. In turn there pass before us the pleasures of early and middle life, like finger-posts pointing onward, ever onward to the eternal goal.

Nor are our privileges the same. Every year, yea every day, adds to the long list of blessings received at our Father's hand, varying in kind and increasing in number, so that to-day we have more privileges set down to our account than ever before. "Borrowed axes" are they all; let us take heed that we do not let them fall into the stream of time, to sink out of our sight, or to be washed away for ever, for there will be no kindly prophet near to cause the iron to swim.

Nor are our opportunities the same. As we look back upon the past year, how many have we failed to use! We speak of "taking time by the forelock." The ancients were wont to represent Time as an old man clad only in nature's garb, with one lock of hair on his forehead, but none behind. As he passed by, the only means of detaining him was to catch him by this lock of hair—the forelock; if that were missed, there remained nothing by which to hold him. Let us learn the lesson, and pass the time of our sojourning here in fear, pressing on toward the mark of the prize of our high calling in Christ Jesus, growing in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. G.

The King's Coronation.

DEAR SIR,—Through your valuable paper may I suggest that the Lord's people should now prayerfully consider the best way in which they can unitedly take part in the loyal demonstrations that will shortly be organized for celebrating the Coronation of King Edward VII.? Are there not means by which we can all unite to honour the King and do valuable service in making Jesus King?

If arrangements were made early the Church of Christ might save many of its members from doubtful things, and would make a world-wide impression for God. T. H.

Alive or Dead?

LIFE is so brief, even though the road that stretches before us in the morning appears to be endlessly long! We let our gaze travel along this road: it is full of brilliant achievements—our own.

We begin to traverse its miles, and as we push forward, we find many obstacles in the way of our progress. These we persistently thrust aside—it is our road; none, nothing, must hinder us in the race we are running for our satisfaction—our own gain. We increase our pace, and pass many lagging and flagging ones on the way, whom we rather despise for their timid, halting steps; others, again, we out-distance, because they have (foolishly!) paused by the way to succour some of these ill-equipped or feeble ones on the journey. We even despise them at times—they have no ambition, we say; they do not mind being left behind in the race we are running; they are content to carry cups of water to the lips of the thirsty ones on Life's dusty highway—and they are never seen in fine apparel in high places, for they are the lowly ones of earth.

"Ah," we tell ourselves, "it is all very well to be a Christian; but this is carrying things too far. No one supposes for a moment that in the twentieth century we can live the Gospel-life. The conditions of existence are altered. Why," we continue, "otherwise I should have to give a tenth of all I possess in charity; I should have meekly to bear insult and abuse, and never say a word in kind or in self-defence! How impossible such a life would be!"

Is the Christ-life impossible? Yes, to the unawakened, the self-lovers, the spiritually dead, it is. But to the true, unconventional, awakened, obedient son of God, it is the only real life, for to him Life means and expresses spiritual growth. There can be no life where there is no development, no enlargement of the mystical and beautiful spark of Divine love in the soul. Love and life are co-existent.

Yet the Christian—the nominal Christian, of course—is often among the first "to get there" in the race for wealth, place, position, power, among earth's shining ones. It is not that he would wilfully break any of the commandments, or deny the truth and beauty of the story unfolded in the Gospels, or deliberately set himself to crush or cripple those he thrusts out of his way on the road of life. It is none of these things—it is simply that the crust or veneer of the cruel traditions of modern civilization has accumulated upon him from his cradle up, so that he is practically dead within to the voice of Divine truth, though he may hear it with his bodily ear without.

It is for this man we must pray: he is spiritually dead, though physically he is very much alive. It was said of some of old that they could not see Jesus, the spiritual One, because "their eyes were holden"; literally, they lacked the clear vision of spirituality at the time, though this was fully revealed to them afterwards. It is so with this man for whom we pray—he needs the divine illumination, and it is ours to ask that it may be his. "This man"—may he not be, after all, you? or I? Ah, we shall soon know, for life is very brief, though the road is so long. Let us be kind one to another; tender-hearted—forgiving one another; let us pause in the race to raise some of the fallen—to help stand erect some who have moral curvature; pause, that we may begin to take in great breathings of the Divine Spirit that shall aerate the very corners of our being, and fill us with the oxygen of that blessed content which realizes for itself and others that God is Love. Samuel and Saul.

An Age of Transition.

(1 Sam. 1).

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

"ON whom the ends of the ages are come," i.e., the end of one age and the beginning of another. Such is our position to-day. In every direction the old is giving place to the new. It was thus in the days of the Primitive Church, when the typical institutions of the Levitical system were being replaced by "the heavenly things themselves." And it was also thus at the time when our narrative begins. The story of Samuel is a divine interlude between the days of the Judges and those of David the King.

Hitherto, the High Priesthood had been the supreme authority recognized in the Hebrew Commonwealth. To Moses, its founder, there could be, of course, no successor; but Aaron was the first of an unbroken line of Priests. No other office stood for the whole of Israel. The Mosaic era, however, was not destined to culminate in the rule of the Priest, who has seldom combined the sacerdotal functions with the special qualifications that constitute a great leader and ruler. Too often the reign of a high-minded churchman has been warped by bigotry, tyranny, and the repression of the nobler aspirations of mankind.

A suggestion that a fresh development of the Hebrew polity was near, occurs in the closing verses of the Book of Ruth, with which this book is connected by the conjunction now. The genealogy, which is the evident climax of that sweet pastoral story closes no connection with Aaron or his line. It expressly deals with the tribe of Judah, of which nothing was spoken concerning the priesthood. Evidently the Divine purpose was moving forward—but whither? At the time its goal was not apparent, but as we look back on all the circumstances from the vantage-ground of accomplished fact, we can see that it was slowly moving towards the establishment of the kingdom under David, and veiled from all eyes there was the yet profounder movement towards the revelation of "that Proper Man," as Luther calls Him, in whose nature, fitly known as Wonderful, the priestly, the prophetic, and the royal blend in perfect symmetry and beauty.

I. The Urgent Need for a Strong Man.

Every age takes up and urges the cry—Give us men; but if ever a strong man was needed, it was in the days of which the Book of Judges gives us some startling glimpses.

Canaan had been conquered, but the ancient inhabitants were far from being subdued; they remained much as the Saxons, under the early Norman kings. In the South, the Philistines held their five cities. The mountain fortress, which was afterwards Mount Zion, was proudly defiant, so far forward as the days of David. Nearly all the sea-coast, and all the strongholds in the rich plain of Esdraelon were in the hands of the Canaanites. The little kingdom of Gezer remained independent till it was conquered by the King of Egypt, and given as a dowry to Solomon's Queen. On the northern frontier were the remains of those mighty nations which Joshua had overthrown in the great battle of the Waters of Merom, but which probably only gave a nominal allegiance to the Israelite suzerainty. "So the Lord left those nations, without driving them out hastily . . . to prove Israel by them, even as many as had not known the wars of Canaan . . . to teach them war, at the least such as beforetime knew nothing thereof." Had it not been for the presence of these warlike tribes, we should never have heard of Gideon, of Barak, of Jephthah, of Samson, or of David. Without this discipline, Israel might have become an effeminate and molluscous race, lacking backbone and muscle. They would have dwelt in security, after the manner of the Zidonians, quiet and secure in a large land, a place where there was no want of anything that is in the earth (Judges iii. 1-3; xviii. 7, 10).

How often in our earthly discipline we come into experiences which are the counterpart of these. There are wars where we looked for peace; fret and chafe where we expected freedom from annoyance; pouring from vessel to vessel where we hoped to be allowed to settle on our lees. Are not these clearly permitted to try us, that we may learn war; that we may know ourselves and know God; that we and our children may grow up into a nobler and healthier style of character than had otherwise been possible.

In Israel this incessant exposure to attack was aggravated by the absence of any strong central government. The priesthood had evidently fallen into the hands of weaklings from the days of Phinehas. Of this there is striking confirmation in the fact that Eli sprang, not from the house of Eleazar, the eldest son of Aaron, in which the succession ought to have been continued, but from the family of the younger son, Ithamar. There is a strong probability that the representatives of the elder branch had proved themselves so unable to cope with the disorders of the time that they had been set aside in favour of any one who evinced faculty enough to take the field and marshal the forces of Israel. Perhaps Eli, in his young life, had done some stirring deed of prowess which raised him to the supreme position; though, when we are introduced to him, he is pitiful in his senile decrepitude and weakness (1 Chron. vi. 4-15; xxiv. 4).

From time to time prophets had been raised up as a temporary expedient. "He gave them judges until Samuel the prophet." "And when the Lord raised up judges, then the Lord was with the judge, and saved them out of the hand of their enemies all the days of the judge; for it repented the Lord because of their groaning by reason of them that oppressed them and vexed them" (Acts xiii. 20; Judges ii. 18). The reign of a judge was, however, a very transient gleam of light in that dark and stormy age. At the furthest, his power was only recognised within his own and the adjacent tribes. Samson, for instance, was little else than the hero of the south country, whilst Jephthah was pre-eminently the captain of the trans-Jordanic tribes. In many cases the office ceased with the special crisis that called it into being. Only in the case of two or three, such as Deborah and Gideon, did conspicuous service lead to a lifelong primacy.

Thus the nation was in danger of desolation by internal anarchy and external attack. With no principle of cohesion, no rallying-point, no acknowledged leader, what was there to resist the pressure of the Canaanites from within and the hostile nations from without its borders? "In those days there was no king in Israel, but every man did that which was right in his own eyes;" "The children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord;" "The children of Israel cried unto the Lord." These three sentences, repeated frequently and earnestly, are the key-notes of the whole book. The religious ties, moreover, were very weak. We find, for instance, the name of Baal, a Phœnician deity, occurring three times in the names of members of the family of Saul (1 Chron. viii. 30, 33, 34). The stories of Micah, of Ruth, and of the extermination of the Danites, supply graphic pictures of the singularity, independence, and wildness of the time; of wild licence, and of exposure to attack.

It was necessary, therefore, to introduce a new order of things. To assert and achieve the national unity, to make the best aspects of the rule of the judges permanent in the office of kingship, to resuscitate and maintain the allegiance of Israel to the God of their fathers, to carry over the whole nation from the time of the last judge to that of the first king, was a task that demanded a pre-eminently strong man; and the want was superbly supplied, as we shall see, by the prophet Samuel, who conducted his people from one age to another, without a revolution, and almost without excitement, which naturally accompanies so great a change.

II. How the Need was Met.

God's greatest gifts to man come through travail. Whether we look into the spiritual or the temporal sphere, can we discover anything, any great reform, any beneficent discovery, any soul-awakening revival, which did not come through the toils and tears, the vigils and blood-shedding of men and women, whose sufferings were the pangs of its birth? That which costs nothing is of small avail to the salvation and help of mankind. The souls that are set on saving themselves, will never be the saviours of the race. If the temple is raised, David must bear sore afflictions; if the Gospel of the grace of God is to be disentangled from Jewish tradition, Paul's life must be one long agony; if the Reformation is to be rendered possible for Europe, men like John Huss and Jerome must be burnt at the stake; if great scientific discoveries are to be established, men like Galileo, Galvani, Faraday and Edison must spend sleepless nights and laborious days through long years; if great religious truths are to be enunciated, as the priceless heirloom of pilgrim souls, men like Baxter, Bunyan, or Charles Simeon must be willing to undergo ostracism, misrepresentation, and contempt. Before Samuel could be given to his people, Hannah must be a woman of a sorrowful spirit.

Some few miles to the north of Jerusalem, on the confines of the territories of Ephraim and Benjamin, was situated the town of Ramathaim-Zophim. It was also known as Ramah, and has passed into New Testament history as Arimathea, the town from which he came who begged of Pilate the body of the Lord. Ramathaim means the two Ramahs, as there was probably an upper and a lower city, in which reference is made in the after-story (1 Sam. ix. 13). Zophim recalls the name of an ancestor of Elkanah, named Zuph, who appears to have been a man of considerable importance, and to have given his name to the whole district (1 Chron. vi. 35; 1 Sam. ix. 5). In this mountain city a child was to be born who was to give it interest and importance, not only during his life-time, when it became the focus of the national life, but for centuries of years.

Towards the close of Samson's career in Southern Judah, a family resided at Ramah consisting of Elkanah, a Levite, and his two wives, Hannah (Grace) and Peninnah (Pearl or Margaret). He had formerly lived in Ephraim, and was therefore considered to belong to that tribe (Joshua xxi. 20). That he had two wives was not a violation of the Levitical law, which did not forbid polygamy, but carefully regulated the marriage-law, penetrating the home-life with such ideals as would gradually bring men and women back to the original institution of Paradise (Mark x. 4-9).

It is supposed that Elkanah brought a second wife into his home because of Hannah's childlessness; but whatever had been the cause, the step had been fraught with misery. The house at Ramah was filled with bickering and strife, which was augmented as child after child fell to the lot of Peninnah, whilst Hannah was still childless. Apart from all else, her desolate condition was an almost intolerable condition (Gen. xxx. 1); but that it should be made the subject of biting sarcasm and bitter taunts was the occasion of the most poignant grief. The pain was not confined to Ramah, but seems to have reached its climax when, according to the Hebrew custom, the household went up to offer unto the Lord the yearly sacrifice, and Hannah was compelled to witness the many portions which fell to the lot of her rival, for all her sons and daughters, at the sacrificial feast, when, after offering to Jehovah the victims they had brought, they retired to feast on the remainder. Then it was that the needy sat upon the dung-hill, and the poor in the dust; then it was that her soul was pierced as by the sword of the Lord, and drew near unto the grave; then it was that the hunger of her soul could not be appeased even by the consciousness of Elkanah's fond affection (i. 5, 8; ii. 5-8). But out of this soul-travail the joy of her life and the saviour of her country was to be born.

The Shunter's Warning.

BY GRACE PETTMAN.

IT was evening-time on the platform of a busy railway station. The passengers had taken their seats in the up-train; the whistle was given; already the engine was starting to crawl slowly out of the station; a man was banging the last of the carriage doors as the train went past him.

Suddenly a stumble, a cry; then a fearful shriek rent the air. How had it happened? Nobody knew, but the unhappy man had lost his hold of the handle and slipped down—down between the platform and the footboard of the carriage; while still the train moved on, twisting and turning poor Jack over and over. A moment of horror-stricken suspense, then the train was stopped, and the ambulance corps of railway men were beside their unfortunate comrade, sawing away the wood to set the injured shunter free. He was fearfully hurt, and as they strove to release him, he cried, "Let me die! Let me die! Oh, let me die!"

But his mates knew better. While life remained there might be hope, and some of them were Christians; they knew Jack was not ready to die. Lifting him gently on to the stretcher, they bore him home; for a few hours he lay between life and death. Then, almost by a miracle, Jack turned the corner, and the doctors held out hope.

As soon as possible I went to see him. Slowly, very slowly, he was mending, and the first shock of anguish had passed away.

"You have had a narrow escape, Jack," I said, sitting down beside him. "Supposing it had not been 'almost killed' but 'quite,' what then? If your life had been taken, would you have been ready?"

He turned away impatiently.

"It's all very well for a young lady like you, miss, that's got nothing to do, to be a Christian, but I've got my living to get."

"So have I," I answered promptly, "and as to having nothing to do, I expect I put in quite as busy a week's work any week as you, for only my spare time can be given to trying to win the railway men for God. It is not a question of time. You will have to find time to die! You have been very close to death. God has given you a solemn warning to be ready. Are you going to pay no heed?"

But Jack heeded not, nor cared to listen, and sorrowfully at last I came away.

Days lengthened into weeks; Jack's recovery was a marvellous one, and at last he was able to return to work. Months passed, and then another terrible warning was sent to him. Again Jack met with an accident—again he came face to face with sudden death—and again his life was spared. This time his injuries were not so serious; he was only detained at home a few days, and then went back to his work once more, as far as we knew, unchanged and unconcerned as ever, Twice warned, and twice neglectful; would God always allow his warnings to be thus rejected, and in mercy spare him again and yet again?

Months passed away. It was a winter's night; Jack was shunting a goods train on its way to London. In the darkness of that gloomy night he had to grope his way up and down the line, coupling and uncoupling the trucks, and shunting them here and there, signalling by means of a lantern he carried in his hand. It was tedious work; the night was thick, the rails were wet and greasy; somehow, none ever quite knew the story, Jack the shunter lost his foothold, and again, with an awful cry, slipped between the trucks of the train.

Help came at once; Jack was borne away to the nearest hospital, and his wife was sent for; but at first it seemed as if he were but little injured, in spite of all—as if once again he had been within an hair's breadth of death and had been spared. His injuries were attended to, and the doctors gave every hope. He was settled comfortably for the night, and then, full of joy and infinite relief, his wife went home.

The hours crept slowly on; midnight came and went, and then in that strange mysterious time, when the vital powers of life are at their lowest ebb, there came a startling change. There was some terrible internal injury, unsuspected at first—a few short moments of anguish, then unconsciousness and death.

At two o'clock in the morning Jack the shunter was suddenly called into eternity.

No time to summon his wife—only the nurse and doctor were there beside him. Jack the shunter, twice face to face with death, and twice spared, the third time hurried into an endless eternity.

God warns, but God cannot allow us to trifle with his mercy. He has not promised to give us place for repentance over and over again if we continue to neglect.

"He that being often reproved, hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy." We do not know where God has drawn the line beyond which his mercy and forbearance cannot go; there is but one safe way—be ready, be in time. Come now while God offers you perfect cleansing through the blood of Jesus, while He yet invites you to give yourself to Him, while still he says, "Him that cometh to Me, I will in nowise cast out."

Here and now yield yourself to Him; He has called and warned and entreated you so long, but He will not always wait and plead. "Seek ye the Lord while He may be found; call ye upon Him while He is near." That surely tells of a time when He will not be found—a day when God will be far, too far away in mercy and grace to hear our cry. There is but one time in his offer of salvation—that time is NOW.

The Curse of Gambling.

BY CHARLES COOK.

NEARLY every magistrate and judge in London has recently declared that gambling is a dangerous national evil which must be speedily dealt with. They refer particularly to betting on horse-racing, because this specific aspect of gambling appeals to the masses of the people. It is an attempt to obtain money without working for it, and the evil is greatly helped by the opinions of the many that they "know better than anybody else," thus their own conceit leads to their own loss. It may surprise many who read these lines to know that gambling is a greater national evil than drink. It has a wider area, and has a larger constituency. It affects the smallest newsboy who shouts, "free-a-clock winner," as well as the most decrepid old man "hanging around" the "pub," anxiously, aye, feverishly waiting to know if he has lost or gained on "the bit he has put on." I have seen policemen on their beat, 'bus drivers on their box, and nearly all other classes of the community, lost (for the moment) to their duty or business, eagerly scanning the early evening papers to know "the winner."

WHAT JOCKEYS SAY.

For over thirty years I have been more or less "in touch" with betting men and "the turf," and it may be useful to others to know how those who live by racing and those who fatten on their ill-gotten gains think of it; those who rejoice over another's sorrow; who sing and drink over a big success—which perhaps mingles with the dirge of a soul who has plunged into eternity viâ a suicide's grave (and there are many such). Fred Archer, perhaps the most successful English jockey, said some few years before his death, "I should be five times richer a man to-day if I had never backed a horse." Sam Loates, another well-known jockey, when a friend said, "Sammy, there are some good things at this meeting," answered, "There are no good things in gambling." Mr. John Porter, the trainer has said, "The man who can make money by backing horses has yet to be born." Another shrewd man has added, "It is any odds on the pencil against the punter," which being interpreted, means, "It is any odds on the 'bookmaker' against the backer." Let us see if these statements are true!

A man whose initials were "R.D.," built a magnificent mansion in a northern suburb of London, and called it, "Silly Shillings." This man is one of the most successful of "bookmakers" in London. Another "bookmaker," who was formerly a 'bus-conductor, has built a row of houses in Chelsea, and has styled them, "Mugs' Cottages." Surely, this is exposing the fallacy with a vengeance; and still the game flourishes, and the losses of the victims, when totalled up, will prove a bigger item in the nation's balance-sheet than that which is spent annually in drink. These are solid, sober facts to be faced.

PAUPERS BETTING!

There are tens of thousands of working men who "have a bit on" every day on which there is racing, and the extent to which their wives and children suffer can only be imagined. In many of the girls' workrooms of London there is a girl "bookmaker," and I have known even a pauper in workhouse "making a book," and taking the pennies of his fellow-inmates.

Unfortunately there is a "middleman" between the wholesale plunderer and the retail victim who is known as a "tipster." One such —"Perfection Miller" was the name he was known by—when sentenced to penal servitude some time ago, confessed to having received £60,000 in postal orders from those to whom he had proposed to send "winners." "Old Jack Dickenson," who was known, I suppose, to millions of people, was the principal tipster for the last twenty-five years. I have seen him on a Derby Day take shillings as quickly as he could hand out small tickets to the people, who invested pounds on the horse he selected as the winner. When he died recently he left behind him an immense fortune in house property.

ARE THE POLICE POWERLESS?

Besides the sporting papers, the evening journals pander largely to the sporting proclivities, and beyond this there are numerous cards and four-page sheets issued daily, all of which seem to have a large circulation, their only object being to point out the winners. Visit Middlesex Street (known as Petticoat Lane) any Sunday morning, and you will find (near Aldgate) the whole roadway blocked by several crowds listening to these loud-mouthed gentry, all declaring their ability and willingness (for the payment of threepence) to give sure winners for all the week; with both Metropolitan and City police looking on, apparently unable to stop the iniquitous traffic.

One tipster from this street was recently fined £2, but the evil goes on. Only a few months ago the editor of Sporting Luck was sentenced to six months' imprisonment for breaking the law, so that the police are trying to do what they can.

Doubtless there are few readers of THE CHRISTIAN who have not some loved ones in danger of this universal and national curse, to whom the above may be useful. Who can deny the authority of the above men? Who can dispute the above facts? Who does not know of some bright young fellow whose life has been blighted by the curse of gambling?

When Dr. Parker edited The Sun, he published the two sides of my "Corrected Race Card," which has been given away on race-courses and other places by hundreds of thousands, and has been used to the conversion of many men.

I am hoping to distribute this to large numbers of the artizan class as they leave work. When preaching outside the Small Arms Factory at Enfield, in the dinner hour, it was painful to see numbers of the men doing business with the "bookmakers."

There is no national workshop, such as Woolwich Arsenal or Portsmouth dockyard, in which you may not see every day—as the men leave for their midday meal—a number of bookmakers waiting to fleece their deluded victims. An illustration of the ruin caused by betting will be found in the Liverpool clerk whose defalcations amount to £170,000. T. H. Simpson, general manager of the Bank of Liverpool, says: "It is believed that this large sum has been lost by him in betting transactions." "Who found it?" is the question. The answer, "The 'bookmaker.'"

Elijah: The Prophet of all Time.

By Rev. F. S. WEBSTER, M.A., Rector of All Souls, Langham Place, W.

VII.—The God that Answereth by Fire.

THERE was no resisting the Word of God as it came from the lips of Elijah. Ahab, charged as the cause of all Israel's troubles, had been subdued by it. The multitude of the nation, convicted of a policy of halting inconsistent with anything except sheer atheism, had been reduced to silence. And when the supreme test, "The God that answereth by fire, let Him be God," had been accepted by the people, soon the prophets of Baal were forced to submit to it.

If they could have found any excuse for avoiding the proposed test, they would have gladly taken advantage of it. It is only truth that welcomes honest criticism and dreads nothing but concealment. These prophets of Baal would fain have let well alone, for they felt themselves secure through Jezebel's patronage, and the hold which their licentious rites had obtained upon the corrupt passions of the populace. But the trial suggested was so reasonable and fair, and the people had welcomed it so eagerly, as affording an easy solution of their difficulties, and promising at the same time an exciting entertainment, that they were forced to fall in with it. Notice then:

(1) The Appropriateness of the Ordeal. Jehovah had often in old times answered by fire. He appeared to Abraham in the darkness of the evening as a smoking furnace and a burning lamp, that passed between the pieces of the sacrifice. Fire from heaven fell upon the cities of the plain. So God appeared to Moses as a fire that burned, but did not consume.

Fire fell from heaven upon the Altar of Burnt-offering, and again fire came out from the Lord to slay the 250 men that offered incense in the rebellion of Korah. And at the dedication of the Temple, "when Solomon had made an end of praying, the fire came down from heaven and consumed the burnt-offering." So the proposal that God should once more answer by fire, would remind the people of some of the most solemn events in their history.

And if Baal was what his prophets declared him to be, what more reasonable than that he, too, should answer by fire? For he was the God of Nature; the fruitfulness of the land was accredited to his bounty, and the thunder and lightning were frequently pointed to as evidences of his power.

The spot selected for the trial was also peculiarly suitable. On the slopes of Mount Carmel there was many a natural amphitheatre, where the thousands of Israel could view the decisive contest. There was also, at the eastern end, an unfailing spring of water, fed by the mountain dews, which would be serviceable for the due preparation of the sacrifice. An ancient altar, moreover, stood there, now in ruins, dating back, perhaps, from patriarchal times. Then Carmel's summit commanded an extensive view of the Mediterranean, and from it any sign of approaching rain would be soonest detected. It was in sight of the royal city of Jezreel, distant some eighteen miles away, where Jezebel, fearing disaster perhaps, was keeping under her wing the 400 prophets of the groves. But see—

2. The Vain Incantations of the Prophets of Baal. It was a sad but most suggestive sight. Their numbers were large—four hundred and fifty as against the solitary prophet of Jehovah. Truth does not always rest with majorities. Yea, the real majority is where God is.

Then their social influence was great. They held high positions in the Court and throughout the kingdom. But we are told, "not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called." The Goliaths are, by every human standard of measurement, greater than the Davids, not in physical development merely, but also in the wisdom of this world, and in the art of pleasing men.

Then those men were in earnest. They never ceased the whole day through in their petitions. Hour after hour a weird and joyless litany with its ceaseless refrain, "O Baal, hear us," was chanted, first in sonorous and dignified supplication, and then in wild and frantic dismay. Goaded by Elijah's sarcasm (sarcasm is often the most effective weapon against a religion vain and false, like the so-called "Christian Science" of our day), they even sprinkled their blood upon the sacrifice, leaping in wild dances round and upon the altar, and cutting themselves with knives and lancets. They shared the true instinct that "without shedding of blood there is no remission," though they knew nothing of the only sacrifice that can really take away sin.

So all their efforts were in vain. "There was neither voice nor any to answer, nor any that regarded." It is the inevitable result in the case of all who come by some other way pleading some other name. Men say in their blind folly, "Earnestness is everything; it matters not what views you hold so long as you are in earnest."

Of what avail is the earnestness of the drowning man who clutches at what he believes to be a solid spar, and is only drifting seaweed? Natural religion, evolved out of the spirit and triumph of the age, will always command a large following of thoughtful people, apparently sincere and earnest, and thanks to the Christian environment of their days, far superior to the worshippers of Baal in morality or uprightness; but in time of need, when death is near, or the heart is breaking beneath some crushing sorrow, the result will be the same, "No voice, nor any to answer." Turn to consider—

3. The Acceptable Sacrifice of Elijah. He began by repairing the altar that was broken down, building it up with "twelve stones, according to the number of the tribes of Israel." The idolatry of the Ten Tribes had been set on foot as a political device to separate them from Judah and Benjamin. Elijah would remind them that there can be no perfect approach to God without a due acknowledgment of their unity with the rest of Israel. God grant that the motto, "All one in Christ Jesus," may be the watchword of all who love the Saviour in sincerity. The Established Churchman and the Free Churchman must alike build the altar of twelve stones if they really desire fire from heaven. There must be no despising any of whatever church or society who have the Spirit of Christ.

But Elijah had waited until the finish of the offering of the evening sacrifice. We seek in vain if we seek not by the way of the One Sacrifice once offered by which sin has been put away. The sacrifice, moreover, was duly prepared according to the regulations given in Leviticus. The wood was laid upon the altar, and the pieces of the victim laid upon the wood. These pieces were probably well washed with water. We know, at any rate, that twelve barrels or pitchers full were poured upon the sacrifice, and then after that the trench which had been dug around the altar was filled with water. Faith delights to heap up difficulties, remembering that there are no difficulties to omnipotence. Elijah would make it perfectly plain that no fire had been concealed or could be secretly applied. The sacrifice was so saturated with water that only fire from heaven could ignite it. Dear Amanda Smith said, some years ago, "When God Almighty does a miracle, He likes to do it handsome." Elijah evidently felt the same. What a lesson, too, for the Church of the constant need of cleansing through the Word, and of that separation from an ungodly generation which obedience to God's Word invariably causes. If the water and the trench are lacking in our sacrifice, what wonder if there is no fire from heaven?

So, when all was ready, prayer was offered. It was, indeed, a model prayer. Would that God's people had the faith to offer it more constantly. God's glory, and the salvation of the deluded Israelites, were the main objects sought. The vindication of Elijah himself was only a side issue. It was based on the Covenant, and by the bold petition, "Let it be known this day that thou art God in Israel," it sought a definite and an immediate answer. And when Elijah's faith thus challenged the ear of Heaven, there came at once—

4. The Answer of the Living God. "The fire of the Lord fell." And the same answer waits the prayer of faith and the sacrifice of love to-day. Jesus Christ still baptizes with the Holy Ghost and with fire. This answer was no new thing; it was after the pattern of Horeb and Sinai, and our answer shall in like manner be after the pattern of Pentecost.

It was a supernatural flame. It came direct from heaven. And so comes the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, into our hearts with a supernatural illumination and a Divine enkindling. It came to consume the sacrifice, and to-day the fire of God will consume all that is carnal and evil within us, and cleanse and inspire all that is good and true. It wrought conviction of a kind in the minds of the people. And thank God that Christ in Christians is still manifest, and one of the most convincing evidences of the living power and truth of Christianity. It vindicated the character of Elijah. The mountain side rang with a wild shout, "The Lord He is God," which, in Hebrew, would just be "Eli-jah, Eli-jah." The name that had been covered with opprobrium before was now shouted in triumph by every Israelite. There are, thank God, times on earth when those who most deeply suffer the reproach of Christ enjoy blessed foretastes of the final triumph. It is still true, "them that honour Me I will honour."

Christian Fruitfulness

Illustrated by Trees.*

By C. EDWARDS, Winchester.

THERE are "tongues in trees, sermons in stones, books in running brooks, and good in everything." Yes, trees talk and testify of the wisdom and goodness of God; and all men taught by the Holy Spirit can understand their language, and praise God for such wonderful witnesses to his presence and power in the world.

Trees are nature's unframed pictures of the Lord's goodness to men; and in their life, growth, beauty, and fruit are emblems of Christian life and service. There is one great end of tree life, that is fruit. So there is one great purpose and perfection of the Christian's life, and that is fruit. "Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit" (John xv. 8).

1. Trees are planted to bear fruit. Illustrating Christian Life (Psa. i. 3; Isa. lxi. 3; Psa. xcii. 13; Matt. xv. 13; Rom. vi. 5).

2. Trees are prepared to bear fruit. Illustrating Christian Growth (Song of Solomon iv. 12-15; Luke xiii. 8, 9).

3. Trees are pruned to bear fruit. Illustrating Christian Discipline (John xv. 1-8; Heb. xii. 11).

4. Trees are preserved to bear fruit. Illustrating Christian Progress (Hos. xiv. 8: Matt. vii. 19; John xv. 4).

5. Trees are proved by their fruit. Illustrating Christian Testimony (Psa. civ. 16; Matt. vii. 20; Gal. v. 22).

Every believer is rooted and grounded in Christ Jesus (Col. ii. 7). Strengthened and prepared for service by refreshing grace (Jer. xvii. 8). Pruned and purged by discipline for increased usefulness (John xv. 2; Heb. xii. 11; and Rev. iii. 19). Preserved for greater opportunities for service by care and cultivation (Luke xiii. 8). And tested and proved by the measure and quality of their fruit for testimony in the world (Matt. iii. 10; John xv. 6).

Spiritual fruitfulness comes from God. "From Me is thy fruit found" (Hos. xiv. 8); by a living union with Christ the true Vine (John xv. 2, 8); and through the operation and power of the Holy Ghost (Eph. v. 9). The fruits Christians bear are not in every case, and at all times, the same. The plant of prosperity yields the rich fruit of thankfulness, whilst adversity brings forth sweet patience, suspense gently blossoms into hope, and service gradually ripens into happiness; but every kind is beautiful in its season. There are many different kinds of spiritual fruit—the fruits of righteousness (2 Cor. ix. 10); fruit unto holiness (Rom. vi. 22); fruit unto God (Rom. vii. 4); and fruit unto eternal life (John iv. 36).

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, January 5. Revelation ii.

IT has been supposed by some that these epistles to the churches represent the seven phases of church history between the First and Second Advents, just as the parables of Matt. xiii. cover the same epoch. Those who hold this view will find its lucid exposition in the pages of Mr. G. H. Pember. It is enough for us, however, to take them as applying to various stages of Christian life. There is no reader who will not find one of these epistles specially applicable to his state.

Notice that each letter consists of three parts:—(1) The introduction, which specifies some characteristic of the Saviour, appropriate to the subject of the following epistle. (2) A description of the church life. (3) The promises to the overcomer, which follow the order of God's gifts to his people in the Old Testament, beginning with the Tree of Life, then the manna in the wilderness, the conquest of Canaan, the glory of the Temple, and the kingdom of Solomon.

1-7: How far we may go, and yet be threatened with the removal of the candlestick from its place! Full of labour in the service of God and truth, opposed to wicked men and false teachers, not fainting in the day of trial, strongly orthodox, and yet, if love be gone, nothing can compensate. 8-11: How great the joy of suffering for Christ, and that suffering cleanses the spiritual nature, so that in the case of Smyrna there is no blame whatever. 12-17: Pergamos was full of temptation to the flesh, and yet it was possible to hold fast to the Gospel, and not deny the faith. 18-29: Then, as now, the allurements to indulge fleshly appetite were terribly strong, but there is grace in Christ, which can deliver and keep.

MONDAY, January 6. Revelation iii.

1-6: It is not difficult to get a name for life, but too often the name which we win in earlier life ceases to be true of us; as the years pass, we continue to live on the credit of what we were once; and it is only gradually that those who know us best awake to the discovery that we are bankrupt. Notice the alteration in R.V. of the second verse. We have certain works set before us to do, but it is for us to fulfil the measure of our opportunity. All were not condemned with the failure of the church; even in Sardis there were some who had not stained their robes, and they were rewarded by having such guaranteed to them for ever.

7-13: To those who have but little strength, the Lord sets a wide door open. They might not be able to open the door, but they can enter it in his name. His beloved may be sore beset, but He will not hand them over to the will of their enemies. He will keep them, strengthless as they are, in the hour of trial; they shall not miss their crown, and they shall become permanent and important constituents in the Eternal Temple. It is marvellous how much Christ can make of our poor weak lives, if only we yield them to Him. It was said of a great statesman recently deceased, "He was a resounding example of what a great thing a great man may make of a life." But what a great thing Christ can make of a life!

14-22: Better be cold than lukewarm, for there is more hope for an unbeliever than a hypocrite. The mischief is that men don't know themselves, and don't want to know; and they are equally ignorant of the fulness and freeness of the provision stored for them in Christ. Wouldst thou know? Open thy door, and He will enter who is the joy of Heaven.

TUESDAY, January 7. Revelation iv.

As the epistles to the seven churches opened with an appropriate vision of the Lord Jesus, the Head of the Church, so the seven seals are introduced by the magnificent scenery of this and the following chapters. They are like the frontispiece or illuminated capital of the old missals. The scene is shifted from earth to heaven—that is the true vantage-ground for viewing the events of the time-sphere.

There is no form in the divine Being. God is a Spirit, and therefore only the appearance of his glory can be described; but earth and sea are ransacked for appropriate images. The jasper for its transparent brilliance, the sardine, or cornelian, for its fiery red, the emerald for its refreshing beauty—all are laid under contribution to describe what can never be described. The throne bespeaks his majestic authority and power; the worship of the elders, his supremacy over the house of Israel and the Church (xxi. 12, 14); the thunder, his awful holiness (Heb. xii. 18-20); the seven lamps of fire, the searching cleansing purity of his Holy Spirit, the glassy sea, the mystery of his ways, the four living creatures, the homage of all created beings.

There are two songs recited here, the one such as Isaiah heard (Isa. vi.); the other, the Hymn of Creation. Note the change in R.V. 11: "Because of thy will they were, and were created." Originally all things did the will of God, and if creation is now subject to vanity through the fall of Satan, some day it shall be delivered into the glorious liberty of the sons of God, and God's will shall be done on earth as it is done in heaven. Accustom yourself to begin your prayers with one of these hymns, or that which follows in the next chapter.

WEDNESDAY, January 8. Revelation v.

The successive steps to be taken in recovering the empire of the world, redeemed by Christ, but not yet won, are here compared to a sealed scroll, written on both sides to indicate its completeness. It contains the story of the Kingdom of God. The seals are opened, that the contents may be known; and as they are opened the events described take place. But the whole is in the hand of the Lamb. He alone can read the contents; He alone can make them known to man; He alone presides over their development. Will you not dare to trust Him with the history of his own blood-bought Church, and of your own life?

What contrasts presented themselves before the Apostle's rapt gaze! He looked for a Lion, and behold, a Lamb; for one who had overcome, and lo, one who bore the marks of having been slain; for one who had the majesty of the Ancestor of Kings, and instead the emblem of meekness and humility. And in that blessed Lamb (lit., little Lamb, the term of endearment) there were seven horns, the symbol of perfect power; seven eyes, of perfect wisdom; and seven spirits traversing the world—the signmanuals of Omnipotence, Omniscience, and Omnipresence.

Notice that the Lamb, as He receives the Book, is invested with his universal and everlasting dominion. Because of his obedience to death He is highly exalted, and has received a Name which is above every name. Never think of the throne without the Lamb, or of the Lamb apart from the throne, but always of the two as inseparably one. Oh, remember that sorrow, heart-travail, sacrifice to death, infinite pity and love, are enthroned for ever in the midst of heaven. Thou needst not be afraid! Is there aught in the Lamb to startle thee?

Listen to the song of redemption. It begins with a little group hard by the throne; it spreads to angels in their myriads; and, thence, it is borne forward until the utmost shores of space are struck by the strain, and reverberate it back to the living creatures and the elders.

THURSDAY, January 9. Revelation vi.

The seals indicate the general classes of events, which prepare the way for the coming of the kingdom. Each of the first four seals is ushered in by the call of a living creature to the glorified Lord, "Come" (R.V. 1, 3, 5, 7). Come, glorious Redeemer, and bring about that glorious consummation for which thy Bride is waiting.

The white horse is held to signify the progress of the Gospel; the red, bloodshed and war; the black, sadness and want; the pale (or livid) horse, pestilence. Compare with Matt. xxiv. 6-14; and Ezek. xiv. 21.

Thus, good and bad their several warnings give,
Of his approach, whom none can see and live,
Faith's ear, with awful still delight,
Counts them as minute-bells at night.

Side by side with the development of these events are the agonizing deaths of the martyrs of Jesus; and their souls lie under the altar, where of old the blood of the victims was poured (and the blood is the soul and life). One says: "The blood of the martyrs cries from the earth under Christ's cross, whereon they may be considered virtually to have been sacrificed; and their souls cry from under the altar of incense, which is Christ in heaven, by whom alone their prayers can be accepted before God." Their appeal is not answered at once, but they receive, meanwhile, the white robe which is the emblem of victory, light, and joy.

Verses 4, 6-8 answer to Matt. xxiv. 6, 7; verses 9, 10, answer to Matt. xxiv. 9, 10; 12-17 answer to Matt. xxiv. 29, 30. These may not refer to the final judgment so much as to those great revolutionary changes which always accompany the closing of one era and the opening of another (Heb. xii. 26, 27).

FRIDAY, January 10. Revelation vii.

The election of Israel (1-8). See Rom. xi. 5. God cannot do anything in the way of judgment till his people are secured from harm (Gen. xix. 22). As Israel was exempted from the plagues of Egypt, and especially the last, since the Israelite doors had the protecting seal of the blood, so shall many of the Jews be found at last exempted from the judgments that shall overwhelm the unbelieving, because they will be found sheltered in the work of Jesus, and sealed by the Holy Spirit (Ezekiel viii. 17, 18; ix. 1-7). In the enumeration Dan's name is omitted (Judges xviii.); so is Ephraim's, and Joseph's is substituted.

The palm-bearing Gentile multitude. The holy seer can think of no imagery so fit to set forth the joy of Heaven as that of the ancient Feast of Tabernacles (Zech. xiv. 16). Notice the joy of angels over these repentant ones, who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. The Lord told us of it (Luke xv. 10), and here are the sevenfold notes of their song, not only that so many have been saved, but that the sevenfold attributes of God have been so manifested in their salvation. "The" great tribulation, says the R.V., possibly that to which the martyrs had been exposed under the fifth seal, and which Christ foretold (Matt. xxiv. 21).

The Lamb becomes Shepherd (17). He who so perfectly bore and fulfilled his Father's will now becomes our Teacher and Helper, enabling us to follow his steps, and to attain to fountains of blessedness (Matt. v. 1-10).

SATURDAY, January 11. Revelation viii.

The seventh seal seems to include the seven trumpets. What a contrast that half-hour's silence must have been to the jubilant songs of the great multitude! It is a foretaste of the employments and enjoyments of the eternal Sabbath. In the Jewish temple we are told that musical instruments and singing resounded during the offering of the sacrifices, which were the first part of the service; but at the offering of the incense, a solemn silence was kept (Psa. lxii. 1). The people were praying quietly without at the hour of incense. What a vision is granted us of the intercession of our great High Priest. The smoke of the incense of his much merit arises with the prayers of the saints. Pray on, believer, though your voice is so feeble, and though so much imperfection mingles with your efforts to serve God, the incense of your Saviour's intercession is fragrant enough to make even you acceptable.

The first four trumpets include the devastation of natural objects. The dumb creation, and even the earth herself, suffer for man's sin. Think of the horses wounded in battle dying in their long agony; of vast tracts of country, once smiling with harvest, become a very wilderness; of the land compelled to bear opium, and the ingredients of the intoxicating cup, which drain her strength. Poor earth! Goethe said he heard her sighing as a captive!

A Message to Young Men.

By Rev. Dr. BALGARNIE.

THE New Year's religion, its business, its politics, its achievements in art, science, and literature, its moral impress for good or evil, are, under God, in your hands, to make or mar, build up or destroy. The old things are passing away, and a new order of things is beginning. What are you prepared to do?

You are better equipped in many respects for your life-mission than your fathers and grandfathers were. You are better educated. You have greater opportunities. You have a larger heritage of example. What then?

Consecrate your lives to Christ. He has redeemed them; He can regenerate them; He can ennoble them in influence and usefulness; He can crown them with glory at last. It is better to begin with Christ and, with his help and blessing, to seek the lawful objects of ambition, than, after having striven to attain these, to seek Him at the end. "Seek ye first the kingdom. . . . and all other things shall be added." To reverse the order of that injunction is to fail.

Take heed of the first call to duty. The successive stages of our life journey are curiously, mysteriously, and divinely related. One thing leads to another. "O brother, we must if possible. . . . exchange our dead hearts of stone for living hearts of flesh. Then shall we discern, not one thing, but, in clearer or dimmer sequence, a whole endless host of things that can be done. Do the first of these; do it; the second will already have become clearer, doabler; the second, third and three thousandth will then have begun to be possible for us."—T. Carlyle: Past and Present. "What shall I do, Lord? Arise and go into Damascus, and there it shall be told thee of all things which are appointed for thee to do" (Acts xxii. 10).

Finish the work that is given you to do. "It is finished." No need to explain or give the reference. They are the Gospel of the ages. It is finished work that lives, that teaches, that stimulates, that crowns. Unfinished education, unfinished apprenticeship, unfinished undertakings by statesmen, churchmen, or business men, lie at the root of a century's failures, both in private and public life.

> My days are in the yellow leaf;
> The flowers and the fruits of love are gone.
> The worm, the canker, and the grief
> Are mine alone!

So sang Lord Byron, conscious of failure.

I have fought a good fight; I have finished my course; I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness.

So sang the Apostle Paul, rejoicing that he was more than conqueror through Him that loved him.

Bishop Auckland.

The Late Mr. James N. Carr.

THE news of the death, on December 28, of Mr. James N. Carr, at the age of sixty-three, after a very short illness, leaves a wide circle of sorrowing friends. Mr. Carr was one of the well-known firm of biscuit makers, but he was equally, if not better, known, especially in the North of England and Scotland, as a fearless and zealous worker in the vineyard of his Lord. No village was too small to escape his attention, and no work too insignificant to obtain his help; yet few men could draw the crowds in the large towns that he did by his earnest and powerful speaking. For between thirty and forty years Mr. Carr has been in the front of the battle, and has helped the spread of the Gospel by his voice, his presence, and his purse, both in this country and foreign lands; and very many are left to testify to the good received through his clear, sound ministry. He leaves a widow and one son.

A Veteran's Call.

By Sir GEORGE WILLIAMS.*

MY brethren, I call upon you, in the name of my Master, to endure hardness, as good soldiers of Jesus Christ. Hardness is an essential quality of Christian life. All life is a conflict. Conflict is woven into the very texture of our national, intellectual, social, commercial, and religious life. Progress is only possible through struggle and persistent effort. This law is operative in the development of Christian character.

Growth and enlargement are the natural outcome of fulfilled conditions.

Truly life is a battle, and Christian character is only attainable through fierce conflict and continual struggle. Charles Kingsley, when he was dying, was heard to murmur: "No more fighting, no more fighting," the inferential conclusion of which is, that he regarded his whole Christian course as one series of stern battles.

THE TEST OF A GOOD SOLDIER.

So it is with every good soldier of Jesus Christ. And the fiercest conflicts are those which are fought out in the secret chambers of our own hearts. The foes against which we have to contend, and the sins to which we are most susceptible, are best known to ourselves. These must be conquered. Self-conquest is an absolute condition of effective Christian service. The man who has conquered himself is the man who can help others to win the victory. May God give unto us the power of self-mastery, that with clean hands and pure hearts we may be "vessels unto honour, sanctified, and meet for the Master's use."

But as workers for Christ we are called upon to endure hardness. We have to encounter opposition and discouragement. We are subjected to cynical sneers and ungenerous taunts. Our motives are misconstrued; we are misrepresented and misunderstood, even by those whom we seek to serve. My brethren, at such times, take heart; count it a privilege to be called upon thus to endure. Such endurance is a test of true discipleship, and persecution for righteousness' sake brings blessing to us, and honours the Master in whose service we are engaged.

We do well faithfully to ask ourselves the question—Are we thus enduring hardness for our Master's sake? Are we good soldiers of Jesus Christ?

The distinguishing characteristics of a good soldier are loyalty, vigilance, devotion, obedience, and self-sacrifice. Are these qualities discernible and exemplified in us?

Are we prepared for every call, to render any form of service, and to endure scorn, suffering, and even death itself, if called upon to do so?

Importance of Bible Study.

DEAR SIR,—For twenty-five years I have been a reader of your helpful weekly paper, and often have I longed and prayed that I might experience more of the "life more abundant" which Christ so desires to bestow on his obedient and trusting children, and yet I wondered why "the blessing" was delayed.

God has lately been showing me that I have not devoted sufficient time to the study of the Bible and to waiting on Him in prayer. As I read your number of December 12 (on page 29, middle column), the words "The royal road to blessing is found in diligent study of God's Word and definite believing prayer," the Spirit of God revealed to me my sin in disobeying his commands to "Search the Scriptures," and I was enabled at the throne of grace to promise Him that in future the Bible should have more of my time and the newspaper less. Since I made this solemn promise, God has been making my cup of blessing to overflow. I mention this in case others—from lack of Bible study and neglect in waiting sufficiently on God, or whatever other hindrance may have existed—may be willing to yield wholly to God on every point, so that He may fill us with "all the fulness of God." Trusting my experience may be helpful to such,

I remain, Dear Sir,
Yours faithfully,
"One Pressing on toward the Goal."

With Thee.

(John viii. 12; St. Luke xviii. 22).

Into the dark, Lord Jesus,
Into the dark with Thee;
There hath come to my heart a calling apart,
And a whispered, "Follow Me."

Take Thou my hand, Lord Jesus,
In thy mighty clasp divine;
Hold it so close, Lord Jesus,
That it tremble not in thine;
For my heart shrinks back from the unknown track,
And my feet tread falteringly;
And into the dark I follow—
Into the dark with Thee!

Into the dark I follow;
And what if I cannot see?
And what if the way be hidden?
There is nothing hid from Thee.
Wond'rous it seems, beyond my dreams,
That Thou should'st have need of me.
And strangely sweet, where thy pierced Feet
Have trodden before—to press;
And to hide at length in thy glorious strength,
My utterest helplessness.

Into the dark, Lord Jesus—
Is it the dark with Thee?
Nay, Thou makest the night about me light;
And mine eyes—mine eyes shall see—
Shall "see the King in his beauty,"
In the land that is far away;
Shall see in the heaven sunshine,
The path that is hid to-day.
Then why should I fear what the untried year
May bring to mine or me?
Into the dark I follow—
Nay, into the light, with Thee!

"Thy Help."

A NEW YEAR'S PRAYER.

O God, "the comfort of thy help"
We seek afresh to-day;
Alone we do not dare to face,
The dim untrodden way:
But we have proved thy power to aid,
Thy readiness to hear;
Oh, help us then to trust Thee more
Throughout the coming year.

Our Helper Thou hast ever been,
In trouble and distress,
Our Comforter in every grief,
Our Friend in loneliness.
Whene'er our hearts have turned to Thee
In weakness or in pain,
We have not failed to find Thee near,
Or trusted Thee in vain.

When heavy burdens sorely pressed,
Or sudden grief dismayed,
On Christ the mighty One we found
All needed "help was laid"—
To meet the daily, hourly strain,
To raise the heart above,
And shed upon life's darkest hours
The sunshine of thy love.

As Thou hast helped us hitherto,
Teach us henceforth to learn
In every joy, or grief, or care,
Thy purpose to discern;
Turning—not first to earthly friends,
But looking up to Thee;
Assured that Thou "a present Help"
In time of need wilt be.

And should some unexpected cloud,
Darken our path this year;
O may the "comfort of thy love"
Like rainbow bright appear—
Reminding of thy promise true,
Though floods of grief rise high;
They cannot overflow the heart,
That finds thy presence nigh.

Then keep our hearts "in perfect peace,"
Let them not be afraid,
E'en for the dear ones far away
Beyond our reach to aid;
In battle's din—'neath scorching sun,
Or tossed on ocean wave—
Whate'er their danger, "hear and help,"
And prove thy power to save.

And should thy coming or thy call,
Be drawing very near,
O help us in that solemn hour,
To trust and not to fear;
Assured that "none can pluck away"
One soul for whom Christ died,
Who simply trusts for life or death
In Jesus Crucified.

Greyfriars' Vicarage, Reading. L. S. Soole,

Sir Robert Anderson, K.C.B.

THE life of Sir Robert Anderson carries us back over a period of sixty years. His father, the late Mr. Matthew Anderson, was well known in public life as Crown Solicitor in Dublin, and was an elder in the principal Presbyterian congregation of the city. These religious influences under which the boy grew up, were not lessened by two sojourns as a child in France, of a year on each occasion.

When ready to leave school, a friend of his father's offered him a position in the office of one of the large Irish breweries; but after spending nearly two years at that business he left it to enter Trinity College, Dublin, where he graduated in 1862 with a moderatorship and medal. During the following session he was elected auditor (or president) of the famous College Historical Society, the sister association to the Oxford and Cambridge Unions. At the same time he was called to the Irish Bar, and continued the practice of the legal profession until the winter of 1867, when he was invited to London to assist the Government in matters relating to political crime.

For the past thirty-four years Sir Robert has lived in London, public recognition of his abilities and personal worth leading to his holding various public appointments. The last of these was that of Assistant Commissioner of Police and head of the Criminal Investigation Department, a position from which he has recently retired, being gazetted on the King's birthday to a Knight Commandership of the Bath, and receiving the insignia from his Majesty's hands on December 19.

It was during the Irish Revival of the early sixties that Sir Robert was definitely brought to God. During the years immediately preceding, world-wide attention had been attracted to the extraordinary spiritual movement in the province of Ulster, largely on account of the physical phenomena that marked its progress. The religious awakening in other parts of Ireland which followed that Revival was, however, free from these outward peculiarities. Its outstanding characteristic was the power of the Word of God manifested in the conversion of men. Without any of what are now considered the accessories of a Gospel meeting, the Word of God was simply expounded, and the Spirit of God so wrought in the hearts of the hearers that sinners were converted on every side.

Sir Robert Anderson was one of many who, having received the Gospel themselves, lost no time in becoming preachers of it; and there are still remaining very many, especially in the West of Ireland, who attribute their conversion to his work among them. Personally he has never been able to lead the singing in a meeting. When going about to strange places he never attempted to open the services in the customary manner, his habit being to stand up, without even preliminary prayer or choice of a text, open his Bible and preach from it, appealing to Scripture in confirmation of everything he said, and in this way putting the truth before the people. All who were engaged in that work bear the same testimony that the Word of God alone was the power of God unto salvation to those who believed.

The following hymn written by Sir Robert expresses his belief, and gives an insight into the secret of his life:—

Safe in Jehovah's keeping,
Led by his glorious arm,
God is Himself my refuge,
A present help from harm.
Fears may at times distress me,
Griefs may my soul annoy;
God is my strength and portion,
God my exceeding joy.
Safe in Jehovah's keeping,
Led by his glorious arm, &c.

Safe in Jehovah's keeping,
Safe in temptation's hour,
Safe in the midst of perils,
Kept by Almighty power.
Safe when the tempest rages,
Safe though the night be long;
E'en when my sky is darkest
God is my strength and song.
Safe in Jehovah's keeping,
Led by his glorious arm, &c.

Sure is Jehovah's promise,
Nought can my hope assail;
Here is my soul's sure anchor,
Entered within the veil.
Blest in his love eternal,
What can I want beside?
Safe through the blood that cleanseth,
Safe in the Christ that died.
Safe in Jehovah's keeping,
Led by his glorious arm, &c.

SIR ROBERT ANDERSON, K.C.B.

From Photograph by Messrs. Elliott and Fry, 55, Baker Street, London, W.

While throughout his career the subject of our sketch has been the trusted guide and counsellor of many in the midst of religious and spiritual difficulties, he has been above all a clear and helpful expositor of Scripture truth. The following extracts are from the chapter on "Reconciliation" in his book, The Gospel and its Ministry (2s. 6d. Nisbet):—

Reconciliation is a step beyond redemption even in its fulness as including both righteousness and holiness. Reconciliation is the fulfilment of the purpose of redemption. It is a most superficial thought, from which a right sense of what God is, or even of what we are, would save us, that forensic or even moral fitness for the presence of God gives any title to approach Him. The cross of Christ has obtained redemption for us, but more than this, it has made peace. We are not only justified and sanctified, but, as a fuller and further blessing, "we are made nigh by the blood of Christ, for He is our peace" (Eph. ii. 13). Not that we would tolerate the thought, more false and evil still, that God required a victim in whose blood his wrath might quench itself. The cross was the work of Christ, but it was a work for God. God is Himself the Peacemaker. It is not that Christ has reconciled us to God, but that God has reconciled us to Himself. And God has done this, and we have now access to it, and stand in it. I insist on this, because there is scarcely any truth so little known. It is not only that we are pardoned, and justified, and sanctified, and have life in the Son of God, and in Him are become children of God. All this was true of saints before the cross, and it is not in virtue of all or any of these blessings that we can come near to God, for, if it were, there would have been access, then, as now. But not even the elders of Israel could come nigh to Him; not even Aaron, until as High Priest he gained a typical position, in virtue of which he, too, could approach as Moses did (Ex. xxiv. 1, 2). . . .

Not only has the ministry of reconciliation an aspect towards the believer, and here it is too much neglected, but it is also the very essence of the Gospel. Mark the words, "We were reconciled by the death of his Son." Righteousness is not spoken of thus. Justification is an act of God's grace towards the sinner who believes. Reconciliation is a work accomplished on the Cross of Christ. It is a work done on Calvary for God and to God, apart from its consequences to the sinner altogether, and the believer has access thereto by faith through Christ, as now risen from the dead. "We were reconciled through his death;" but here is a further and higher blessing, "Through Him we have now received the reconciliation." Righteousness is now the rock beneath our feet. The cloudless sky above is peace. Glory no longer threatens wrath, but fills the sinner's breast with hope. And thus the purpose of creation is accomplished through redemption, God can rejoice in the creature of his hand, and the creature can rejoice in his God.

And let us not fritter away the truth by supposing this reconciliation to mean a change in the sinner's heart to God. That is not reconciliation, but the present work of the Holy Spirit. The change is in the attitude of God to men. Sin not only turned the creature's face from heaven, but made the sinner the enemy of God. That there is enmity to God in the sinner's breast is but too true, but it is not the truth here spoken of. It is impossible that God can be indifferent to his creature; He must be either for him or against him; He must regard him either with a smile or with a frown; and sin draws down a frown, and not a smile. Apart from the work of Christ, He cannot but be against the sinner; He reckons him an enemy. But "when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son" (Rom. v. 10). "God was reconciling the world to Himself in Christ" (2 Cor. v. 19). It is not a present work, but a work past and finished. By that death we who were enemies were reconciled. The appeal of the Gospel is now that men would receive the reconciliation. "Be reconciled to God" (2 Cor. v. 20), is not an entreaty to the sinner to forgive his God, but an appeal to him to come within the reconciliation God has wrought.

Among other valuable works by the same author are, "The Coming Prince, or the Seventy Weeks of Daniel"; "Human Destiny," a handbook of the eschatological controversy; "The Silence of God"; "The Buddha of Christendom"; and a series of articles on "Crime," in the Nineteenth Century (February, July, December, 1901).

Bible and Prayer Union.—In reply to numerous inquiries, we would repeat our intimation that Mrs. Richardson continues the work of her late husband as conductor of the Bible and Prayer Union. Members should apply to her for cards and "Monthly Notes"—address, "Mrs. A. S. Richardson, Office of Bible and Prayer Union, St. Benet's, Mile End Road, London, E." Should it be found necessary to change the address, due intimation will will be given in the "Monthly Notes."

The Women's Protestant Union, which has just completed its tenth year of work, has during that time gathered into its ranks over 15,000 members and associate-members (men). In addition to these, nearly 2,000 members of its Girls' Protestant Union Boys' Protestant Union, and senior and junior "Ready Bands" have been enrolled. The object and basis of the Union are essentially spiritual, and its Council seeks to foster amongst the members an earnest spirit of prayer. The continued increase of members, and the expansion of the Union's work have led the Council to take additional office accommodation at Exeter Hall, and to make this the only official address of the Union. The president, Mrs. Arbuthnot, will frequently be in attendance. Copies of the annual report may be obtained on sending a stamped and addressed envelope to the secretary, Mr. G. W. L. Barraclough, W.P.U., Exeter Hall, Strand, W.C.

From Trieste to Bombay.

By THE EDITOR.

LEAVING Trieste for Bombay, we had a pleasant passage by the Austrian Lloyd's steamer, Imperator. We did not find the Red Sea so terrible as it had been described to us, and as it often is. A head wind made the second half comparatively cool. Still, most of the passengers had their beds carried up on deck, where they enjoyed the air, which sometimes rose to a pretty stiff breeze.

It was refreshing to find at Aden holding on its way. It is carried on by the United Free Church of Scotland. The devoted founder, the late Hon. Ion Keith Falconer, lies in the cemetery between the harbour and the crater; and his works do follow him. "He being dead yet speaketh." We found a Christian soldier, Private Scudder, at the reading-room of the Mission, bravely holding the fort nearly alone, so far as the soldiers are concerned. Dr. Young, who is the medical missioner, lives at the principal station, eight miles away. He was expected at a meeting in the evening.

THE ION KEITH FALCONER MISSION

At the crater, five miles in the opposite direction, another soldier, Private Macdonald, had his sleeves tucked up, literally and spiritually, and with a few helpers was fighting the Lord's battle. Colonel Harrison genially counsels the workers and directs the work. We were accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Potter, two of the fifteen missionaries who were our fellow-passengers. The soldiers very kindly provided tea for us, and then we had a half-hour of Bible-reading and prayer. It was cheering to us, and I think the dear young fellows rejoiced for the consolation. Both the soldiers named are members of the Soldiers' Christian Association.

The West Kents have been at this barren and uninteresting station for two years, and seem getting weary of the isolation. We all felt the dreariness of the place, and yet it has left one of the pleasantest recollections of the voyage.

Bombay.

Our first impressions of Bombay were very mixed. It is difficult to disentangle them, and set them down in cold print. Here, as everywhere in a new and strange land, one feels a stranger and a pilgrim. The world in its many forms presses upon the spirit. The universal idolatry of the god of this world, which exists everywhere, puts on new guises and disguises, and the heart is oppressed with the mystery of God-lessness.

The answer given to the question, "Why did Jesus Christ come into the world?" would be, in nine cases out of ten, in the words of the Apostle, "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." But there are other reasons. Another Apostle says, "For this cause the Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil." Nor does this exhaust the mission of God's sent One. The deepest desire and purpose of his soul from eternity, was expressed in the prayer, often uttered in divers forms: "Father, glorify thy Name." "Father, the hour is come, glorify thy Son, that thy Son also may glorify Thee." "Now is the Son of Man glorified, and God is glorified in Him." "I have glorified Thee on the earth. I have finished the work which Thou gavest Me to do."

The outer wheel of the Great Purpose is that God may be glorified. The second is that the devil and his works may be destroyed. The third, that sinners may be saved. It has seemed to me that all these must be kept in mind, in order to a true perception of what we see and hear.

We recognise with thankfulness the acknowledgment, speaking generally, of the good government of India. The praises of Lord Curzon are heard on all hands, and the hope is expressed that, if a second term of his Viceroyalty is not possible, at least another year may be added to the present one.

CHRISTIAN WORK—AND OTHER!

Christian work and testimony are largely, though not sufficiently, represented in Bombay. An active evangelistic brother assured me that 200 more workers from England might be easily placed and usefully employed. Whether the means for their support could be expected to be supplied, may be a question. Our American brethren are prominent here, as in other parts of India and of the world. It will be interesting to observe to what extent they evolve new ideas and new methods of work.

It is cheering, in view of the criticisms of some who never met with a native convert, to quote the testimony of the Indian Spectator, one of the leading native journals:—"We absolutely subscribe to Lord Lawrence's opinion, that, notwithstanding all that the English people have done to benefit India, the missionaries have done more than all other agencies combined."

Not because it is peculiar to Bombay more than many another city, but because the sight afflicted me, and its memory abides with me by day and night, I ask the forbearance and sympathy of my readers in that which follows.

A FEARFUL TRADE.

In my last I mentioned the white slave traffic in girls carried on in Central and Southern Europe. After the preaching in Grant Road M.E. Chapel, Bombay, one Sunday evening I passed, with two brethren, up and down a road in which the "unfortunates" are chiefly concentrated. Every house was lighted up, and from every door and window, and sometimes from victorias driving up and down, came gesticulations and invitations. Some were from our own countrywomen and other Europeans; but the greater number were Japanese. Our first impression was that all these poor creatures were utterly degraded and demoralized, and perhaps they were. But I remembered that they are prisoners and slaves. They have been imported as merchandise; they are in the power of their cruel taskmasters, who require not only that they shall carry on their soul and body destroying trade, but that they shall steal from their visitors. Their owners, I am told, come round in the small hours of the morning and collect their gains, and if they are not satisfied they beat their victims unmercifully.

In a doorway, tier above tier, as though they were standing on a staircase, were about a score of children, apparently from ten or twelve to sixteen. Here and there were groups of sailors or soldiers, in twos and threes or more, as well as other men of all sorts and conditions.

The boast that no one can continue to be a slave beneath the British flag, is not true so long as such a traffic exists. It was asked, could not a girl who wanted to get away appeal to the people in the road, and claim their protection? No; she and her sympathizers would be surrounded and mobbed by those interested. The native police are notoriously bribed; nothing but legislative interference of a very determined kind could be of any avail. While the above was being written, I received a letter from a friend in an Australian mining locality, which painfully shows that the hideous traffic extends to the Antipodes.

As regards morality on the fields, it is in a sad state, though we hope it will in time be greatly improved through the force of public opinion, as in some other mining towns, but it will take time. There is a terrible trade in young Japanese girls done here, and I often pity them. I pass their so-called "shops" daily, and see the poor things sitting in the windows, always sewing, or busy at something, and I have heard that they are mostly under severe taskmasters, who treat them cruelly, if they do not bring in enough money by their shameful trade. From the Continent of Europe is also supplied a hapless contingent.

There is no sin more deeply rooted in fallen human nature than that adverted to, and the difficulties of dealing with it are enormous. But it must be possible, by international co-operation, to make the traffic—the entrapping and kidnapping, the buying and selling of girls—a criminal offence, to be so severely punished as to amount to a prohibition. The soldiers and sailors in hospitals are another urgent argument for governmental interference of an international kind.

INDUSTRIAL MISSIONS.

I am much interested in the Industrial Missions Aid Society, connected with which my friend Mr H. W. Fry is busying himself. Many are perceiving the possibilities of this movement. One of the C.M.S. missionaries writes to Mr. Fry:—

We shall be very glad to show you what we are doing in the drawn thread work. Your Society has already kindly helped us by taking our work for sale. I, as well as other missionaries, cannot be too thankful for the timely and valuable help it is giving. The Society has, I believe, a very useful future before it.

A first factory has been established at Ahmednagar, and this small beginning will doubtless grow to large proportions in due time.

SOME NOTABLE STATISTICS.

At a Missionary Conference in Bombay, at which the delegates to the Convention of the Christian Endeavour Societies of All India were chiefly represented, Dr. Wyckoff, of Arcot, gave the following encouraging statistics, gathered from the last Census Returns, March, 1901:—

In South India there are 609,000 Protestant native Christians, 300,000 Syrian Christians, 1,138,732 Roman Catholics. But confining ourselves to Protestants—the number has doubled in twenty years, and more than quadrupled in forty years.

Of every 1,000 males in the Madras Presidency twenty-six are Christians, but of every 1,000 males who can read and write, forty-five are Christians. Among Christians, one in fifteen knows English; among Hindus one in 132; among Mohammedans one in 157. But the remarkable pre-eminence of Christians is especially seen in female education. Taking an average of 10,000 women in each community, the number who can read and write is—Hindus seventy, Mohammedans eighty-six, Christians 913.

For every female who can read and write among Hindus and Mohammedans, there are sixteen males; among Christians only two—i.e., half as many women as men can read and write. In the Madras Presidency altogether there are 20,314 women who can read and write English. Of these the Jains supply one, Mohammedans seventy-seven, Hindus 1,717, Christian 18,442. There are 418 Indian Christians, graduates of Madras University.

The only two Indian ladies who have taken the M.A. degree are Christians.

There are more than 100 Indian Christian graduates, 250 F.A. (First in Arts), and 650 matriculates. Thus, in all, 1,000 graduates and under-graduates are engaged as workers with the various missionary societies.

Dr. Wyckoff bore emphatic testimony to the good relations between the missions of different denominations. There may be here and there more of an exclusive spirit, but the rule is harmony and mutual courtesy. Dr. Boggs, of the American Baptist Mission at Telugu, spoke to me of British Societies in terms of very high appreciation. In some cases the railways grant free passes to missionaries. The famines, terrible as they have been, have given an opportunity to missionaries to prove their quality. It would be impossible to speak too highly of their untiring self-devotion. Thirteen of them in the Bombay Presidency lost their lives last year through cholera or overstrain in famine work—one-fifth of the whole number.

In one case, Hindus and Mohammedans having complained that the missionaries only wanted to get the children to make Christians of them, the Government put 5,000 at their disposal. They responded by taking charge of fifteen of their co-religionists. The rest were of necessity handed over to the missionaries. The attitude of the Government, and, indeed, of the public generally, at least from the humanitarian point of view, is cordial and appreciative. The Kaiser-i-Hind medal was given, in recognition of splendid personal service, to some missionaries, who must be regarded as representative of all.

A Blessing to Our Seamen.

AN important development in the history of the Seamen's Mission in the East End was marked by the laying, a few days ago, of the memorial stones of the new Victoria Seamen's Rest. Mr. JOHN H. LILE presided on the occasion, and, on behalf of the workers, warmly greeted the Lord Mayor, Lady Mayoress, and Sheriffs. The account given by Rev. DAVID ROE (superintendent and secretary, 18, Stainsby Road, Poplar, E.) showed that the Mission was opened in 1843, and has run an honourable course ever since, seeking to help—socially, morally, and spiritually—seamen of all denominations and all nationalities; "to do everything in our power to help poor Jack when ashore." The buildings occupy an excellent site adjoining the entrance to the Board of Trade offices, East India Dock Road, where seamen receive their wages and "sign on" when going to sea.

Sitting-rooms will be provided for the use of the men according to rank, cubicles for any desiring sleeping accommodation, a coffee palace, reading-rooms, &c. Suitable provision will be made for mission workers, and ultimately it is intended to form a "settlement" for young men, many of whom have expressed willingness to go into residence, and to take part in the work. The committee of the "Dreadnought Free Dispensary for Seamen" has arranged to rent a portion of the Institute, on account of which thousands of seafaring men may be expected to visit the premises every year, and in this way afford an opportunity for bringing them under the influence of the Gospel.

A NEW DEPARTURE.

A part of the scheme which has aroused much interest and attention is the erection, for the first time in connection with any seamen's mission, of fourteen suites of model dwellings, for the accommodation of the wives and families of sailors. These will be let, and the rents will form a substantial source of income towards the cost of the whole upkeep.

One marked feature of the proceedings of the day was the repeated expression of thankfulness for the harmony which has hitherto existed, with a desire for yet greater unity in the working of all the mission agencies for the benefit of seamen in London.

Speaking also as treasurer of the British and Foreign Sailors' Society, the Lord Mayor (Sir JOSEPH DIMSDALE, M.P.) expressed in cordial terms the pleasure it gave him to show his interest in such an effort. Although a strong supporter of the Church of England, he found a great hope for the future in the growth of such unsectarian agencies, and he could imagine no better work than this. After the laying of the first stone, the Lady Mayoress received from those present a considerable number of purses containing offerings for the building fund. The total cost of the "Rest" is estimated at £14,000, of which £7,500 still remained to be raised.

Following the Lord Mayor, eight additional stones were laid by Mr. Alderman Agar (York), Mr. E. T. Wilkes, Mrs. David Roe, Mr. James Botteley (Birmingham), Mrs. Charles Penny (Willesden), Mr. George Lidgett, Mr. Josiah Gunton and Mr. T. C. Garland.

Among others who took part in the proceedings were Rev. J. Scott Lidgett, Mr. Deputy Parnwell, Mr. Sidney Buxton, M.P., Rev. Dr. H. J. Pope, Mr. J. G. Harding, Mr. Allen Rees, Mr. W. H. Godfrey Deacon, Mr. B. Johnson, and Rev. E. W. Matthews (British and Foreign Sailors' Society).

CARING FOR THE SAILOR'S WIFE.

A stirring address was given by Mr. FRANK T. BULLEN, who was overwhelmed by the old memories connected with the locality in which they were met. He rejoiced especially that the old "Magnet" public house had now given place to a centre of Christian usefulness where workers would seek the sailor's soul rather than his money. "If this had been a popular thing, we should have had ten times as much money as we wanted, but nothing you do for sailors is popular. We all love Jack, but we do not pay; though the sailor is the man on whom we are all dependent to-day." Mr. Bullen was especially gratified at the idea of the provision of model dwellings. "It is well that we look after the sailor, but it is right also that we should look after the sailor's wife."

Among French in Soho.

AMONG the many efforts made to bring the Gospel to the strangers within our gates the "Mission Française Evangélique," carried on by Mr. Théophile Oriol and his helpers, is worthy of notice. Mr. Oriol is a young Frenchman who was brought to the Saviour in connection with the work of Pasteur Saillens in Paris, and, having proved himself called of God to preach the Gospel, is now studying in the Pastors' College. On coming to London he associated himself with some earnest, like-minded Frenchmen, who were seeking to bring their countrymen to the Saviour. When Mr. Bignonneau, some time head of the Mission, moved to another sphere of labour, Mr. Oriol became his successor, and is now the esteemed leader.

The Sunday evening services are held in a comfortable little hall, No. 10, Carlisle Street, Soho. In the early evening an open-air meeting is held in some part of Soho, when a goodly number of French people gather round, attracted by the fact that the singing and speaking are in French. The meeting held in the hall is well attended, and there are constant tokens of the Divine presence and power. A bright, interesting service we found it on a recent Sunday evening, with hearty French singing, and earnest French speaking. Taking as his subject 2 Tim. i. 10, Mr. Oriol spoke powerfully of the "life eternal." He is really an able speaker, all alive to his finger-tips with French enthusiasm and spiritual fervour. A visitor followed with a short address, and mentioned that it was over thirty years since he trusted the Saviour. Mr. Oriol then invited other testimonies. One brother said it was forty-two years since his conversion. An elderly woman said she was brought to the Lord the previous Sunday evening. Conversions, we learn, are frequent. God is blessing the work.

Mr. Oriol and his friends are worthy of support. In order that English Christians may feel assured that the Mission is a bonâ fide one, Dr. McCaig, principal of the Pastors' College, has accepted the position of hon. superintendent and treasurer. He may be addressed, Pastors' College, Temple Street, Newington, S.E.

Notes from Cardiff.

THE weekly evangelistic services established about eighteen months ago at the Jews' Home, Moira Terrace, Cardiff, have been well sustained. Ministers and laymen co-operate in this much-needed mission work. The Home was established solely by the generosity of the Messrs. John and Richard Cory, in the first instance for the lodging of poor Jews passing through Cardiff. Eventually the doors were opened to sailors and others out of employment. On Friday, December 13, Rev. John Morris (Star Street Congregational Church) delivered a telling Gospel address, which was listened to with marked attention by men of various nationalities. A good company of women also joined in the service—these come in regularly to the meetings from the adjoining house (which is known as the Women's Christian Home) for poor widows and others. The service, which was impressive throughout, was interspersed with Gospel hymns, sung by members of the Plasnewydd Choir.

To the devout mind earnestly praying "Thy kingdom come" it was an impressive sight on Sunday evening, December 15, at the Park Hall to see close upon 2,000 people attentively and reverently listening to the "Story of the Redemption," accompanied by limelight views given by the popular townsman, Mr. J. Glenelg Grant, retired merchant and philanthropist, hon. superintendent of the John Cory Sailors' Rest. The beautiful story was impressively rendered almost entirely in the words of Holy Writ. Mr. Grant's lantern services help to solve the question of reaching the masses with the story of Jesus and his love.

National Mission to Children.

AFTER the Simultaneous Mission held last spring, the desire was expressed in many quarters that an effort should be made on a similarly extensive scale for the benefit of children. A very hearty response was received to a circular of inquiry sent out by the Sunday School Union, and arrangements are now in a forward state for the holding of a National Mission for Scholars and Young People during the months of January, February, and March, as may be found most convenient in the various districts of the country. A strong central committee has been formed on a broad basis, including representatives of all the Evangelical denominations, as well as from several institutions having aims similar to those of the Union.

The object primarily in view is the pressing of the Gospel home to the scholars in Sunday-schools and other young people connected with the respective congregations and districts, so that they may be brought to definite decision on the great vital question. It is hoped that Sunday-school unions and kindred organizations throughout the country will form united committees, that the Mission may be carried through in a manner best adapted to local circumstances and needs.

In a message addressed to the young men and women of the churches and Sunday-schools, Rev. Dr. W. J. Townsend says:—

This will be the most definite effort to secure the young for Christ which has been made in the history of the world, and must have the most important results. If it is responded to, as generally as we hope, it will be an upward movement for the nation and the Church of the most helpful kind.

Therefore we appeal to you to give your aid to the movement in every way open to you, and to cast your influence on its side to the utmost, that it may be an abundantly fruitful effort. Think about it, talk about it, keep clear of all engagements that will prevent your attendance at the services, or working for their success. Above all, examine your spiritual state before God, prove your own selves.

BLESSING ON PERSONAL WORK.

Addressing himself to the teachers and workers on "Winning our Scholars for Christ," Mr. F. F. Belsey (chairman of the council of the Sunday School Union) reminds them that while 600,000 such labourers are engaged week by week in the instruction of some 7,000,000 of young people and children, "hundreds of thousands of these pass out of our schools without any earnest personal appeal to decide for Christ having been individually addressed to them." After calling attention to abundant evidence of the rich blessing of the Holy Spirit resting on "such appeals from the lips or pen of the loving faithful Christian teacher," and pressing the importance of the present opportunity for bringing the teaching of past years to fruition, Mr. Belsey adds:—

Even in the absence of special services may I urge upon you to seek, by individual intercession for your scholars, by writing a letter to each, or by speaking a word of appeal, to win them one by one to become avowed disciples of our Lord and Saviour?

The utmost importance is rightly attached to the surrounding of the work on every hand by much individual and united prayer. The spirit of intercession and supplication has been widely aroused. Many are already crying out to God, and the yearning desire of the promoters of the movement is that their number may be increased till the whole Church is gathered together in spirit waiting continually upon God for an outpouring of blessing on the rising generation.

Y.W.C.A.—The Hastings and St. Leonards Y.W.C.A. Home for young women (servants and others) is a convenient and well-conducted establishment where the physical and spiritual needs of many young persons have been ministered to. A correspondent writes:—"Beds stand empty in the winter months which would soon be filled if this quiet little home were better known, particularly as our superintendent is often able to secure comfortable situations for young women needing sea air or a warmer climate. Communications may be addressed to the Hon. Secretary, 32, Park Road, Bohemia Road, St. Leonards-on-Sea.

Young People.

All communications referring to this department must be addressed to Uncle Tom, Office of The Christian, 12 Paternoster Buildings, E.C.

I recommend my Elder "Young People" to read every week what Mr. Meyer writes on the Christian Endeavour Topic. Parents will also find in the S.S. Lesson Notes suggestive and helpful thoughts and illustrations for Sunday talks with their young folk. See next page.

An Open Door.

"Behold I have set before you an open door" (Rev. iii. 8).

BUT we do not always like open doors, do we? Especially in this cold weather! An open door lets in the draught, and we prefer to have it closed so that we may gather round the fire and keep warm. And sometimes we ask brother or sister to "shut the door" in a tone that is less patient than it ought to be. But suppose the door were always shut, how stuffy and unhealthy the room would become after awhile; and by-and-bye germs of disease would be found, and we should learn that if we had to choose between the two, it would be wiser and better to have the door always open rather than always shut.

There are great advantages about an open door. For one thing you can go in and out, whereas if it were always shut you would have to remain always either inside or outside, and I do not think you would like that any more than I did when I was a little boy.

Now Jesus says (John x. 9), "I am the door; by Me, if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out, and find pasture." There we have Salvation and Freedom.

Now if we come to Jesus and trust Him for salvation, we shall find that this New Year will be like a door opening into a palace of 365 chambers, or days, in each of which we may ramble and find something to make us better boys and girls. God does not want our religion to tie our hands and feet so that we cannot enjoy life, but He wants us to walk in his presence and rejoice in his love all through the year.

Then, too, God would teach us by the open door a lesson of usefulness. The year is an open door of opportunities of doing good and being good—and you know we must be good before we can really do good. I once heard of a lad who used to steal money from his parents, and gave parts of it to a poor crippled crossing-sweeper. Yet God was not pleased with the good that he did because of the bad boy that he was. But if he, or you, or I, give ourselves to Jesus, who is also our Good Shepherd, who gave his life for us, his sheep, then we shall be able to enter our open doors of usefulness so as to please and glorify God.

Then the open door means health and strength. We said just now that in a room always shut up there would be germs of disease, but open doors and windows let in fresh air and health. I expect you have heard of what is called "open-air treatment," by which consumptive people are cured by living in fresh air, because that kills the germs of the disease; whereas the old system of keeping the patients in a closed room only made them worse, until they died. So God wants us to be healthy to resist evil, and strong to do what is right. So you see the open door teaches how we may have Salvation, Freedom, Usefulness, Health and Strength. Let us ask God that this New Year may bring us each of these, and of all the New Year's gifts we have had they will be the most precious; and that we may enter into the blessings revealed to us by every open door that He shall put before us.

Uncle Tom.

Christ's Knight.

Who kneels before the King
  In true surrender,
May lift his loyal head
  A brave defender.
A "Touch" is on his brow,—
  And on his heart.
"Arise, my knight," Christ says,
  "And do thy part."

* ..... be glad!

Christ calls to thee;
Kneel thou before the King,
  Young, strong, and free.
Christ knights his noblemen
  Through all the ages;
Go forth to serve Him well
  Where battle rages.

A Brother's Charge.

ONE day a little boy asked his mother to let him lead his little sister out on the green grass. She had just begun to walk alone, and could not step over anything that lay in the way. His mother told him he might lead out the little girl, but charged him not to let her fall. I found them at play, very happy, in the field.

I said, "You seem very happy, George. Is this your sister?" "Yes, sir." "Can she walk alone?" "Yes, sir, on smooth ground."

"And how did she get over those stones which lie between us and the house?"

"Oh, sir, mother told me to be careful that she did not fall, and so I put my hands under her arms, and lifted her up when she came to a stone, so that she need not hit her little foot against it."

"That is right, George; and I want to tell you one thing. You see now how to understand the beautiful text, 'He shall give his angels charge concerning thee; and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone.' God charges his angels to lead and lift his people over difficulties, just as you have lifted little Annie over these stones. Do you understand it now?" "Oh yes, sir; and I never shall forget it while I live."

Can one child thus take care of another, and cannot God take care of those who trust Him? Surely He can. There is not a child who may read this story over whom He is not ready to give his angels charge. —Selected.

"The Christian" Bible Searcher.

NEW TERM.—Rules for Bible Searchers.

Answers to the "Bible Searcher" are acknowledged in two lists:—

(1) Those received up to Monday morning, in the next Thursday's issue.

(2) Those received later, in the one following. Answers for the "second list" which reach the office after midday Wednesday are too late. Those from Scotland and Ireland only will be received till Thursday morning.

No Concordance may be used or help given with the answers, but the questions may be explained when necessary.

No papers can be re-examined.

It is necessary that letters should be properly stamped, and that names should be written very distinctly. A star (*) is given for neatness and extra care in answering the questions.

All communications must be addressed to "Uncle Tom," the Young People's Editor of "The Christian," 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C.

☞ PRIZE COMPETITIONS—NEW RULES.

Please note that in future there will be Three Prize Competitions instead of four in the year, namely, at the end of April, August and December.

There will thus be sixteen weekly Searchers before next Competition, for which those will be eligible whose names appear as correct in the weekly list twelve times between Jan. 2 and April 24.

Those whose 10th or 13th birthdays occur during this period may continue the weekly Searcher in the same division, but must enter for the Prize Competition for their actual age. There is no limit of age for weekly Searchers; but no one above eighteen years of age can enter for the Competitions.

NEW TERM.
THIS WEEK'S BIBLE SEARCHER (No. 311).*
Bible Clock.

Make a circle to represent a clock; mark off the hours from one to twelve, and taking the word FAITH for one o'clock, find texts in which this word occurs, having two, three, four, to twelve words to represent the hours. Chapter and verse must also be given.

(Children under ten, do any 4; under thirteen, any 7; under seventeen, any 10.)

* This is not to be done by those answering the Prize Questions set last week.

PRAYER MEETING TOPIC.

FIRST THINGS FIRST (Matt. vi. 24-34).

BEFORE the days of Kepler, who may be called the father of modern astronomy, the ancients had curious expedients for determining the motions of the stars. The grouping in the forms of animals was one, and the system of cycles and epicycles another. The need for these elaborate systems was largely due to their taking the earth, instead of the sun, to be the true centre of the system of worlds around us. Modern students of the skies regard, not the earth, but the sun as the true centre, and suppose that there is a central sun somewhere around which all other suns sweep—each with its attendant train of worlds. Once get the right centre, and there is no difficulty left. Each world and comet slides naturally into its right place.

So our Lord says, put God, the coming of his kingdom, and the obtaining of his righteousness in the centre, as the first thought and object of your life, and everything else will adjust itself—"all these things shall be added unto you."

It is a solemn question for us all, "Is God really first in my life? When a new crisis comes on me, is my first thought the inquiry what He would wish?" I never shall forget an incident in my early life, which shows that in my boyhood at least God was first. I was staying with a beloved relative for the Christmas holidays, and one morning she took me up into my bedroom and told me that she had that morning had a letter from home to say that my father had suddenly lost all his money. She then left me, and I remember that I at once knelt down and gave myself afresh to God, and asked Him to provide for me. And I believe that the mercy and goodness which have been added to me since have been in direct fulfilment of that moment of faith. "All these things" have certainly been added to me.

Here is the great difference which separates the children of God and the children of the world. The former put "first things first." The others recognise the worth and use of religion, but deliberately put it second, whilst their own will of choice and self-gratification are their first consideration.

If you live for yourself, always asking what shall I eat or drink, and how shall I be clothed, and always looking after Number One, you will find that your soul will be faced with inexplicable problems, and your path piled up with difficulties. You will be incessantly engaged in hustling others that you may get a better position, and wrestling with them for a few handfuls more of yellow dust. You may make a success of your life, as the world calls it, but you will not help people to be happier and better; you will be served for wages, not for love; when you die you will not be missed; a few lines of obituary will tell the brief story of your career, and your name will be written in the dust. The story of Dives, with his intolerable thirst is the unveiling of the destiny of such in the world beyond.

But if you make God first, all will be well; He will see to all that concerns the life which He has inbreathed, and the body which He has created. Whatever is absolutely necessary He will supply. He will not serve you so badly as to make you capable of infinite need, without putting the supply of those needs within your reach. Do you require food for the body, love for the heart, thought for the mind, provision for old age? Do not seek after these things as the main end and object of life, but seek to please God. Let there be no rivalry ever between God and self, as if they were masters of co-ordinate authority, Let there be only one Master—Jesus Christ.

Then do not be anxious. It is right to take forethought, to sow for the harvest, to store for the winter, to make just and due provision; but don't worry, don't fret, don't be anxious. Do your best to-day, and leave your Father to care for to-morrow. On one occasion Queen Elizabeth said to one of her statesmen, as she sent him to the Netherlands, "If you look after my business, I will look after yours." So God says to us. F. B. M.

The North-Eastern Hospital for Children (Hackney Road, Bethnal Green) is now being enlarged to meet the pressure due to the fact of its being the only institution of its special kind in a vast area of London, comprising over half a million inhabitants. Last year 828 children were treated in the fifty-seven beds at present available, while 18,264 received attention in the out-patient department, the latter making 62,931 attendances. A large number of these out-patient cases are in urgent need of treatment in the wards, but at present no room can be found for them. New premises in Hackney Road are now in course of erection. The total cost of the building, when fully equipped, will be about £30,000. The committee have at present £13,000 available for building purposes.

International S.S. Lesson.

Sunday, January 12, 1902.

THE PROMISE OF POWER FULFILLED (Acts ii. 1-21).

GOLDEN TEXT: Acts ii. 39.

THE Feast of Pentecost, the second of the three great yearly feasts, was observed as the festival of thanksgiving for harvest, and fell on the fiftieth day after the Passover-Sabbath; hence its name—Pentecost (Acts ii. 1), or in the Old Testament, the "feast of weeks" (Deut. xvi. 9, 10, 11; Ex. xxiii. 14, 16).

At this feast Jerusalem was very thickly crowded with pilgrim Jews from other lands, therefore the news of the remarkable occurrence which followed would become widely spread in the most effectual manner by them. The gift of tongues met their special needs.

The Lord had appeared to his disciples many times during the forty days which had elapsed between his resurrection and ascension; now more than a week had passed, and the little company were still waiting in the upper room—in Unity—"With one accord" (Acts ii. 1).

Faith—They believed Jesus' word (Luke xxiv. 49).

Obedience—They tarried at Jerusalem (Luke xxiv. 49).

Prayerfulness—They continued in prayer and supplication (Acts i. 14).

Patience—Till the day of Pentecost was "fully come" (Acts ii. 1).

On the fiftieth day, ten days after the ascension, "the Promise of the Father" was fulfilled, and John Baptist's prophecy (Matt. iii. 11), the Holy Spirit descended with the sound of wind; and the appearance of fire, both striking images of the nature and operation of the Holy Ghost, and frequently used as symbols in the Scriptures (Ezek. xxxvii. 9: John iii. 8).

The Holy Ghost symbolized by wind:—

1. In his secret coming.
2. In his powerful shaking.
3. In his purifying blowing.
4. In his refreshing power.

The Holy Ghost symbolized by fire:—

1. In his bright shining.
2. In his purifying power.
3. In his destructive burning.
4. In his rapid spreading.

Verse 2. The sound filled the house—not the wind.

Verse 3. "Tongues as of fire parting asunder," i.e., "distributing themselves" (R.V. marg.).

Verse 4. They heard (v. 2), then they saw (v. 3), and now they feel within themselves this Holy Mystery. Their whole being is possessed by a new power, which fills them, and impels them along a course they do not themselves determine. They uttered thoughts and words not their own, but "as the Spirit gave them utterance"—and some in language they had never heard. "All filled," no one was left empty—women as well as men.

The sound of the mighty blast had gone, and the appearance as of tongues of fire had disappeared, but the effect remained with the disciples who had been filled with the Holy Spirit.

The multitudes were variously affected. All were amazed; some were confounded, some inquired, some doubted, and some mocked (because it was no more possible for the disciples to get drunk on new wine—which was the juice freshly squeezed from the grape—than for us to get drunk on lemonade).

Peter (Acts ii. 15)—what a marvellous change the Holy Spirit had wrought on him, who a few weeks ago hod spoken so impatiently and wickodly to the maid-servant (Luke xxii. 57). The Spirit of God will teach us also; the Holy Spirit's work on the souls of men and women is secret in working, but public in its manifestation.

God's promised gifts—his Son to save; his Spirit to sanctify.

Who may have them?

Whosoever (John iii. 16). "Ye . . . that ask Him" Luke xi. 13).

Portsmouth and Gosport Seamen's Mission.—In connection with the Lads' Institute of the Portsmouth and Gosport Seamen's Mission much blessing has recently been experienced. The Institute is free to all sailors. Beds are provided for their use, and different educational classes have been formed for their benefit. Mrs. S. A. Cook (47, Stoke Road, Gosport), writes:—"A few nights ago, a young sailor lad came in, and by talking to him we soon discovered that he was a true Christian. It was interesting and encouraging to hear him relate that he had been brought to the Saviour nearly four years ago in this Institute, and during his three and a-half years' commission his Saviour had been very precious to him. Our need is very great, our funds at present being entirely exhausted. Tools are required for the carpentry class and the requisites for the ambulance class. Good literature will be most acceptable."

Scottish Notes.

AT the celebration in Dundee recently, of the semi-jubilee of his Bible class for young men, Mr. William Stewart told an interesting story of progress in the work of the Lord. Finding in 1876, in connection with the Sabbath-school in which he was engaged, that there were a number of lads who considered themselves too old to attend, he gathered twenty one of them into a Bible-class. The meetings have been continuous since then. The pressure of numbers necessitated removal again and again to larger premises. In September, 1897, the class was transferred to the Y.M.C.A., and amalgamated with a similar class which had been started by Mr. J. H. Smith six months after Mr. Stewart made his beginning.

Impressed with the value of a decided stand as a class on the temperance question, a total abstinence pledge book was introduced on May 4, 1899, with the result that there now appeared on its pages the signatures of 1,313 young men. It was believed that more than 3,000 members had passed through the class altogether, and probably 5,000 or 6,000 had been reached by the class. There were on the roll now the names of 808 young men. Some of these had been members for twenty years, others for fifteen years, and quite a number for eight to twelve years.

Speaking at the annual meeting of the Religious Tract and Book Society of Scotland, Rev. George Douglas stated that they had 160 colporteurs carrying books from door to door and acting as cottage visitors. Colportage was not an expensive agency. £35 or £40 of local subscriptions being sufficient to maintain a man. Sir Mark J. M. Stewart, M.P. (chairman), emphasized the harm and mischief done by pernicious literature. A tainted book poisoned the minds of the young, and instead of bringing a blessing to the household brought a curse. Among others who took part in the meeting were Rev. W. M. Macgregor, Rev. Dr. Alexander Mair (Edinburgh), Rev. Dr. J. Alexander Anderson (West Calder), and Dr. Somerville (Galashiels).

The jubilee of the Scottish Coast Mission was celebrated in Edinburgh recently, Rev. Dr. Mitchell (South Leith) presiding. In several of the districts, the report said, the work was greatly hindered for want of suitable halls or institutes in which sailors could worship. The work of the year was summarized thus:—Meetings for adults, in Bethels and mission halls, 1,186; meetings in the open air, 327; meetings on shipboard, 126; meetings for the young, 486; visits to ships, 7,798; visits on shore, 23,520; Scriptures sold, at reduced rates, chiefly to foreign seamen, 249; Testaments and Gospels given away, 333; book-bags placed on board vessels, home and foreign, 211; books and magazines given to sailors and fishermen, 34,869; tracts distributed in twelve languages, 85,123. The financial statement showed that the receipts for the year amounted to £1,318 12s. 6d., and the expenditure to £1,288 4s. 1½d., leaving a balance of £30 8s. 4½d.

The new issue of "The Increase" shows that the Stirling Tract enterprise has seen another year of wide usefulness. Respecting work in country districts we quote the following: "In the small towns and villages scattered over our land the need for evangelistic agencies is as crying as ever. The ground is often very stony in a spiritual sense, and those who carry on mission work in country districts are convinced that our tracts are means of grace to not a few who have lapsed into utter indifference as to religious matters. Testimony to that effect is not wanting. At special seasons, when numbers are brought together for labour, for instance in the hop-yards, the Lord's servants find our publications 'a great boon' to them in visiting among the labourers. These become themselves distributors by taking away to their own homes the leaflets and other evangelistic literature given them, where these Gospel messages go on to reach other hearts and consciences."

The annual business meeting of the Carrubber's Close Mission, Edinburgh, was a largely attended gathering, presided over by Professor A. R. Simpson, who referred to the wide ramifications of the work carried on by the Mission all over the city, and in many parts of the land, stating that one of the features of the work done was its far-reaching character. Mr. William Robertson (secretary) submitted the report, which bore out fully the remarks of the chairman. Mr. Thomas Ormiston (treasurer) showed that income amounted to £574 11s. 1d., while the expenditure during the same period had been £547 3s. 4d., leaving a credit balance of £27 7s. 9d., notwithstanding the heavy charge made by the Parish Council, for the first time in the history of the Mission. Mr. G. A. Barclay reported on the Gospel Temperance department. Rev. Dinsdale Young, Mr. John Robertson, Mus.Bac. Cantab., and Mr. Donald Kay were added to the list of previously-existing directors. An address was given by the Rev. James Rutherford.

The Late Mrs. Meredith.

THE news that Mrs. Susanna Meredith was called to her rest and reward on December 18 has called forth sympathy and interest from a wide circle of Christian workers. With her it is far better; but many a woman who has been met with loving hand on coming out of prison and helped into a better life is now mourning the loss of her best friend on earth. Born in Ireland in 1823, this "friend of female prisoners" appears to have imbibed the spirit of true Christian philanthropy in the days of her childhood. Brought up among those whose hearts were stirred by the sufferings and trials of female prisoners, her earliest recollections were of visits to prison-yards and Bible readings in prison cells. The sympathies thus created by the hard, degraded faces of the women grew with her girlhood, and on arriving at womanhood she was filled with an intense yearning to do something more for the betterment of these unhappy outcasts of society. A happy married life being suddenly cut short by the early death of her husband—William Lambert Meredith, F.R.C.S., of Queenstown—she determined to devote her energies to endeavours on behalf of the criminals of her sex.

About the same time another beneficent woman, Mary Carpenter, was enlisting interest in the condition of prisons by drawing attention to the state of Wandsworth Prison, where women sentenced to penal servitude for periods of three years and upwards were incarcerated. Mrs. Meredith readily made common cause, and delivered an earnest and practical speech at the Social Science Congress of 1860, on the state of affairs among English prisoners. Pursuing her labours, she at last obtained permission from the director-general of the English convict prisons to visit the inmates; and every facility was afforded her to help them on their discharge.

PIONEERING AND ORGANIZING.

Every morning, for some years, she might have been seen going from her home in Bayswater to visit and comfort those in whom she was so deeply interested. Soon two houses adjoining her own were rented and opened as a refuge for any who were willing to accept help on being released. So many came that the authorities objected to such an invasion of a respectable neighbourhood. Premises south of the Thames were secured, and Nine Elms House was opened—with the formal sanction of the Home Office—as "The Discharged Prisoners' Aid," in connection with Her Majesty's convict prisons. As help was required, other ladies joined in the effort, the first volunteer being Miss Lloyd, Mrs. Meredith's own sister.

Believing that sloth is the mother of crime, Mrs. Meredith steadily sought to wean the women from their evil ways by inculcating industrious habits. She formed district working classes for those who had spent short terms in prison; next she opened the steam laundry, which gave honest, wholesome, and profitable labour to as many as fifty-six women a day. Others were encouraged to learn needlework, consisting of hassocks, kneelers, bedroom slippers, and ordinary plain work.

Year by year the work developed till, to the Laundry and Prison Gate Mission, there had been added the Princess Mary Village Homes, with the Correctional School for Girls, the Women's Missionary Institute, the Women's Medical Mission for Women and Children, the Conference Hall, Clapham Road—well known to many of our readers as a centre of spiritual activity, and where for many years an annual Conference for the study of Prophetic Scripture has been held—and the Women's Educational Union. Mrs. Meredith also inaugurated the Christian Women's Union. At the Addlestone Children's Village Homes many of the children of convicts—often left to the care of friends or relatives whose influence was anything but wholesome, or in not a few cases wholly unprovided for—have been saved for time and eternity.

The various agencies will be carried on by Miss Lloyd and other ladies who have been long engaged in the work. From various causes funds have fallen off during the last few years, but the need is as great as ever. It will be a great loss to the management to be deprived of Mrs. Meredith's presence and counsel, and it is of great importance that they should not be burdened with additional anxiety of a financial character. It is highly desirable that at this crisis in the history of the work, the existing liabilities should be cleared off.

Only those who have laboured and lived in the slums, only those who have moved through life in the midst of suffering helplessness, and fought the well-nigh hopeless fight with disease, degradation, and sin, can form an adequate conception of such a work as that which has been done by Mrs. Meredith and her co-workers, who in rescuing the perishing have proved again and again that love is stronger than sin, and that the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ is sufficient for the worst of humanity.

Week of Prayer.—Jan. 6-11.

CHRISTIANS in all parts of the world will unite to observe January 6-11 as days for prayer. In the words of the invitation issued by the Evangelical Alliance: "Amidst many changes there is no cessation of sin and human need, nor of error, woe, and suffering. The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. As in the world so in the churches error abounds. The material is exalted above the spiritual, and tradition overrides the authority of Holy Scripture. All these things call on us for confession and intercession, in dependence on the Holy Spirit to teach us, and in firm reliance on the intercession of our ascended and mediating Saviour." Meetings for prayer will therefore be held in many churches and halls.

The Central gatherings in London will be held at Exeter Hall from 1 to 2 p.m. daily. Among other centres, morning and evening meetings have been arranged for Mildmay Conference Hall, at 11 and 7.30 daily, and at Powis Hall (in connection with Talbot Tabernacle), Talbot Road, W., each evening at 8. At the Bayswater Reformed Evangelical French Church meetings (in English) will be held each morning at 11.30.

Christmas at the Strangers' Rest.

AS in former years, our sailors filled the "Rest," Ratcliff Highway, to its utmost capacity on Christmas Day and Boxing Day, and showed by word and deed how greatly they appreciated the gatherings.

On Christmas Day we entertained some 300 men to tea. At the close of the evening meetings we all gathered together in the large room, where a Christmas tree had been decorated, and each man was presented with a suitable gift of woollens.

Boxing Day saw us again busy, for once more the "Rest" was filled with men of all nations, who heartily enjoyed a roast beef and plum pudding supper.

The meetings on both days were held afternoon and evening, in English and Scandinavian, and were marked by the quiet, earnest spirit with which the men listened to the Gospel message; several professed conversion, and many were deeply touched. We ask prayer that these men, in whom the Spirit of God was evidently working, may be led to a definite decision for Christ.

In thanking the many friends who generously helped, it may be well again to remind them that this work is now separate from that at Zanzibar. Communications may be addressed to Mr. Milton Horner, Firlands, Reigate, and gifts in kind sent to Dr. A. Neatby, 163, Rt. George's Street, E. A. W. S.

Sailors' Welcome Home.—Miss Child writes from the "Welcome Home," Canning Town, E.:—"Great was the delight of the many hundreds of sailors who were present at the 'unloading of the Christmas Boat.' Mrs. Watts, our constant friend, was 'head stevedore,' and several ladies who had had a good share in providing the 'cargo' helped in distributing the gifts. Colonel Macgregor and Colonel Bentinck spoke with earnestness to the men, and Messrs. William Luff and Muston also took part." Miss Child wishes to thank the many friends who sent gifts and helped to make the occasion so encouraging.

The Darkest England Scheme.

UNDER the title of "Friends of the Poor," Mr. Bramwell Booth has issued a review of the social work of the Salvation Army in the United Kingdom during the past year.

The pamphlet opens with an introductory note by General Booth, who claims that the work is being done both effectually and economically. A well-deserved recognition of the labours of the Army officers is given by Mr. Bramwell Booth, who says:—

"The Salvation Army and its officers never appear more closely allied with all that is most attractive in the Divine Master than when we view them as the friends of the poor. There is something in their methods and spirit very much akin to the friendship of Jesus for the poor of his time. Proclaiming a high standard of religious life, and setting before all alike the truth, they nevertheless act upon the principle that 'half a loaf is better than no bread,' and that even if they do not succeed in winning all whom they influence to the service of God, it is still a high and holy duty to go to them, to befriend them, to minister to their wants, to set before them a better life, and in every possible way to manifest the spirit of their Saviour and King."

After a description of the London slum post work, Mr. Booth refers to the Prison Gate Brigade, and gives some interesting particulars of the career of the late Colonel James Barker, the pioneer of the Army's work among ex-criminals, who died a few months ago:—

"Called, during his officership in Australia, to the duty of ministering to a murderer in his last hours, and being deeply moved by the unfortunate man's dark career of crime now closed on the gallows, he knelt down by his body and promised God to do what he could for criminals as a class. He kept his vow. He probably visited more prisons for the purpose of aiding prisoners than any other man of his generation, and, humble and untrained as he was, accomplished something very considerable in obtaining more sympathetic treatment for them not only in the Colonies and in this country, but abroad. He was carried to the grave, at his own request, by men who had passed through our Homes in London and had been restored to decent society."

The statistics incorporated in the pamphlet show that 397 persons have entered the ex-Criminals' Homes during this year. A quotation is given from the late Sir Walter Besant, referring to this side of the work: "Mostly, the prisoners try first their own friends. When they realize the fact that friends will have nothing to do with them, and that no one will employ a man just out of prison, they are disposed to try the Prison Gate Home. This Home is managed on exactly the same lines as the rest of the work. It is assumed tacitly that, just as a boy at school receives a caning by which he expiates his offence, and goes back to the other boys with a clear character, so the man who has 'done time' has atoned for his offence. He begins again. In the Home he will meet with no reproaches; he will be met half-way in every step towards honesty: without feeling it or suspecting it, he will be subject to an unceasing superintendence."

The most recent development of the Social Work operations is the work amongst inebriates. A summary of work in other departments of the social branch shows that nearly 3,000,000 meals were supplied at the Cheap Food Depôts; that employment, either temporary or permanent, was found for more than 10,000 persons; that 1,200 lost persons were found and restored to their friends; and that out of 2,223 women and girls who were received into the Rescue Homes, no fewer than 1,864 were sent to situations or restored to their relatives.

In an appeal for £30,000, which he needs for the maintenance of the work during the coming year, General Booth says—"£100 entrusted to us enables us to maintain, in conditions favourable to their reformation, fifty persons for six months, because we make them work for the required balance of their cost."

The report may be obtained from the Secretary, 101, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.

Evangelistic.

Mr. Henry Thorne at Harpenden.

ALL the Nonconformist churches in Harpenden, and a few members of the Established Church, joined in an invitation to Mr. HENRY THORNE to conduct a Gospel mission. He responded favourably, and has just concluded a ten days' mission there. Notwithstanding that the weather has been, on the whole, most unfavourable, the results have been good. Christians have been stirred up, and many persons have been brought to decision for Christ.

HENRY J. HAFFER, Congregational Minister.

Mr. C. E. Barraclough at Chathill.

An encouraging mission was held by Mr. C. E. BARRACLOUGH at Chathill, Northumberland, December 8-18. In spite of the stormy weather, which in a scattered country district is especially unfavourable to such gatherings, the meetings were well attended. During the closing days a number of young people decided for Christ, and many whose zeal had grown cold were stirred up to renewed interest in the Master's cause. Mr. Barraclough addressed the children attending the Sunday school on both Sundays, and a Bible reading was given in the reading room. Great regret was felt when the mission was closed, as the work seemed just beginning. L. B. C.

Mr. William Hill in Port Glasgow.

A fruitful joint mission of the five United Free Churches in Port Glasgow was brought to a close on Friday, December 20. The meetings were held in the Newark and Princes Street churches (a week at each place), and the daily Bible readings were given in Hamilton Hall. The evangelist was Mr. WILLIAM HILL. He has travelled widely in Africa and India, and incidents drawn from his observation and experience gave interest and freshness to his message. All classes came to the meetings. The churches were filled on the Sabbath evenings, and on the other days the attendance was good. The theme of the evangelist was, of course, the old Gospel, but it was addressed with a directness to the conscience, and with an earnestness, eloquence, and faithfulness which were very marked. Many people, seemingly, were savingly impressed. Night after night souls professed to have undergone the great change. B.

Mr. W. D. Dunn at Thurso.

On Sunday, December 15, Mr. W. D. DUNN closed a fortnight's mission with the Y.M.C.A. in the Town Hall, Thurso. From the beginning there was an evident spirit of hearing, and notwithstanding the very boisterous weather the meetings grew in attendance and interest, culminating in a crowded and fruitful gathering on the closing Sabbath. Mr. Dunn's faithful, heart-searching preaching, and his tender entreaty to respond to the Gospel call, found an answer in many hearts. The ministers in town gave the mission their hearty support, and are assisting the young men to carry them on. During his stay Mr. Dunn spoke twice at Scrabster, and there the interest awakened is so great that the people urged that the meetings should be continued nightly, and this is being done. We are rejoicing over many who testify to having accepted Jesus Christ, and that many of his people have been quickened and encouraged. To our Lord be the glory! C.

Mrs. Baeyertz at Portsmouth.

A worker at Miss Robinson's Soldiers' Home, Portsmouth, writes of the mission conducted there by Mrs. BAEYERTZ:—"The sixteen days' mission so long looked forward to and made the subject of our prayers is over. We shall always thank God for Mrs. Baeyertz's visit and the times of refreshing we enjoyed. Each afternoon and evening numbers gathered, listening with the deepest attention to the Bible readings and Gospel addresses. It was most encouraging to hear the atonement so clearly, forcibly, and simply proclaimed. The interest shown by the soldiers was very marked; over sixty were personally dealt with, besides a larger number of civilians. Mrs. Baeyertz gives us solid food; the truth is so deeply impressed upon her own mind that she gives it out of a full heart; thus it cannot fail to carry weight and conviction. It is indeed no wonder that many say the Bible is a new book to them, and expressions of regret that the mission is over are heard on all sides."

Mr. Henry Collins at Feltham.

The mission recently conducted at the Congregational Church, Feltham, by Mr. HENRY COLLINS, of the Evangelization Society, brought blessing to many hearers. The evangelist's messages of help and comfort for the believer and of earnest entreaty and solemn warning for the unsaved. A number of persons were dealt with in the inquiry-rooms, and of these it is believed that many have truly passed from death unto life. "We rejoice, too," writes the esteemed correspondent who forwards these particulars, "over backsliders restored and over young lives consecrated to God. Bible readings were given which were seasons of blessing, and two meetings were held for men only on Sunday afternoons. There were also services for children and young people on the last Monday afternoon, when the Wesleyan and Primitive Methodists' schools joined with us. At the praise meeting many testified to blessing received during the mission, and it was cheering to note that among these were Christian workers who had been brought to the Lord Jesus Christ during Mr. Collins' previous mission here, two years ago."

Mr. W. R. Lane at Stowmarket.

In the mission conducted by Mr. W. R. LANE at Stowmarket, December 8-16, all the Free Churches of the town and the village stations in the district united. The services were held in the Congregational Church, which is capable of accommodating from 1,100 to 1,200 people. The effort was organized with the threefold object of persuading those who are almost, but not altogether, Christians to cross the line that separates the one state from the other, rousing the many who regularly attend our places of worship on Sunday, but who are, in reality, in a state of deep indifference to their soul's welfare, and reaching those who rarely, if ever, enter any of our places of worship.

Mr. Lane's addresses, and his conduct of the mission as a whole, were admirably adapted to reach these objects. His shrewd common-sense, his direct appeals to the conscience, and his affectionate pleading with the unsaved in the after meeting produced a deep impression. During the week many gave in their names as wishful to become sincere followers of the Lord Jesus Christ. Among them were several young men, as well as men of maturer years; husbands, and fathers of families. Besides these there is a rich harvest of blessed results already appearing which cannot be tabulated. The feeling in all the churches of the town is one of intense joy and gratitude to God for the manifestation of his saving power in the services of the missioner. T. S.

The Glasgow Noonday Meeting.

One of the fruits of Mr. D. L. Moody's visit to Glasgow over twenty-seven years ago is the noon prayer meeting, first held in church premises in Wellington Street, afterwards in the Christian Institute, and now carried on in the Bible Training Institute, Bothwell Street. Though subject to fluctuating interest in the intervening years, it has gone on without a break since its inception in the early part of 1874.

An exceptionally interesting and well-attended meeting was held on Christmas Day, extending to an hour and forty minutes. The arrangements for it had been entrusted to Mr. ROBERT LOGAN, superintendent of the Tent Hall, who brought his gifts of organization to bear on it, with the result that the lecture hall of the Institute was nearly filled. Regrettably, for a long time, the meeting has been more or less in a somewhat moribund condition, and it gave the place a truly "Merry Christmas" look to see such a large company assembled.

"The Superlative Excellencies of the Gift of God," was the subject set down for consideration, and Rev. Mr. MCKENZIE, Alexandra Parade U.F. Church, gave the first address, taking as his text the words—"Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift." Other speakers followed, and a short open time allotted for testimony was fully made use of. Many felt it to be a season of great refreshing.

It has been arranged that Mr. W. M. Oatts, formerly general secretary of the Glasgow Y.M.C.A., will take charge of the noon meeting every day throughout the month of January, and an increased interest in it is earnestly hoped for. J. C.

Metropolitan Theatre, W.

We are now in the third month of our twenty-seventh year of these services, and are cheered by the continual blessing seen in the crowded meetings. On the opening night, all who confessed Christ as their Lord were young men. This led us to make a special effort to reach the young men in the large houses of business, which was also owned to the conversion of many; and one especially. Here is his own confession: "Thanks for your note and books, which I have read with great interest and profit, especially the one entitled, 'Faith or Feeling,' which has enabled me to see the simplicity of the Gospel. Now I can say with a true heart, and firm belief, that Christ is my Saviour."

That same evening, a young groom who had been blessed the previous Sunday night, brought his brother, who trusted Christ as his Lord, and who in his turn the following Sunday brought another young man, who was also impressed, and who is now witnessing for Christ. These three young men have all recently come to London.

We do not cater for the people who attend the places of worship—though occasionally one or two such drop in—but the bright character of the service, the splendid singing of a trained band of converted and devoted workers, and the solos by Madame Annie Ryall, bring in the people, attracting the careless and indifferent in their thousands.

One of the most interesting cases is that of an upper servant in a large house in the West End. A ticket announcing the services had been taken from the letter box by the butler and given to her. She came, bringing with her a friend. The subject was, "The Forgiveness of Sins." They stayed to the after-meeting, and were spoken to as anxious souls, and written to.

In answering a letter she said:—"I have always been in the habit of confessing my sins to a priest of our church, and believed my sins were forgiven when I was absolved, coming away in peace, but since Sunday evening I have been shown my mistake; and the Word of God to which you led me has enabled me to seek forgiveness at the hands of the Lord Jesus, for 'who can forgive sins but God alone?' I have no need to go to any priest now."

Our prayer meetings at Hyde Park Hall are still largely attended. A week or so ago a husband and wife whom I had induced to attend, at the close of the meeting fell on their knees, when both gave thanks to God and confessed Christ together, and then rose and embraced each other. They are now desirous of joining our band of workers. Two little boys recently told how with the greatest difficulty they got into the theatre, only in time to hear the address—as children are not admitted alone—but they somehow avoided the steward, and were spoken to by a converted boy, who gave me their names so that I might write them. Their simple testimony was most encouraging. We desire to render thanks unto God. It is hoped to continue these services right through the winter. CHAS. COOK.

Mr. WILLIAM FORBES began his yearly visits to provincial cities by holding a tea meeting on Christmas Day at Sheffield, for the young women engaged in the local pantomimes. Mr. Forbes delivered an address, and Christmas cards were given to the guests.

The mission services at Horeb Baptist Church, Nantymoel, Glam., recently conducted by Rev. A. T. JONES, of Duckpool Road Church, Newport, Mon., will long be remembered. On the Sunday afternoon a good number of inquirers sought the way of life, and were followed at the evening meeting by more than a score of others. The pastor, Rev. T. D. Matthias, took part in the mission.

Despite snow and wind, the people came in good numbers to the mission conducted by Mr. CHARLES NOAKES, of the Evangelization Society, at the Wesleyan Church, Hayfield. The mission, which lasted for fifteen days, concluded on Sunday, December 23, when Mr. Noakes preached from Rev. xx. 11, 12. A deep impression was made and a number of young men and women entered the inquiry room. The results are very encouraging, and the converts are being gathered into classes.

C. R.

Mr. WILLIAM MCEWAN, having been led to dedicate his voice to the Lord's service, has been singing the Gospel in Belfast for the past six weeks in the missions held in Mountpottinger by Pastor George Harper (of Bellshill, Glasgow) and Mr. Hugh Morris (of Largs). Both the missioners highly valued Mr. McEwan's labours, which were used to impress the unconverted with a sense of spiritual need. In some instances his songs led souls to decision. Prior to his conversion Mr. McEwan was engaged in operatic singing in America. PASTOR BURT SHARP.

Irish Notes.

At length several of the Roman Catholic bishops and priests are opening their eyes to the sad havoc wrought by drink, and are beginning to denounce the public-house system. For instance, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Galway has been speaking very strongly against the action of magistrates in granting new licences in his diocese, and has been saying that in Galway they have 138 licensed houses, or one for every 100 of the population, counting even women and children.

On returning from his Sunday evening service lately, Rev. J. Dryden Smylie, rector of St. Luke's, Dublin, was assailed by a shower of stones and other missiles, one of these striking him in the face. The police arrested some of the offenders, who were punished for the assault. It is very unusual for ministers of any denomination to be annoyed in Ireland, but for some time in Dublin girls and boys have been accustomed to mock ministers and call them names as they pass along the streets. This, however, is one of the first occasions in which a minister has been actually molested.

Welsh Notes.

THE Free Church Federation movement is making good progress in the Principality. As evidence of this it may be stated that the formation of no less than five new councils was reported in one week.

It is to be hoped that the movement will bring into closer sympathy the various bodies of Free Churchmen in Wales, and that, instead of warring with one another they will unite their forces against the common foe.

The late Rev. T. Jerman Jones was one of the greatest missionaries of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Church. The sphere of his labours was the Khassia Hills, Assam. Latest advices from India show that it is the intention of some of the native churches to commemorate his life and labours by the erection of a monument.

The Year-Book of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists shows that in the United States the connexion possesses 178 churches, with a membership of 19,593. The number of Sunday-school scholars is 12,258. Several of the churches must be without pastoral oversight, as there are only eighty-nine ministers and eleven preachers to minister to them.

A proposal is on foot to erect a memorial chapel at Mydrym, Carmarthenshire, to Rev. Stephen Hughes. This distinguished reformer lived over 200 years ago, and was for years a clergyman. On account of his principles he was expelled, and became the founder of Welsh Nonconformity in the counties of Carmarthen, Pembroke, and Cardigan.

The allocation of the Twentieth Century Fund of the Welsh Baptists has already been decided upon. Of the £50,000 which they hope to raise £12,000 will be devoted to furthering ministerial education; £11,000 is to be set apart for home mission purposes, and £6,000 towards the ministry of the weaker churches. The sum of £7,000 is to be devoted to the building fund of the denomination. Other smaller sums will be set apart for various purposes.

Some idea of the work done by the Welsh Forward Movement may be gathered from the fact that it has provided in Cardiff alone, during the past ten years, no less than 8,000 sittings. In Newport the number of sittings provided amounts to 4,000. There is urgent need for further extension, especially in the latter town. It is stated on good authority that there are at least two districts in Newport without any religious provision, except such as is made by ritualistic churches.

The question of the efficiency of the Sunday-school is the subject of considerable discussion at present in Wales. In order to obtain information on this point, the North Wales Free Church Federation has just sent out a circular letter in which the following questions are asked: (1) What are your grounds for feeling that good work is being done by your school? (2) What are your chief difficulties and discouragements - as to teachers, scholars, accommodation, and the lessons chosen, &c.? (3) What can you suggest for the improvement of our Sunday-school work?

Major Howard, ex-governor of the Cardiff Gaol, speaking at a Temperance meeting in Cardiff, made several practical suggestions in the direction of temperance reform. Amongst these were the reduction of licences, the improvement of temperance hotels, harder and longer sentences (both for drunken criminal acts and for simple drunkenness), the practice by judges of their frequent declaration that drink is no palliation of a crime, police supervision of clubs, provision of more inebriates' homes, with more rigid discipline therein, and the deportment of habitual drunkards right away from old influences, if possible, out of the country.

The Christian.

☞ To avoid delay it is requested that all letters relating to business matters should be addressed to the firm. Messrs. Morgan and Scott, and not to its individual members. Letters of a personal nature should in every case be so marked.

Communications for The Christian should be addressed to the Editor, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C. All Advertisements should be sent to Messrs. John Haddon and Co., Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

☞ The Publishers request that all orders for The Christian by post, and remittances for same, be addressed to "The Christian" Postal Department, Bouverie House, Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

Cheques and Post Orders to be made payable to Messrs. John Haddon and Co. at that address. (For Subscription rates, see Page 1 of Cover.) Postcard or stamped envelope should be enclosed if receipt is desired.

Notes & Comments

The Church and the Children. In view of the approaching Mission to Young People, we propose to begin in our next issue a series of articles on "The Church and the Children." Several well-known writers will contribute their views on Class, Individual and Mission Effort among the Young.

The New Session of Parliament. Next week Parliament reassembles after its long vacation, and it is likely that its deliberations will be more decisive for the immediate future of the nation than any session held for a very long time. There is a general feeling that the critical moment has arrived. It is quite clear that there is a growing disposition on the part of the great majority of the Opposition to sink all party differences, and to unite with the Government in seeking a speedy termination of the present war. This is certainly the first question to be settled, for while the continuance of the terrible struggle drains us, great and pressing home reforms are impossible. In the present crisis there is the deepest need for the prayer appointed in the Prayer Book, "That thou wouldst be pleased to direct and prosper all their consultations to the advancement of thy glory, the good of thy Church . . . that peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety may be established among us."

England's Place in the World. It is not conceit that causes the best of Englishmen to regard the Anglo-Saxon race as specially blessed and fitted of God to lead the nations of the world in all that pertains to righteousness and true religion. The hard facts of history warrant the assumption. But it is conceit, and worse, that leads a people to believe that they can trifle with their privileges, and yet be entitled to lead others. The spirit of the average man in the street is not, unfortunately, a modest one. He has caught too well the jingo tone of the music-halls; and the offensive "let 'em all come"—heard everywhere—represents a bragging mind which is often blind to national perils. Many ominous notes have lately been sounded concerning the instability of our commerce and the new conditions of foreign competition. The report of the U.S. Consul at Liverpool to his Government concerning our trade is worthy of serious study. When we fully discount all the extravagances of pessimists, there is still very much left that should make every patriot consider most gravely the immediate prospects of our country. We cannot hold our own—to say nothing of leading others—by shouting.

Moral Perils of Our Land. Many persons are guilty of conduct most callous, with regard to the moral perils which assail our land! The cry of Cain is still immensely popular: "Am I my brother's keeper?" If the need of solicitous responsibility for our brother's weal could only seize the hearts and consciences of all who profess to have had a vision of a higher life, many personal indulgences which are now permitted would be renounced, and the selfishness which is such a hindrance to aggressive service would be replaced by self-denial for Christ's sake. The Scripture has much to say concerning love to man as a test of the reality of our love to God. And love always seeks the weal of its object.

Defending our Soldiers. The veteran friend of the soldier, Mrs. Josephine Butler, has written to us on a subject which is pressing itself urgently on the attention of thoughtful people, namely, the growing animosity to Britain on the Continent, largely arising from the broadcast circulation of calumnies regarding the conduct of the troops in South Africa. The testimony on behalf of the British forces which we published a few weeks ago from Mr. and Mrs. Osborn Howe is confirmed from many quarters. Official denial to the charges has been given by Lord Roberts and other officers. A deep wrong is being done to the men in the field, and mourners at home have had a great bitterness added to their sorrow. For their sakes, and for the sake of the peace of Europe, which is becoming seriously imperilled, the matter should be ventilated in the Press, and in private individual conversation.

Our Duty to Africa. The British Government has actively encouraged the education and religion of Mohammedans in the Soudan; and, under its auspices, a very large sum of money was raised for this purpose through the efforts of Lord Kitchener when he was the Sirdar. But meanwhile, Great Britain has effectively discouraged, if not positively forbidden, Christian missions in the Soudan. In a letter in The Times, Mr. William Tallack has made a respectful protest against the course adopted. We understand that two of the great missionary Societies of the Anglican Church have already approached the Government on the subject. And it is very desirable that other missionary bodies and churches should exert their influence decidedly, in a similar direction.

Labour unto the Locust. It is gratifying to find the administration, which, unhappily, has appeared to be somewhat apathetic in regard to matters deeply affecting the welfare of our home population, at length doing something in regard to the evils of the sweating system. Even although the Home Office action may have been caused by the prevailing epidemic, the result of adding tailoring and fur-picking, and some other occupations to those in which it is compulsory upon factory owners and employers to keep for inspection a list of outworkers, must have a beneficial effect. It will, of course, enable the Inspectors to visit these people at their "homes," and to call attention not only to the wretchedly insanitary conditions in which most of them work, but also to the miserly remuneration which underlies the "cruel cheapness," which is characteristic of so much modern trade.

The Benefit of Ambiguity. Owing to ambiguity of terms in the "Children's Bill," and the difficulty of defining a "sealed vessel," many publicans' associations are recommending their members to refuse altogether to serve children under fourteen over the counter. This constitutes a greater protection to the little ones than the more stringent regulations advocated by the temperance party in Parliament. We may be sure this is not due to philanthropy on the part of the publican, nor to his desire for temperance reform. But whether he hopes thus to rouse the indignation of the working-classes against the Bill, or anticipates the pleasure of personal visits from the parents with increased expenditure on their part as the result—we may at any rate rejoice that so many children will escape the moral pollutions of public-house talk and surroundings.

Women and Alcoholism. The Temperance Record contains a New Year's Message from a prominent worker to the temperance and social workers of the United Kingdom—a message which we should like to know had been perused by every woman and girl in the land, since it touches the very heart of the temperance question. The writer's passionate plea is for total abstinence mothers:

> Let this be your prayer when you realize the countless numbers, the thousands of helpless little children who come into this world with the deadly alcoholic poison and craving in their blood: the seeds of a drunken manhood in the very fibres of their being. . . . Let the mother's hand stay the glass at the social party and the banqueting table. Let her refuse her society to such places as dishonour women by the presence of intoxicating drink. Aye! and is it not within her power to refuse to link her life with the man who loves immorality and drinking better than virtue and honour? She can be a saviour to the man nearest and dearest to her by opening the eyes of his better self to the beauty of virtue and the malignity of vice.

The words we have italicized contain the gist of the matter. We should soon see a change if girls would only be firm in their refusal to marry drinking men. But before this can be, girls need both instruction and conversion. Vast numbers of girls rush into misery with both eyes widely open—only they are foolish enough to think that it is bliss.

Towards Real Reunion. The current Contemporary Review contains a kind of symposium, contributed to by leading dignitaries of the Church of England, upon the propositions of Canon Hensley Henson in the remarkable series of sermons just concluded at Westminster Abbey. One writer points out as a singular fact, that a decade ago, when the Bishop of Worcester took part in a Reunion Communion at Grindelwald, Canon Henson was the Bishop's bitterest critic. It is a remarkable sign of the times that the former critic should have become the leading advocate of a practical movement towards real reunion. Of all the comments in the symposium, that of the Bishop of Durham seems to us to touch most nearly the heart of the question. Dr. Moule's attitude towards his Nonconformist brethren is, it goes without saying, generous; but he gives a sound reason for regarding such generosity as simple Christian justice. We hope the Bishop's words will be well pondered in which he says:—

> The rule of the Rubric is a domestic rule of the Church of England, and a very wholesome one, but both Anglican history and the equity of the case are far more conclusive, that it is not a rule to be pressed against Christian guests from other communions at what is, after all, not our table but the Lord's.

The Historic Bar to Inter-Communion. The Liberator, while commending the catholicity of spirit manifested by Canon Henson, points out that the Tractarian doctrine of Apostolic Succession is not the only difficulty in the way. He apparently forgets that, apart from the rubric, the canons of 1602 are still binding on the clergy.

He cannot invite Dr. Parker to preside in his pulpit without violating Canon 50. He cannot knowingly administer the Communion to any Westminster Free Churchman without violating Canon 27, which declares that "Schismatics shall not be admitted to the Communion." He cannot fraternise with Nonconformists without violating in spirit, if not in letter, Canons 2, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9.

So long as the laws of the Church of England are thus dependent on the results of past differences, it will always be possible for a reactionary party like the Tractarians to block any real movement towards reunion. Not till these relics of dead controversies are swept from the constitution of the Anglican Church, and it is freed from the incubus of the past, will such reforms as Canon Henson suggests be possible.

Union is Strength. A writer in a daily contemporary has remarked that in Australia "the spirit of unity is in the air," and it is pleasing to find in confirmation of this view, that not only have the various Presbyterian bodies formed themselves into the Presbyterian Church of Australia, and the Wesleyans and their sister bodies have joined forces as the "United Methodist Church," but that committees have been elected to discuss the preliminaries to union between the Congregationalists and the Presbyterians, under the designation of "The United Free Church of Australia." The gain from all this concentration must be immense, and it is to be hoped that the noble example may be followed in Great Britain, where at present much of our strength is frittered away through a want of unity in effort.

Laxity v. Austerity. In a sermon on his eightieth birthday, Dr. Guinness Rogers pointed out that there is an evil tendency abroad, very seductive to ministers, to show a lofty superiority to the prejudices of their childhood and youth. The old severity which needlessly darkened the religious life, is discounted to an extent which opens the door to a laxity still more dangerous. The barriers of the "garden walled around" have been thrown down, till there is not even a solitary defence against the incursions of the beasts of the field. The changed character of Sunday is a proof that unrestrained and unguided liberty has followed on the most severe and jealous restrictions. This note of warning from a keen observer of the tendencies of the times is worthy of the serious attention of all who have any hand in guiding the religious opinion of the rising generation, Laxity of attitude in the teachers cannot but lead to an acceleration of the loose tendencies that are so painfully prevalent nowadays.

The Preaching of Retribution. A contemporary, in discussing the effect of modern ideas upon the preaching of our times, remarks upon the fact that the doctrine of retribution has been practically banished from much religious teaching, and then proceeds to ask whether the suppression, or the diminution, of this truth, has not had much to do with the prevailing religious indifference. It is a grave question, and deserves solemn consideration. There can be no doubt that the religious novel—which, for many, replaces the Bible—has frequently caricatured the truth about future retribution, and has lent itself to the fallacy that somehow all will come right in the end. Many pulpits, also, have so presented the Fatherhood of God as to obscure Divine justice. If love is so preached as to hide the truth of retribution, harm must result therefrom. The same Saviour who came to reveal the love of God to us, Himself uttered the most solemn words concerning the consequences of sin. To suppress the latter is to fail grievously in fulfilling the office of a preacher of righteousness. Our age, in particular, needs to be told the consequences of outraging the justice of eternal love.

Ultimate Results. The difference between a charlatan and a true physician is that the one aims only at a result which will bring immediate applause to him (if ultimate reprobation), whilst the other aims at an enduring and a final effect. The method of the latter may, of necessity, be slow, but it is meant to be sure. Slow and toilsome work, however, is often very fatiguing to the spirit, and many workers are tempted to adopt the more showy and swifter methods. This is a temptation which must be steadfastly resisted; to yield to it is fatal. A jerry-builder may seem to shame a conscientious workman by his more rapid work, but the verdict of time will always be on the side of the man who builds enduring structures. A servant of God has before him an ultimate result—that of eternally enduring work. Nothing must be allowed to turn him from this end.

Scientific Guesses at God. We are frequently struck with the fact of the semi-religious notions which haunt the writings of modern materialistic scientists. It seems as if, despite their preaching of materialism, they cannot get rid of the idea of the Personal Presence behind all phenomena. They label this Presence variously, but, one and all, they seem compelled to try and deal with it in some way or other. A writer, in his latest work, which is commanding much attention in the world, after preaching materialism pure and simple, is bound to admit that, after all, men have a "moral responsibility" to "the purpose in the totality of things;" and then he goes on to say, "Beyond this purpose we can know nothing of a definite revelation of God." It is a curious and sad contradiction to admit the "purpose," whilst professing final ignorance of Him who purposes. How can one be known without the other? It is still evidently true that "the world by its wisdom knows not God." And this "wisdom" is sadly illogical.

"The Day of the Dead." There is something unspeakably sad and pathetic in the tone of the addresses which year by year, on the last day of December, come from "The Church of Humanity." The chief festival which this "Church" observes is the "day of all the dead," in which a dead humanity is remembered. This "festival" is practically a funeral service in which there is not one solitary word of hope or of comfort. God and Immortality having been abandoned and humanity alone enthroned, it is wonderfully significant that all "Positivism" sees in the majority of men is—

For one flower, one seed, one genius, one life that comes to maturity there are two—aye, a hundred—that perish before their time in the immeasurable gulfs of waste, failure, or death. . . . Our life is a vast strata of "what might have been. We look back upon it with sadness."

And this unrelieved gloom and despair are seriously offered to men as better than the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour! Were it not for a few litterateurs who head this movement, and whose words are reported in the journals, "humanity" would surely never even listen for a moment to this betrayal of its dearest hopes.

Perverters of Youth. We are thankful to see that some energetic steps are being taken to prevent professional gamesters from gaining access to the boys of our public schools by means of seductive betting circulars. It has come to a pretty pass when lads are diverted from their education by alluring circulars which promise them "immense riches" without the necessity of working. Can anything be more damaging to a youth's career than the painting of this fool's paradise, and can any punishment be too severe for the villains who lay themselves out to ensnare innocent lads in this fashion? So utterly unscrupulous have gamesters become that it is very clear Parliament will soon be called upon to take measures to destroy the suckers of our national octopus, or our national life will be most seriously menaced.

Inherited Religion. One of the standing griefs of life is the fact that so many children, born of Christian parents, walk contrary to their parents' God. Some of the most devout men have begotten children whose irreligion has been a prolonged agony to their parents. It is a laudable thing, surely, to try and discover the reason for this contradiction. A celebrated teacher writes in a contemporary:—

You had better be without the incalculably precious gift of children unless you can have faith and can convey that faith to those who are your own flesh and blood. We need to learn the art of entailing our religion upon posterity, or, in other words, we need to learn anew the secret of that honest hearty faith which proves that the promise is both to us and our children.

There may be ambiguity in the writer's mode of expression; on the other hand, we cordially agree with his searching word in urging Christian parents to ask themselves "how far the principles of faith rule you in your converse with your children." A lax Eli will not be likely to train up devout sons. After all, it is what we are, rather than what we say, that most influences our children.

Idleness and Polygamy. Rev. J. T. Darragh, of Johannesburg, discussing in The Contemporary the "Native Problem in South Africa," urges that the hope of the native is to induce him to work instead of living lazily while his wives do all the hard labour. The essential principle of native barbarism, "men are warriors, and women must work for them," still remains operant among them, and now that the old order of internecine warfare is a thing of the past, this must be cleared away ere the aboriginal races can progress. How to stimulate industry, and how to abolish polygamy, are thus the two social problems to be settled. Forced labour is a remedy which is freely advocated by the "advanced" party in South Africa, though Mr. Darragh ridicules the idea that it is being practically established. He advocates a judicious taxing of the population such as would make a certain amount of labour compulsory; and thinks that polygamy and its correlative, the sale and purchase of women, can be gradually abolished by imposing a cumulative tax on every wife after the first. But we have more confidence in the Gospel than in the law.

Practical Papers.

On "RECREATION."

THIS is a subject of more or less anxiety to the young Christian at all times, but never more so than at this season, when attractions and allurements of many kinds especially abound.

The remarks which follow are not addressed to long-established believers who experimentally decided the question of Recreation for themselves long ago, or who are past inclination for it now; but to those robust, ardent spirits to whom the instinct for amusement makes a strong appeal; and who, sincerely anxious not to dishonour their Lord, are at times in doubt as to what forms are permissible to the true follower of Jesus.

Let us admit, at the outset, that wholesome Recreation is not only legitimate, but is a necessity for "a healthy mind in a healthy body"; to clear away "the cobwebs of the brain," and to refresh the mental and physical powers. Literature for the mind, music for the ear, muscular development for the body, may each be made a means of grace, or an enticing evil; a glad angel to brighten the path of life, or a wicked sprite to allure us, like a will-o'-the-wisp, into bogs of sin or marshes of dark despair. How shall we direct our steps aright—how avoid the tempter's snare? Wherewithal shall we cleanse our way?

"By taking heed thereto." How often is lacking this spirit of caution! Young people who would not cross a crowded street without a score of glances to either side, rush heedlessly into circumstances beset with moral dangers. How shall we take heed? "According to thy Word." Here is the infallible guide to lead our feet into the way of peace. Herein are found principles by which to rule our life, whether as to Recreation, intellectual or musical pursuits, commercial or professional ambitions, and a hundred things beside.

When God fed his people in the wilderness with manna, they murmured saying, "Who shall give us flesh to eat? We remember the fish which we did eat in Egypt freely; the cucumbers, the melons, the leeks, the onions, and the garlic" (Num. xi. 5). Now, the melon is admittedly a luscious, a useful, and certainly a harmless fruit. Many a time has it served well to cool the fevered tongue and refresh the thirsty palate. In partaking of it we receive no harm, but may derive positive good. But in the mind of the Israelites this beneficent fruit—clean, pure, and sweet in itself—was inseparable from strong-flavoured association with the leek, the onion, and the garlic, which impregnated it with their own rank, high-tasted characteristics. Here is

Recreation in itself is wholesome, pure, and good; it is not only harmless, but actually beneficial to body and mind; and, so long as it can be kept clean, may be used with thanksgiving to the glory of God. But if, at any point, this good and useful thing becomes impregnated with the harmful influences of evil or worldly associations which "war against the soul," then, for the soul's sake, that particular form of it is better left alone. The purest and sweetest of melons will be ruined by proximity to the leek, the onion, and the garlic. Apply this principle to whatever form of Recreation you most delight to indulge in.

Read on, and we come to a second principle:—"There is nothing at all beside this manna before our eyes" (xi. 6), "and our soul loatheth this light bread" (xxi. 5). Here we find that the desire for even the harmless and useful melon (plus the leek, the onion, and the garlic) becomes so absorbing as to create distaste for the higher provision that God had made. "Nothing but this manna!" "Our soul loatheth this light bread!" So perniciously does the onion-flavour pollute and vitiate the taste.

Has your Recreation ever brought you to this? Has it spoiled your appreciation of that which is good, or caused you to speak thus disparagingly of the things of God? Has it robbed you of your delight in the worship of his house, or the study of his Word? Is there a competition between the melon and the manna, your bicycle and your Bible, your ping-pong and the prayer-meeting, your Recreation and the "Morning Watch"? If so, it is time to call a halt, or your spiritual taste will degenerate more and more until, like a sick or fevered man, you will lose your sense of taste, and crave only for what is unwholesome and injurious. Thus Christ had to rebuke Peter one day with the words, "Thou savourest not the things that be of God, but the things that be of men," and when you come to that, be sure that Satan is not far away.

In a word, therefore, Recreation is good, provided that it does not lead into doubtful associations, nor out of those that are holy. So long as that which is good can be kept pure and sweet, and does not turn away true desire from that which is hallowed and true, nor give rise to disinclination for spiritual exercises which are more vital than all else to the well-being of the soul—then use it, not abusing it, heartily as unto the Lord.

These two tests are simple, and easily applied, but they are comprehensive and effective. By them every form of Recreation may be gauged. See to it that they are honestly and fearlessly applied.

Whatever will make you healthier in spirit and stronger in the Lord may be thankfully enjoyed; and if, perchance, you give up anything for his sake, it is but a reasonable service to Him who died, that we who live should not henceforth live unto ourselves, but unto Him who died for us and rose again.

G.

Mr. Sankey and his Singers.

FOR some time I have been wishing to write you a few lines in relation to the progress made in the matter of the Training School for Gospel Singers. As was predicted by some of my friends in England last winter, I have found it hard to secure the right kind of persons to train for the special work in which I have been engaged for so many years. When the subject of starting a training school was mentioned by the public press on my return home from your country, I received a large number of letters from persons making application for admission to the classes, whom it was quite evident were not the kind of persons we had in view for this line of work; and that a school of this kind, if opened, would soon be filled with those who did not have the necessary qualifications for the work in hand.

It, therefore, became evident that such persons as would be likely to succeed, must be selected one by one from those who had good voices, and who had already had some experience in Christian work, and who could be recommended by their ministers or pastors. Such selections I have been making for some time as I have gone about the country, and have met with considerable success. Already I have received encouraging reports from some fine young men to whom I have given such help and instruction as I was able to impart. I hope by-and-by to bring all these singers together, in different sections of our country, for conference, consultation, and prayer, and in this way secure a body of consecrated singers who will be increasingly useful in the great mission of Sacred Song.

IRA D. SANKEY.

God's Whispered Secrets.

BY REV. G. B. F. HALLOCK, D.D.

THERE is a beautiful figure of speech in Psa. xxv.: "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him." The term rendered "secret" is in the original Hebrew tongue "a whisper." When a humble and teachable soul is near to God, He often tells it a secret. He whispers in the Christian's ear some sweet word of promise or love which no one else can hear, perhaps which no one else could understand.

Walking with God is the best way to know the mind of God; friends who walk together impart their secrets to each other. Noah walked with God, and God revealed a secret to him about his intended destroying of the old world and saving him in the ark. Abraham walked with God, and God took him into the most intimate relation, saying, "Shall I hide from Abraham the thing which I do?"

There are Christians to-day who walk with God, and how often He unbosoms Himself to them, at the time of prayer, in the quiet hour of spiritual meditation and communion, while pondering his Word, or in his Holy Supper, as when Christ made Himself known to his disciples in the breaking of bread. What are some of the secrets God imparts to those who fear Him?

(1) One of them is expressed in the closing clause of the verse we have quoted: "He will show them his covenant." As Spurgeon says, "Its antiquity, security, righteousness, fulness, graciousness, and excellence shall be revealed to their hearts and understandings; and, above all, their own part in it shall be sealed to their hearts by the witness of the Holy Spirit."

There is a vital sense in which "the natural man discerneth not the things of the Spirit of God," and in which all the realities of Christian experience are utterly hid from his perceptions. To speak to some men about communion with God, or the sense of pardon, or the lively expectation of heaven, or the witness of the Holy Ghost, or the struggles of the spiritual life, would be like reasoning with a blind man about colours or with one deaf about musical harmony. But God does reveal these things, what they are, what they mean, and makes real the blessed experiences of them to those who are willing to walk with Him. In other words, salvation itself is one of the secrets God imparts to those who are willing to become his friends.

(2) Another secret God imparts is the meaning of his Word. To many the Bible is a book of enigmas, a volume of "dark sayings" they cannot understand. But just as a lover can "read between the lines" in the letter he receives, so, through the gift of the Holy Ghost, even "the deep things of God" become plain and full of helpfulness and comforting assurance to the soul that is in touch with God.

(3) Guidance. "Thine ears shall hear a word behind thee saying, This is the way, walk in it, when ye turn to the right hand and when ye turn to the left." "I will instruct thee and teach thee in the way which thou shalt go; I will guide thee with mine eye." "In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths." These, and such as these, are the promises God fulfils to those who listen for his voice, who are alert to understand his providences, and are ready to follow his leadings. We know how Joshua, in entering the Land of Promise, was able to cope with the difficulties of an unknown region, and to overcome great and warlike nations, because he constantly looked to the Lord of Hosts, who ever leads to victory. We know how in the early Church the Apostles were enabled to thread their way through the most difficult questions and to solve the most perplexing problems, laying down principles that will guide the Church to the end of time, all because it was revealed to them by the Holy Ghost what they should do and say. God is no less the guardian and pilot of his people now, and his secret of guidance is, as of old, "with them that fear Him."

(4) The meaning and the blessedness of heaven. The reason God is able to reveal this secret to those who live in close fellowship with Him is because heaven is something that begins to them here. "Lay hold on eternal life." It is something for us to get hold of here and now. It is a thing of the future; but it is a thing of the present, too, and even the part of it which is future can be so realized and grasped by faith as to be partially enjoyed while we are in the flesh. It was said of an old Puritan, "Heaven was in him before he was in heaven." A devout Scotchman, being asked if he ever expected to go to heaven, gave the quaint reply, "Why, mon, I live there!" All the way to heaven is heaven begun to the Christian who walks near enough to God to hear the secrets He has to impart.

It is worth our while to cultivate this grace of intercourse with God. The effect is as when one looks at the sun. You gaze a little time at the sun, then look back again about you on the earth, and everywhere you will see the sun. Up the street, in yonder doorway, among the hurrying people, you seem to have brought the sun down by your look, and now you see it all about you.

The same thing happens to you, child of God, when you recognize the value of communion with Him and give yourself pause in the hurry of life long enough to look into his face. By so doing you bring Him down into your immediate surroundings, not to dazzle, but to cheer, guide, and bless you. In the midst of the thronging people who press upon your daily life—when you enter into the doorway of your office, store or shop, or among those in your own home—everywhere you see God: you are conscious of his presence, and walk with his light irradiating the whole horizon of your activities. In fact, you have entered into his secret because you are one of those who fear Him. Verily, blessed are all they who will come into such an experience.

The Day of Days.

Awake! the Day of days is here,
The morn of sweetest song,
For which the suffering ages cried,
"How long, O Lord, how long!"*
Now, O ye children of the light,
With happy voices sing on Until the 'Christ's' arise and shout,
For ever "it is done."†

To-day your joy's exceeding full,
And yet shall have increase,
Progressive through Eternity,
Impossible to cease:
Immortal expectation's yours,
To know, and still to know
Him who bore every sin away,
And with them all your woe.

Your fruits of faith, "of freewill," brought,
Can never be refused
Proceeding from his gifts of grace
Abounding; to be used
For his supreme approval, hence
His glory to display
And upward, through space, infinite,
Of his unsullied sway.

O "Temple of the Lord," complete,
Of precious stones, all pure
Of varied beauty, sort, and hue,
For ever to endure.
Unchangeable! from no delight
Desiring a release;
One living palace of our God—
One endless home of peace.

There you will rest—a part of it
Yet wander through its courts,
"As lively stones" of beaming light,
Where every saint resorts
To render service to the King—
The Ruler of the spheres
Throughout the infinite unknown
Of past and future years.

What saith the Scripture?—Believing that Scripture is, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, its own best interpreter, Mr. L. Stuart Whitelaw (53, Palace Gardens Terrace, W.) has prepared for the use of the teachers connected with Marylebone Presbyterian Church, the lessons for January, with the parallel passages printed in full. He believes, as so many have proved before, that in answer to prayer the interpretation will be given.

Elijah: The Prophet of all Time.

By Rev. F. S. WEBSTER, M.A., Rector of All Souls, Langham Place, W.

VIII.—Abundance of Rain.

AHAB was obliged to consent to the terrible judgment executed upon the prophets of Baal. They were the ringleaders in the nation's rebellion against God. Their lives were forfeited according to the law of Israel. The King, as God's vicegerent, was responsible for the carrying out of the sentence, and the enthusiasm of the populace was such that he was forced to go along with them, and give up all attempts to shield the false prophets.

His heart, however, remained unchanged. Faith cannot be coerced. Judgments or miracles seldom awaken that genuine faith which purifies the heart. Ahab was still carnal-minded and impenitent. So he was a hindrance to Elijah's prayers. He must be dismissed from the prophet's immediate presence before the prayer that was to open heaven could be offered.

There is no communion between light and darkness. An incompatibility of taste separates even on earth those who love the Lord from those who love evil. The "great gulf fixed" is only the final outcome of the law which is even now in operation, making Ahab a hindrance to Elijah's prayers and Elijah a hindrance to Ahab's sins.

A HARDENED HEART.

It is a sad revelation of the shallowness and selfishness of wicked men. The solemn scenes Ahab had just witnessed would, we should think, have made the most flippant thoughtful and earnest, but Ahab is unmoved. "Get thee up, eat and drink," Elijah says to him. That is all he is fit for. He is quite ready for a good banquet; he would be out of his element at a prayer-meeting. In like manner there are some to-day who seem unmoved by any manifestations of Divine power. They pass out of church after listening to a most moving sermon, and merely complain of the length, or criticize the preacher's style. Human nature, even when totally unregenerate, seems at times to show traits that are noble and grand. It is seldom so outrageously carnal and callous as Ahab seemed on this occasion.

We turn with relief to Elijah. "There is a sound of abundance of rain," he had said to Ahab. Perhaps he heard it only with the ear of the spirit by faith. More probably his senses were rendered so acute that he had already caught the muttering of the approaching storm, and it was to him both a signal of God's readiness to fulfil his promise and a summons to prayer.

But why should not Elijah also eat and drink? He was exhausted with the labour and strain of the day. Why not be content, now that he had heard the soughing in the trees, and just eat and drink until the rain fell? Because the rustling was not the rain, it was only the precursor of the rain, and a call to prayer.

HOW TO HINDER BLESSING.

How often we hinder blessing through lack of prayer. We hear the rustling and we take our ease. Rain is certainly coming, we say, so I need not trouble. Nay, nay, the rustling is not the rain; just because God has promised to bless, and is going to bless, therefore you must pray.

Thus in Ezek. xxxvi., after sketching out the Divine programme of blessing full of most gracious promises, the word is written, "I will yet for this be inquired of by the House of Israel to do it for them." God's promise is always a call to prayer.

It is not so in earthly matters. If a friend promises a donation to some charity, you do not need to ask for it every day until the money is paid. But in that case the gift is between equals. God is infinitely above us. It is such great condescension on his part to give us anything. If we waited without prayer for the fulfilment of the promise, it would seem as if we thought we had a right to the blessing. Once we begin to take our mercies as a matter of course, there is no blessing with them to our souls. So we find two features specially prominent in this prayer of Elijah's—his utter self-abasement before God and his believing perseverance.

(1) Elijah went up to the top of Carmel, and cast himself down upon the earth, and put his face between his knees (xviii. 42.) Why such prostration? He had stood erect before Ahab. He had faced the angry prophets with unflinching courage, taking the lead in the work of execution. Now he is prostrate, hiding his face in shame and humiliation before God. Let us venture near and listen to his prayer. "Ah, Lord, I am unworthy. If my sins were visited as they deserve, I should be lying dead beside the prophets of Baal. How forgetful I have been of thy mercies! What self-righteous and hard thoughts I have harboured! How little has there been of real brokenness of soul! Thy mercies have been more than the sands of the sea. I am wholly undeserving of them. Yet let them continue. This rustling that I hear: it is a sound of abundance of rain. Let the rain come. Let not my shortcomings hinder it. Let not the callousness and apathy of King Ahab be a barrier. Send rain, O Lord, according to thy gracious word."

We need more of this spirit in our approach to God. Let us seek more brokenness of soul. Never ask for a blessing as if you had a right to it. We have no rights. We are sinners without excuse. Not a shred of merit belongs to us.

(2) But see how persistent and pertinacious faith then becomes. Elijah sent the lad (perhap the widow's son) to the top of Carmel to look out for the rain. He expected an answer, and he persevered until the answer came.

He was not discouraged by delay. The lad returned and said, "There is nothing." How often we meet with the same response! We pray for the conversion of some friend or relative. We look again and again for signs of blessing. The answer comes, "There is nothing." We ask for a manifestation of God to our own souls, some token of favour, some lifting up of the light of his countenance. And the answer comes, "There is nothing." We have to persevere in prayer, believing all the time, sending sometimes to see if the answer is on its way.

DELAYED ANSWERS.

But why does not the first prayer prevail? It is good that our faith should be tested and our desires proved. It is well, too, that we should be taught our dependence upon God. Perhaps if our prayer was always answered at once we should seem rulers and commanders in the things of God, and forget our subordinate and dependent position. We might even make an idol of prayer, as the Israelites did of the brazen serpent, and look upon our prayers as a charm or divining rod, giving us a legal claim upon the bounty of heaven.

There was similar delay at Pentecost. The promise was clear and emphatic. "Ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence." But ten days were spent in earnest expectant prayer before the blessing came. The continued prayer made the desire more intense, and deepened the sense of dependence upon God. Delays are not denials; they are only for the discipline of our faith.

The prayer was fully answered. The seventh time that he was sent to look, the lad returned with tidings of a cloud on the horizon about the size of a man's hand. It was enough. At once Elijah bade Ahab speed quickly to Jezreel. Very soon the whole sky was black with thick clouds, which emptied themselves in copious rain upon the thirsty earth. Elijah girded up his loins, and ran before Ahab's chariot to Jezreel. He who had stood before all Israel as the vindicator of Jehovah, and the executioner of the false prophets of Baal, now acts as a running footman to show his respect to his earthly sovereign. He who fears God will not forget to honour the King.

Samuel and Saul.

A Woman's Anguish of Heart.

(1 Sam. i. 15.)

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

WE may infer that Hannah's barrenness, and the provocation of her rival, were not the only reasons for Hannah's sorrow. As her noble song proves, she was saturated with the most splendid traditions and hopes of her people; her soul was thrilling with the conceptions that inspired the songs of Moses. Stricken with an agony of grief for the anarchy and confusion around her, she longed with passionate desire to enshrine her noblest self in a child, who should resuscitate the ebbing prosperity of the nation, and set it on an enduring foundation. Frail woman that she was, she might not even hope to emulate a Jael or a Deborah, but she might save her people if she could only breathe her ardent nature into a child. What if she were to be deprived of his presence and support from his earliest years, would she not be compensated a thousand-fold if only the Lord would accept him as his own, and use him to be the channel through which his redemptive schemes might be achieved? Levites ordinarily were consecrated to the Lord's service between the ages of thirty and fifty, but her son, if only she might have a man child, should be given to the Lord all the days of his life, and no razor should ever come upon his flowing locks.

On one occasion, while the feast was proceeding at Shiloh, it seemed as though Hannah could restrain herself no longer, and after her people had eaten and drunk—she fasting, save from tears—she rose up and returned to the outer court of the Tabernacle. Most of its ancient glory had departed. Probably only a few curtains were draped round the Ark and the other sacred furniture which had escaped the wreck of the previous two or three hundred years; and this simple structure, if we may credit rabbinical tradition, was surrounded by a low stone wall, at the gate of which was a seat or throne for the High Priest. "And she was in bitterness of soul, and prayed unto the Lord, and wept sore." Others went with burnt offerings, but she with the broken heart which God will not despise. She did not chide God, but she held out her cup of trial, that it might become a cup of salvation.

THE ELEMENTS OF TRUE PRAYER.

It was heart-prayer. It is the custom of Orientals to pray audibly, but as she stood beside Eli's seat (v. 26) she spake in her heart; her lips moved, but her voice was not heard. This indicates that she had made many advances in the Divine life, and had come to know the secret of heart-fellowship with God. Hers were not vain repetitions, but such an interchange of spirit with spirit, of need with supply, of hunger with satisfaction, of the human with the Divine, as requires no speech, for speech could not convey those "groanings which cannot be uttered."

It was based on a new name for God. She appealed to Jehovah under a new title, "Jehovah of Hosts," as though it were nothing to Him to summon into existence an infant spirit, whom she might call her child. She asked Him to look down from the myriads of holy spirits who circled round his throne, and did his behests, to her dire affliction and anguish. She vowed, in words which Elkanah by his silence or consent afterwards ratified, that she did not want this inestimable boon for herself merely, but for the kingdom and glory of God, and that he should be a Nazarite from his birth, abstaining from intoxicating drink, his locks unshorn, his body undefiled by contact with the dead (Num. xxx. 6-15).

It was definite prayer. "Give unto thine handmaid a man child." "For this child I prayed." So many of our prayers miscarry, because they are aimed at no special goal. We launch them aimlessly in the air, and wonder that they achieve nothing. How many of God's professing children would be nonplussed if, on leaving God's audience-chamber on any morning, they were questioned as to what precious gift they had gone thither to obtain? We are too often contented with asking generally that God would bless those with whom we are connected, without entering specifically into the case of any. Experienced saints who are versed in the art of intercessory prayer tell us of the marvellous results which have accrued, when they have set themselves to pray definitely for the salvation of individuals, or for some good and perfect gift on their behalf.

There is a notable instance of this in the life of Bishop Hannington, of Uganda. It is recorded in the diary of a fellow-clergyman, who had known him at the university, that, on a certain day, he was led to pray definitely for his friend; and almost simultaneously Hannington notes in his diary that he was conscious of unusual drawings towards God.

It was prayer without reserve. "I have poured out my soul before the Lord." Ah, how good it would be if we could more often follow Hannah's example. We pour out our secrets to confidential friends, and in many instances have reason bitterly to repent; or, if we commit our cause to God, we tell Him one side of the case, our side, and hide from Him the other. Often the matter would be ended, if we dared to pour out all our soul, not defending ourselves, not apologizing, not glossing over what demanded clear and unequivocal confession. When the heart is breaking, when its frail machinery seems unable to sustain the weight of its anxiety, when its cords are strained to the point of snapping, then, as you remember these things, pour out your soul in you (Psa. xlii. 4).

It was persevering prayer. "It came to pass, as she continued praying before the Lord." Not that either she or we can claim to be heard for our much speaking, but when the Lord lays some burden on us, we cannot do other than wait before Him.

It was prayer that received its coveted boon. Eli was seated in his place at the entrance to the sanctuary. His notice was attracted by Hannah, though she was indifferent to all around. At first his attention was probably arrested by the signs of her excessive sorrow, and he expected that she would pour out her prayers in an audible voice, as so many other burdened souls were wont to do. But since her lips moved, while her voice was not heard, the high priest thought she had been drunken, and rather rudely and coarsely broke in on her with the rebuke, "How long wilt thou be drunken? Put away thy wine from thee." Therein another proof was given of the inability of the priesthood to understand and sympathize with the best spirit of the time. Eli judged after the sight of his eyes, and clearly the mind of God had not been revealed to him. He had degenerated into the mere official, from whom the Divine purposes were concealed.

Hannah answered the unjust reproach with great meekness. She had already suffered so much that this last misapprehension could not seriously add to her burden. She was content to cast it, with all the rest on God, and she realized even before Eli replied that the merciful Burden-bearer had heard and answered her prayer. She had entered into the spirit of the prayer, which not only asks, but takes. She anticipated those wonderful words, which, more than any others, disclose the secret of prevailing supplication, "All things whatsoever ye pray and ask for, believe that ye have received them, and ye shall have them" (Mark xi. 24). So she went her way, and did eat, and her countenance was no more sad. Well may Cowper sing:

> Could we but kneel, and cast our load,
> E'en while we pray, upon our God,
> Then rise with lightened cheer!

Too often we return from prayer with sad faces and burdened hearts. We have not cast our burden on the Lord, or if we have done so, we have taken it back again. There has been no interchange, and no exchange. We have failed to abandon our weights, anxieties, and sins, leaving them in the hands of our Almighty Friend, and receiving instead beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness.

The next day was fixed for their return home. "And they rose up in the morning early, and worshipped before the Lord, and returned, and came to their house in Ramah." But what an altered woman she was! How differently she bore herself in that last brief visit to the holy shrine! And with what a glad face she entered the home which had been associated with such sorrow! Peninnah must have wondered what had happened to make so great a change; but Elkanah was the confidant of her secret, and his faith was made stronger by her unquestioning trust (verse 23).

THE WORKINGS OF SORROW.

In this prayer we can trace the harvest sown in years of suffering. Only one who had greatly suffered could have poured out such a prayer. It may be that the long sharp pain, which has been your lot for these many years, the heart-hunger, the disappointed hopes, the silent waiting, the holding your peace, even from good, have been necessary, to teach you how to pray, to lead you into the secret of a childlike faith, and to fit you to be the parent of some priceless gift to the world.

The good Elkanah had a new joy in his heart as he went up to offer unto the Lord his yearly sacrifice; and it would seem that he added to it some special expression of the vow that he had made—"the yearly sacrifice, and his vow." But Hannah abode at Ramah until the child was weaned, which would probably be on his completion of his third year, for at that age Levite children were permitted to be enrolled and to enter the house of the Lord (2 Chron. xxxi. 16).

At last the time arrived when Samuel should be openly presented to the Lord. The mother's heart was now as full of praise as it had formerly been of sorrow. Her heart rejoiced in the Lord, her spirit was exalted in her God. Her song, on which the mother of our Lord modelled the Magnificat, is the outburst of a soul whose cup was simply overflowing with the loving-kindness of the Lord.

Presently the memorable journey from Ramah was finished. The sanctuary was again in sight, where she had suffered so poignantly, and prayed so fervently. How it all rushed on her memory! "I am the woman that stood by thee here," she said to Eli; "for this child I prayed, and the Lord hath given me my petition."

Notice those words, "I stood by thee here." How closely we associate certain experiences with certain spots. Here we suffered; here we resolved to live a new life; here we heard God speak. It was thus with Hannah. And was it not befitting that she should rejoice where she had sorrow; that the harvest of joy should wave over the furrows, where her tears had fallen so lavishly; that the blue skies should over-arch the very spot where the dark clouds had lowered?

Take heart, thou man or woman of a sorrowful spirit! Only suffer according to the will of God, and for no wrong or sinful cause! Suffer for his Church, for a lost world, for dying men! Travail in birth for souls! Exercise thyself as thou wilt for the coming of his kingdom! Bear the weight of some other soul, dear to thee as life! And if thou dost abide thy Lord's time, He will bring thee again to tread in garments of joy, where thou didst stand in the drapery of woe. They that go forth, and weep, bearing precious seed, shall DOUBTLESS come again with rejoicing, bringing their sheaves with them.

His Mission.

By Mrs. HARVEY-JELLIE.

HAROLD LOUGHTON was in a dispirited mood on that autumn afternoon. He had been hearing of the great things done by some who had returned from foreign service, and of the testimony to good received from several home-workers. He knew he was a saved soul, and his desire was to serve his Lord; but as the train carried him back to his suburban home after the exciting meeting, he felt cast down. No statistics could he give of scholars brought to Christ, or of converts gathered in by any means. He reasoned with troubled conscience that he had no power of eloquence, no gift of persuasion. No mission had appealed for his help, and no one sought his aid.

Entering his lonely lodging, he sat down at the supper-table. In the silence again he heard the echo of applause in the large hall, saw the look of exultant gratitude on the speakers' faces. A letter lay upon the table. It took him long to read, and brought a shadow even deeper over his face. One paragraph evidently required a second perusal—

"Old fellow, perhaps you can help me, as you used to do in our boyish days at school. I've made a mess of it, lost my money in speculation, and ruin stares me in the face. I don't know what your creed is; as for me, I said I was Roman Catholic, but that doesn't help me now. Have you any faith that comes into one's blank despair and offers hope? Speak quickly if you have, or I'm done for."

The figures given of numbers converted, and the coveted applause faded before the present demand, and lest he should be too late, he seized his paper and pen to write. To think of Holston, the successful man of business, the old, high-spirited comrade of earlier days, in a state of desperation seeking help of him!

But it was late; no letter could be forwarded that night. He would wire in the morning, and during the night he revolved the question in his mind—"A faith that comes into one's blank despair and offers hope!"

Before business hours he wired the simple message—"Mark xi. 22, and Eph. vi. 10," following it with a letter explaining that for immediate help he sent that message before writing. . . . "A telegram, sir," said the boy as the accountant was stepping out of his house. Holston returned with heart beating with fear. Such missives had caused him more than one uneasy night; he would rather open it alone.

He might have smiled before, as at some odd fanatic, but now he was ready to clutch at any suggestion that could ease his mind, for at any moment the dreaded blow might fall. Strange! peculiarly strange he thought, but how could he get at the sense of the message without a Bible? So there he sat, the man of worldly status—the man who had delegated his soul's concern to a priest. He, the distracted mortal, wanting some guiding hand, reading with curious eagerness, "Have faith in God;" and then, "Be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might." These were the verses given in that coloured piece of paper.

"Nonsense," he muttered, "I want help on business lines; he is on the lines of religion, quite outside my sphere;" and he put the book aside, closing the telegram with it.

The letter came next day, telling with frankness, there is a faith that conquers all despair, a power that holds the drooping spirit up—but it centres itself in God. The friendly tone removed any sense of displeasure, and again the worried man opened the book that held the telegram. The marvellous way in which those two passages shone out, and the hold they made upon him, must be seen from another side. . . .

Meantime, Harold had ceased to trouble that he had no gift of speech, or power to sway large numbers. All his interest was in his old companion, whom he desired to help. He felt he must betake himself to God in prayer. He must be more than ever sure of the faith he was recommending. For the next few days this subject was ever present; all his thoughts and questionings went into it, and evening after evening he retired to his room for a clearer and deeper insight, and to plead for his friend.

A fortnight or so later, on a chill October night, he sat, pen in hand, to write to his old companion, when the housekeeper announced a visitor. Although they had not met for years, they were no strangers as Holston grasped his old schoolfellow's hand. They talked of their different careers, and the motives that prompted each, and of the collapse of affairs in the case of the one; then referred to Harold's response to the letter.

"You have done for me beyond all telling," said Holston. "I had, as you know, a scorn for 'religiosity,' and never troubled to hear a sermon. I heard you envied the missionary and the preacher, but felt you had no mission of that sort. Listen, old friend, this is a mission worth filling, to live by a faith that can be handed to others, who know nothing safer than the shifting land of worldiness." No remark, but in gratitude, was made of the strange telegram, and by its God-blessed influence a man was saved from ruin, and a soul redeemed. . . .

Only one little incident—not even chronicled in reports or magazines, for it may require some vaster volume of eternity to register its ever-increasing results.

The writer of this article gratefully acknowledges expressions of appreciation from many, of stimulus received for Sunday-school and other branches of work, and earnestly pleads for many who have a faith tried and strong, who will be alive to their special opportunities. Be it their mission to seek to touch the great and immediate needs of life, and, by a glad surrender of self, be ready to do or say anything the Holy Spirit may suggest, to bring a soul into the kingdom of God.

The Pioneer Mission.

AT the Council Meeting of the Pioneer Mission held on Friday last, an encouraging report of the work was given by the president, Rev. E. A. Carter. The new chapel at Paisley Road, Glasgow, had been opened. The opening services had been followed by an evangelistic mission, at which over 100 persons professed conversion. A mission had also been held at Blackhorse Road, Walthamstow, conducted by Mr. W. Olney, which had been attended with much blessing, eighty-seven having given in their names as deciding for Christ.

Rev. J. Wilson, who is a member of the council, gave an account of his visit to Paisley Road, and spoke in enthusiastic terms of the work which is being accomplished there under the auspices of the Society. Cheering accounts were given of the work at Newquay (Cornwall), St. Budeaux (Devonport), Kelvinside (Glasgow), and other places, in several of which building operations are about to begin. Specially gratifying was the announcement that the new work at Rouen, France, had been inaugurated under very encouraging circumstances.

The financial report showed that while the income for last year (over £500) was larger than in any previous year, it had been largely exceeded by the expenditure, on account of new work undertaken, &c., so that there is urgent need for over £200. There are many pressing calls upon the Society to begin work in other places, and much might be done if the income could at once be raised to £1,000 a year.

"A Timely Offer."—Miss S. H. Carruthers writes: "Under this heading a notice was inserted in The Christian last April, which brought me many requests for grants of the Italian and Spanish editions of my 'Popular Conversations on the Book of books.' The first small edition in Spanish was so soon exhausted that it was impossible to supply all the applicants. A new edition has just been published in Spain, and parcels will be sent to all my correspondents. Any acknowledgments of these or applications for further supplies should be addressed to myself at Pisa, per Cisanello, Italy."

Letters to the Editor.

"Intercessory Prayer."

DEAR SIR,—Perceiving in a recent issue that you again give currency to the un-Scriptural expression above quoted, I venture to repeat a former protest, grounded on the words of Holy Writ. The inspired prophet announces as follows:—"And God saw that there was no man, and wondered that there was no intercessor; therefore his arm brought salvation unto Him; and his righteousness it sustained Him" (Isa. lix. 16). Here you have it most plainly stated that by the Intercessor was meant no less a person than our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, who is further described as the arm of the Lord bringing salvation.

The act of intercession is, therefore, the prerogative of Christ, and no mortal breathing has any right to appropriate it to himself or herself. If one wanted an additional argument, the expression "one Mediator" (1 Tim. ii. 5) supplies it, being perfectly synonymous with intercessor. As a critical definition, I must add that the word intercession is derived from the Latin, which implies the interposition of one person to settle a difference subsisting between two—in this case God on the one hand, and the sinful world upon the other.

The word mistranslated "intercession" in Paul's Epistle to Timothy should be, according to the Greek, "conversation" (of a Christian character).

Trusting that this explanation will suffice to convince you of the impropriety of appropriating to any human congregation a title belonging to our Lord and Saviour.—Yours sincerely,

T. W. C.

[We entirely sympathize with the jealousy of our esteemed correspondent for the office and honour of Him who is the alone Mediator between God and men—the Man Christ Jesus. There has, however, been no challenge of that office, no reflection upon that honour. Christ is, beyond question, the Intercessor; He brings us to God in reconciliation, and through Him will have access to the Father (John xiv. 6; Eph. ii. 18; iii. 12). Having hereby access to God, it is our privilege to make our requests known unto Him, and not simply in our own personal interest, but also for the good of others and mankind at large. This latter is generally termed INTERCESSORY PRAYER, and many instances of the same are supplied in Holy Scripture. The rule, or command, is laid down in Eph. vi. 18, and 1 Tim. ii. 1. Request for such prayers is made in Eph. vi. 19, 20; Col. iv. 3, 4; 1 Thess. v. 25; 2 Thess. iii. 1, 2; and Heb. xiii. 18, 19. Instances are afforded in Acts xx. 32; Phil. i. 3-5; Col. i. 9; 1 Thess. iii. 10-13; 2 Thess. i. 11, 12. As to 1 Tim. ii. 1, we cannot find any reference to "conversation"; devotional exercises are the subject, and, quite properly, as in the R.V. we should read "supplications, prayers, intercessions, and thanksgivings." There is assuredly no mistranslation.—Ed.]

Young Men for the Colonies.

DEAR SIR,—Parents and others interested in young men going out to the Colonies seem generally to think that it is sufficient to provide them with letters of introduction to residents in the country to which they are going who will be likely to take an interest in them for their good. If they knew what a large proportion of these letters remain undelivered, their minds would not be quite so easy on the subject.

Let these letters be given, by all means; but the object of this communication is to urge those who are sending their sons or any other young men in whom they are interested, to a distant land, in every case to supplement the letters of introduction so given by a letter sent direct to one or more of those to whom the letters are addressed (and one of these letters should invariably be to a clergyman or other Christian pastor) informing them of the name of the ship by which the young man sails, his port of destination, probable date of arrival, address in the Colony, &c.

Residents in less settled countries than England are generally very kind to their fellow-countrymen, and ready to put themselves to a considerable amount of trouble on their behalf. A young man thus committed to the care of a Colonial would, therefore, often find himself met on arrival, or would soon receive a letter of welcome and an offer of hospitality, to be followed up by the exercise of an influence for good, introductions to worthy people, and to friends who would be ready to help in time of need.—Yours truly, Colonist.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, January 12. Revelation ix.

A GREAT number of commentators refer this chapter to the rise and progress of Mohammed and his successors—the false prophet himself being this fallen star. The armies that followed him resembled locusts in their immense numbers, and it was one of the instructions given by Moslem generals to their troops that they were not to destroy palm-trees, or fruit-trees, or do any harm to corn and cattle. Their one commission appeared to be to destroy the corrupt Christianity of that time, which had relapsed into the semblance of Paganism, the throne of the Almighty being, to use Gibbon's words, darkened by a crowd of martyrs, and saints, and angels, the objects of popular veneration. The loosing of the four angels at the Euphrates is supposed to indicate the setting in motion from the fastnesses of Asia Minor of the Turks, who began their victorious career, which resulted finally in the conquest of Constantinople. As an illustration of verse 18, it is notorious that gunpowder was first employed at the siege of the seat of the Eastern Empire.

Others, like myself, do not confine themselves to the historical method of interpretation, but see also in these chapters the incursion of those fleshly lusts that war against the soul, or to evils that have invaded, or shall invade, the Church of Christ. This at least is clear, that they who have the seal of God on their foreheads cannot be hurt. He allows their enemies and his to flourish like a green bay-tree, but it is only for a little time, and to achieve his own purposes, and then they are cut off; but He will not allow a hair of the head of those who have entered into covenant with Him to perish. He hath set apart him that is godly for Himself. "They shall be mine, in that day when I make up my jewels."

The little book is supposed by most commentators to contain the revelation of the purposes of God, such as is given in the following chapter or chapters. And it is interesting to realize that the history of this world is not allowed to be shaped merely by the unruly wills and passions of men. A Divine plan threads the whole series of events. Men think they are free, and act as though they were, but they are only realizing what God has determined before should be done. The sin and evil by which their actions are marked, is no part of the Divine plan, for God would bring about the same results by perfectly holy and righteous methods, if only men lived according to his will.

The veil is therefore withdrawn for us in these words, and we find that God's strong angels are standing behind the development of modern history. This mighty angel may be our Lord Himself, by whom all things consist, and we have here an emblematical display of his glory. He is clothed with a cloud to veil the splendour of his appearance, and as an emblem of the darkness of the dispensations which were predicted. But a rainbow, a perfect circle, surrounds his head, signifying the covenant of grace. He solemnly swears that there shall be no further delay in the execution of his purposes, which are now communicated in mystic figure to his servant. John found great sweetness in hearing the revelation of the Divine mind; it was sweet as honey to him; but when he had had time to meditate on all he heard, it was very bitter to contemplate the suffering and sorrow through which alone God's plan would be consummated. But the end would be blessed. The mystery of God would end according to "the good tidings declared of old to the prophets" (verse 7).

TUESDAY, January 14. Revelation xi.

It is impossible in the brief compass of this note to indicate the various interpretations of this chapter, but there are certain great principles beneath it, which are true of every age. (1) During the darkest ages, men have been raised up to bear a decided testimony against the prevailing corruptions of their times, and especially against the Romish Church. It has been the interest and practice of their opponents to silence their testimony, to blacken their character, or to destroy them as heretics; but in spite of all such efforts, our Lord has never been without his faithful witnesses, whether in the valleys of Piedmont or the mountains of Bulgaria. (2) At times when the enemies of the truth have deemed themselves triumphant, there has been a rekindling of Gospel testimony. A few years before the appearance of Luther, a medal was struck to celebrate the extinction of so-called heresy.

(3) Such witness-bearing, as suggested by the comparison with the olive-trees of Zechariah's vision, is fed from the heart of Christ. He is the root of the martyr-line; his spirit the breath and inspiration of Protestantism. O my friends, are you part of that long line of witnesses? Have you caught up from saintly hands the torch? In these dark days, when the Roman Catholic Church is pouring monks, nuns, Jesuits, and priests into our country and poisoning our Press, is your voice raised in protest against the encroachments of the Papacy, whether in the Church of England or without? At least let us not cease to pray; that we, too, may be able to rejoice when the tide turns and the Lord shall take his great power and reign. In the meanwhile God is in his heaven, and his covenant abideth.

WEDNESDAY, January 15. Revelation xii.

Bishop Newton thinks that the first part of the Book of Revelation closes with the end of the foregoing chapter, and that the same course of events, which had already been described under one set of figures, is described again under another set in the chapters which follow. "This latter part," he says, "is designed as a supplement to the former, to complete what was deficient, to explain what was dubious, to illustrate what was obscure." If this interpretation be adopted, we are taken back to the early struggle between the Church of Christ and Paganism, which resulted in the overthrow of the Pagan emperors, and the establishment of Christianity as the dominant force in Europe.

But probably we shall get more direct help for ourselves from this chapter if we remember the inveterate hatred, and ceaseless hostility, with which Satan regards not only the Church, but each believer. We may well flee from his attacks to hide ourselves in the safe keeping of our Saviour. Our Michael fights for us, and the dragon has no power against Him. We, too, shall overcome if we use as our talisman the Blood, and as our weapon, the Sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God. Bear witness, child of God, against sin, not arrogantly or boastfully, but humbly and meekly. As the darkness cannot resist the light, so evil cannot stand against the faithful protest of the child of God. You may suffer for your protest, but it will prevail; and as for yourself—love not your life unto the death. To the end there must be war between the Seed of the woman and the dragon, and there must be bruising. But, be of good cheer, Satan is cast out of heaven. In all our failures and sins, he is no longer able to put his own malign interpretation, as was the case in Zech. iii.

THURSDAY, January 16. Revelation xiii.

The Apostle, standing on the shore, sees a savage beast rise out of the sea. All interpreters agree that either Pagan or Papal Rome is hereby intended. Imperial Rome was often called the Eternal City, and the Goddess of the whole earth, names of blasphemy indeed! And Papal Rome adopted the same after her fall. Some explain the chapter, that the first beast stands for Pagan Rome, and that the deadly wound inflicted on its head indicates the revolution which took place when the Pagan empire was overthrown, whilst the second beast represents Roman Catholicism, which incarnates all the old arrogant persecuting power under a lamb-like exterior. The inquisitors, with a disgusting affectation of lamb-like meekness, were wont to beseech the civil magistrates to show mercy to those whom they had themselves adjudged to the flames.

In the war with the saints, carried on by Rome under her two-fold guise, she has secured the appearance of victory. No computation can reach the numbers, says Thomas Scott, who have been put to death in various ways for maintaining the Gospel, and protesting against the evils of the opposing system, whether of idolatry or Romanism. A million of the poor Waldenses perished in their native valleys; nine hundred thousand Christians were slain in less than thirty years after the institution of the Inquisition; the Duke of Alva boasted of having put thirty-six thousand to death in the Netherlands; but the total amount will never be known, till the earth shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain.

How thankful we should be that by the blood of our forefathers we inherit a blessed immunity from suffering for the faith by fire and sword; but let us take care to hand down this inheritance to our children. There is every symptom of a grave conspiracy against the Protestant faith.

FRIDAY, January 17. Revelation xiv.

The 144,000 surely represent the Church of Christ, and as the followers of the beast have his mark and name impressed on them, so these have the seal and name of God. Note their purity, their obedience to the Lamb whom they follow, and their familiarity with the song of heaven.

The three angels that issue forth are thought to be the heralds of successive movements against the corruption and evil around. The first is said to represent the Albigenses; the second, John Huss and Jerome, whose martyrdoms at Constance are an undying infamy; the third, Luther. But all these protests cost oceans of blood. Thousands of whom the world was not worthy were called to lay down their lives. There is, therefore, special appropriateness in the Benediction passed on those who die in the Lord, an assurance which is ratified by the Amen of the Spirit. Mark the emphasis of that word, "Henceforth." The blessedness of the holy dead begins from the moment of what we call death.

The harvest surely stands for the blessed revival work which has again and again, especially in these later years, visited the earth; and it is only after the harvest is gathered in, that the vintage will follow, of wrath and tribulation on those who know not, and refuse, the love of God in Christ.

SATURDAY, January 18. Revelation xv.

When I was traversing the Mediterranean, I saw more than once the sea of glass mingled with fire. The ocean was so absolutely motionless that it seemed an expanse of solid blue; and when the sun rose or set, and its beams lay level across the water, it seemed as though the sea of glass were really bathed in fire. Thus the Red Sea may have seemed to the children of Israel, when, on the morning after their passage, they stood on its shores, and celebrated their victory. This is the scene which supplies the imagery here, where the victors stand on the further side of life's tempestuous ocean, and will look back on it, to find the storms over, so far as they are concerned, whilst their foes will never be able to vex them again.

What a song will break from those redeemed myriads, blending the two covenants, engaging the children of Abraham and the Church of the first-born, all dispensations uniting in the one song! Suspend your judgment of the ways of the Almighty, till your feet tread those triumphant shores! There will be no disputing then of the righteousness and wisdom of God's dealings either with the history of the world, or with our individual lives. God's works will be seen to be great and marvellous, his ways righteous and true, his Name fearful and glorious, and his character holy.

From this radiant vision, we turn to the condition of the world—godless, careless, and about to be visited by the last plagues. Our hearts misgive us as we contemplate the doom so soon to overtake it. Is there nothing more to be done to warn and arrest its course, which seems to be descending deeper and deeper into the midnight? Poor world, that wilt not have the light of Christ's own Gospel! F. Training Basuto Evangelists.

By Rev. ALFRED CASALIS, B.D.,
Paris Missionary Society.

THE native evangelists have played a most important part in the development of the Basutoland Mission. Without them, the Mission would be crippled to-day. With their help, we hope soon to have the whole tribe evangelized. I propose to give some account of the Morija Bible School, of which I have been director for the last seven years.

Soon after the foundation of the Mission in Basutoland, the workers made the joyful discovery that a converted native could easily be made use of in the work. The Basuto people are fluent speakers; their language is picturesque, and their native simplicity leaves them free from shyness. Our schools go to prove also that the Basuto are capable of considerable intellectual development; neither are they wanting in a certain amount of enthusiasm as regards general or elevated ideas.

THE CALL FOR NATIVE WORKERS.

The Mission was thus, from the very outset able to re-inforce itself with useful workers. That just such helps were needed, was a self-evident fact. Those who have any experience in mission work, know that each country must at length be evangelized by its own native Christians. Whatever the methods employed, or the circumstances to be considered, the aim is, and must be, the same—the evangelization of the heathen by native Christians. In Basutoland this natural development was long delayed by circumstances. The existence of the Mission was frequently jeopardized by wars with neighbouring states. As soon as peace was established, the Mission made better headway. Nowadays the weakening of heathenism as a social power helps on the progress of Christianity, which is advancing with rapid strides.

In 1872 the different churches of Basutoland had grown to such an extent that it was considered advisable to lessen the number of members of each church; this was effected by the foundation of outstations in each missionary district. Men specially trained for the task of directing those outstations had to be found. In order to supply this need, Mr. Mabille founded, in 1872, the Preparatory School (now known as the Normal Training School), and in 1882 the Bible School.

THE MATERIAL PROVIDED.

Since its foundation, this school has risen steadily, and its great utility has been proved times and again. In the year of its foundation there were twenty-nine pupils at the Bible School, twenty-one of whom completed their studies, and in due time took up mission work. Since then, up to 1898, 350 young men have been trained in this school; 209 of these are now workers, either in Basutoland, the Transvaal, the Orange River Colony, Bechuanaland, or the French Zambesi mission.

A fact worthy of notice is that the Bible School does not work for Basutoland alone. A goodly proportion of the scholars are sent to it by missionaries representing divers agencies at work in South Africa. This year, out of fifty-four pupils, nine belong to tribes inhabiting the Transvaal, two are Bamangwato (Khama's tribe) another hails from the Lake Ngami; others were from Zambesia, the Orange River Colony, and the Cape Colony.

Many of the pupils come on their own responsibility, not being sent by any missionary society; when they leave the school, they have to look out for work for themselves. The pupils from Khama's country and the Lake Ngami belong to the last category. Those men came from Palapye to Morija mostly on foot, with their families, covering a distance of about 700 miles, a wonderful instance of perseverance and of what the desire to learn can accomplish.

Sesuto is the most widespread native language of South Africa. Far away on the banks of the Zambesi many of Lewanika's subjects (the Barotse) understand and speak it. So that the workers can easily understand those strangers who, on the other hand, soon master the language of the country.

THE COURSE OF STUDY.

The School tries to make the best of those rough diamonds, and to give them good primary instruction, in keeping with the necessities of the work. Above all, there must be piety and a thorough knowledge of the Bible. On the other hand, such as are capable of studying soon make up for lost time. For instance, one of the scholars, who could barely read and write Sesuto when he arrived at Morija, passed the Cape elementary examination with success after studying for five years.

The studies are divided into two parts—Biblical and elementary. The teaching of the Bible is in my hands, and occupies as a rule three hours every morning. Miss H. Cochet, with native assistants, gives lessons on elementary subjects. Besides these, there are supplementary lessons, more especially singing, in the tonic sol-fa notation, which is entrusted to one of the teachers, Mikael Mofokeng, an excellent musician. The programme of Biblical studies, extending over four years, is as follows: Reading and expounding of the New Testament and of part of the Old; Short Introduction to the Bible; Life of Jesus Christ; the History of Israel; and the principal periods of Church History (Primitive Church and the two first centuries, Middle Ages and the Reformation).

PASTOR ALF. CASALIS.

Unfortunately, there are no text-books in the native language; this makes it difficult for pupils, in spite of their excellent memories, to master even the elements of Biblical Theology. Consequently, the pupils lose much precious time in copying out lessons written by their teachers. Within the last five years efforts have been made to add to the Sesuto literature, and several of the workers are preparing commentaries and various other books for the press.

A native evangelist who has mastered the general outlines of truth, and become well acquainted with the Gospels and Epistles, should be equipped for ministry. Unfortunately, once he sets to work, he feels the want of books and of time for study; he is either isolated or surrounded by people who know absolutely nothing concerning such subjects. Here, as elsewhere, school teaching is but a foundation; it is subsequent personal work that is fruitful. Some of the evangelists subsist as best they can on what they acquired at School; consequently they soon become tedious preachers.

Those who continue to read and study their Bibles, with no other help but that of the Holy Spirit, manage to progress and keep their flocks alive. Thank God a great many belong to this latter class. Others, again, after working for several years, come back to School; as, for instance, three years ago, an evangelist over fifty years old, and whose name is well-known in the Zambesi and even in Europe. This man has preached for thirty years twice every Sunday. He held the services at Morija the other day, and he is certainly neither rusty nor worn out; his sermons are original and inspiring. He came to Morija again, and followed the Bible lessons day after day. Never was a more attentive pupil.

WAYS AND MEANS.

The Bible School is supported neither by a committee, nor a missionary conference, nor the Government. When it was first founded, a group of ladies at Geneva organized a committee which provides some £200 or £250 a year, the proceeds of an annual sale. This ladies' committee is indefatigable in its efforts, and their contribution forms the best part of the income. About £50 received from different subscribers, and the board paid by the students, makes out from £500 to £600, which constitutes our annual income, which, however, is often exceeded by expenses. The board paid by Basuto (£3 per annum) is insufficient, but one must remember that those men are to work with a salary of £12 a year.

The Bible School is not a financial enterprise; it is purely mission work. The workers have managed to get along so far without luxuries, to be sure, and even without what are considered as bare necessaries in similar institutions; but have never wanted for daily bread. Occasionally lady friends in France and in Switzerland send clothing for the scholars, shirts made at sewing-meetings, &c. Those garments are highly appreciated by the receivers.

Pastor Casalis has a remarkable story to tell, and it is a pleasure to announce that he will soon be visiting Great Britain, and interesting Christian audiences on the subject. The Basutoland Mission is solving the problem of native evangelism, and to a large extent it is self-supporting. It means much to say that the Basuto Christians raise from £3,000 to £4,000 a year in furtherance of Gospel work in South Africa. It is the joy of the London Committee to collect subscriptions in aid. The present moment is specially favourable to development. Friends who can arrange meetings are requested to communicate with Mr. Sutherland Taylor, 25, Brownswood Road, Clissold Park, N. Pastor Casalis comes to London in February, and already sixteen meetings have been arranged.

English, Boer, and Kaffir
in Christian Worship.

IN a recent letter, Rev. Samuel J. Helm, of Grahamstown, Cape Colony, who, with his son and daughter, visited England in 1896, seeking help for a new church, writes to us:—

"Mrs. Helm and myself are in splendid health and vigour, plodding away in our work among the coloured people. We cannot complain that the war has much interfered with our work, for although we are under Martial Law the Commandant is most considerate, and makes matters as agreeable as possible. Of course, as may be expected, there are restrictions, but they do not hamper us.

"The only part of my work that has suffered is in the district of Alexandria. Until the beginning of this month I was not allowed to conduct service there. The people were not permitted to come into the village from the surrounding farms. But last Sunday week we were again allowed to have service, the first time this year. We had a glorious day. The chapel was crowded, both morning and evening, and I had the pleasure of receiving many into the fellowship of the Church.

"A great many of the Dutch (Boers) attended the evening service, and joined heartily with their coloured brethren in the praise and worship of their common Lord and Saviour. A number of these Dutch farmers are most earnest and sincere Christians. Some of them frequently conduct the service for me, and preach to the people most acceptably. On some farms they have prayer meetings, mixed white and coloured, and the coloured take part in them. . . .

"You will remember my trying to raise money to build a new church. I have an offer of £1,000 for the old one. A new one will cost £1,500, so I am afraid we shall have to let it drop. We have £200 in hand, but my people are too poor to incur a debt of £300."

We cannot but hope that the balance of £300 necessary to provide the new church will be speedily subscribed.

"In His Presence."

THE STORY OF THE LATE MR. W. J. GOVAN.

AMONG Scottish Christian poets of the present generation, the late Mr. WILLIAM J. GOVAN endeared himself to many hearts by his true interpretation of the beauty and blessedness of the life that is hid with Christ in God. He was also for many years recognised as a powerful speaker in gatherings of believers as well as in general evangelistic effort. It was a godly family circle in Glasgow, in which he was brought up, a fact well attested in the present generation.

His father, Mr. William Govan, sen., took a prominent part in the municipal and political affairs of the city, especially in such social movements as those for the advancement of temperance and purity, in addition to more definitely religious work. On the first visit of Messrs. Moody and Sankey to Glasgow, Mr. Govan threw himself heartily into the work, and from that time his interest and energies—beyond the requirements of his business—were almost entirely devoted to it. He followed the evangelists to London at the time of their first mission there, and the family still treasure a large "Moody" Bible, on the fly-leaf of which is written—"Admit Mr. Govan to all my meetings.—D. L. Moody." This was to obviate the necessity of getting tickets for the crowded meetings.

Mr. Govan died in September, 1883. On the evening before falling into his last illness he spoke at the Mizpah Band meeting in Cowcaddens Free Church, Glasgow, his text being, "It is appointed unto men once to die, and after this the judgment."

Of the family of twelve, Mr. Wm. J. Govan was the eldest. Mr. Arthur Govan, the second son, was, for a number of years, leader of the Schoolboys' Meeting, founded in Glasgow at the time of Mr. Moody's first visit, and which is still continued under the direction of Mr. J. W. Arthur. The much loved director of the Faith Mission, Mr. John George Govan, was the fourth son; and others of the family are known in various branches of Christian work. The subject of our sketch married, in 1867, a daughter of Mr. Robert Steel, of Inveraray, subsequently of Dunfermline; who died in 1876, leaving a daughter and two sons. The sudden death of the daughter in 1896 was a severe blow to Mr. Govan, and in the following years he aged rapidly.

It was on September 28, while Mr. Govan was attending the meetings of the annual convention for the deepening of spiritual life, held by the Faith Mission at Rothesay, that the home-call came. The bodily weakness of the previous two years had for some months been less marked. The final seizure came with startling suddenness. At the Saturday morning gathering it was made known that the doctors held out only the slenderest hope of recovery, and later in the day came the announcement that the dear friend for whom many prayers had gone up had entered into his rest. A real sense of personal bereavement pervaded the whole gathering; and the later hours were marked by a profound realization of the nearness of the King.

Speaking of early days, when they were associated in Christian work, Mr. Walter B. Sloan (of the China Inland Mission) recalls with deepest satisfaction the feelings with which, about twenty-five years ago, he became teacher of a class in the Boys' Religious Society, at Grove Street Home Mission Institute, Glasgow, Mr. Govan being superintendent. Mr. Sloan adds:—

> He was most systematic, and I have before me the roll-books in which he entered the names of the boys, with his notes regarding them. One was always impressed with the deep personal interest that he took in each, and his influence upon the teachers was stimulating and helpful. In addition to the oversight of all the classes, he conducted a sort of fellowship meeting for those lads who had made a distinct profession of conversion.
> In seeking to form some estimate of our brother's character and influence, two aspects seem to have been outstanding. The first was his earnest zeal. No one who knew him intimately could help realizing that he sought first the kingdom of God with unchanging devotion, so that to think of his life as in any way separate from its relationship with the Kingdom of God seems impossible. The second feature was his kindly sympathy. As he was of a very retiring—almost shrinking—disposition, many might fail to understand how deeply sympathetic a nature his was.

The trend of Mr. Govan's thoughts and aspirations was indicated by the fact that when the Holiness Convention was held at Brighton in 1875 he attended, and found embodied and systematized in the new movement the truths he had been feeling after. A time of rich blessing had been experienced among the lads in Grove Street in 1874. Those who came out on the Lord's side were formed into a Christian Union, which met for Bible study, and were encouraged in a life of witness-bearing among their friends and companions. "Not I, but Christ," was the motto of the Union, and at the weekly meetings the leader expounded to the members the truth of the fuller life in Christ as it was growing before his own mind. The longing for a manifestation of the power of God in themselves reached a crisis in the autumn of 1877, and in a special time of prayer following one of their regular gatherings they felt that they had received their long-desired enduement. Mr. Govan not being of the company at the time, though the hour was late, they made their way to him at once. He entered fully into their joy, and to the last kept himself in touch with them.

Mr. Govan's own testimony, given in the tent at Keswick, was:—

> My Christian life was very unsatisfactory, and my heart went out for some way of deliverance. I said, "Lord, give me holiness, at whatever cost." He took me at my word, and He did put me to great trials. Now He has brought me to this, that I do not say, "Give me holiness at whatever cost," but I say, "Lord, let me know Thee at any cost," because if I have Him I have all. Look for the Lord Himself. At that time I had a very fluctuating experience. The Lord came and spoke to me often in his Word, but I think I must be the most unbelieving fellow in the tent, it took so long for me to trust. One verse He gave me was, "Arise, shine, for thy light is come." Then this came, "O that Thou wouldst rend the heavens and come down!" and this, "The voice of my Beloved! behold He cometh leaping upon the mountains, and skipping upon the hills." I saw that Christ was far more anxious to come to me than I was to have Him, and He gave me such a filling that night as I never had before. So again and again He comes to me, and speaks in a voice that I can hear, and that I know. It is generally a new insight into Scripture; and it makes a difference in my life. I have uniform victory over voluntary sins, and such a consciousness of his presence as if He were standing by.

Mr. Govan was known among God's people in many parts of the country as a valued guide in spiritual things. Deeply taught of God himself, he was a welcome speaker at conventions, conferences, prayer-unions, and other gatherings. One friend writes:

> I trust I shall never cease to be grateful for the benefit derived from his teaching and fellowship. Some of his addresses and Bible-readings made a lasting impression on my mind, opening up new realms of thought and devotion. Specially helpful, however, were our walks in the woods, or along the shore; and when he called to invite me out for "a turn," it was often that we might talk over some phase of spiritual truth or experience.

We quote the following from IN HIS PRESENCE (2s. net. Christian Literature Company, Lochrin Terrace, Edinburgh), in which Mr. Govan has made a valuable addition to the poetry of the Christian life. The pieces were written "in the Spirit," and have come with power to many readers.

FULL SALVATION.

I know the Lamb of God
Has borne away my sin;
Made nigh in Jesu's blood, I pray,
Lord, make me pure within.

To praise Thee as I would,
I must from sin be free;
If I but rise to fall again,
What means my boast in Thee?

How can my soul be glad
If evil reign within?
How can I speak thy power to save,
And I not saved from sin?

How can I have thy peace,
If faith so often fail,
If, since I am not wholly thine
The hosts of sin prevail?

I know Thou hast the power,
And willing art to save,
The love that bore the Cross is thine
The strength that rent the grave.

And Thou canst surely dwell
As monarch in my heart;
For mightier far than might of hell
Thou, God Almighty, art.

Jesus, declare thy Name!
I trust Thee, heart and soul—
Thy blood to cleanse away my sin,
Thy grace to make me whole.

A Dean on Theatres.—Denouncing the love of what is termed "sport," and the increased development of theatre-going, the Dean of Manchester says: "Expenditure on it grows apace. No characteristic more strongly marked the closing years of the nineteenth century than the multiplication of theatres and places of amusement, at which the plays and performances are too often associated with a very unhealthy stimulant and indelicacy of sentiment, to say the least—and I know something of what I am talking about—so that it is very difficult to find a theatre to which it is safe to go; whilst our national games have in many instances degenerated into mere spectacles for the entertainment of lookers-on, not unmixed with a gambling spirit and a spurious love of sport—if it deserve the name of sport."

Where Jews Abound.

WE have passed through Germany, where Jews are influential, especially on the Press, disliked, but not persecuted. The wealthy among them occupy some of the finest houses in the best situations, and do not shrink from displaying their wealth. Austria, where nearly all the newspapers are in their hands, and where they are powerful and (their poorer members) persecuted, Hungary, which is, they say, their paradise, so that the Zionist movement is looked at askance.

There are various things to be said about this scattered nation, beloved of God for the fathers' sakes. Just now, being on a missionary tour, the following thoughts, resulting from recent observation at home and abroad, may not be without interest.

Letter held by, spirit scanted,
Saw the synagogue supplanted.

The pendulum has in these last days swung over from the (often imperfect) spiritual interpretation of earlier ages to a severe and sometimes barren and erroneous literalism. The Jews gave an exclusively literal interpretation, which closed their eyes and ears to the revelations of God. When Jesus said, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up," they thought that He spoke of the literal temple; "but He spake of the temple of his body." When He said, "Ye must be born again," Nicodemus, with a bald literalism, asked, "How can a man be born when he is old?" But Jesus spoke not of natural, but of spiritual birth. "That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again."

The cup and the water are necessary to each other. The cup is useless except as a vehicle for the water; the water cannot be gathered up or held together without the cup. The letter is the vehicle by which the spirit and life are conveyed. A sound exposition of the Word is essential to an accurate perception of the spiritual truth which it contains. Apart from that, the spiritualizing of Scripture is a mere effort of the mind; and the intellect and the imagination may run into every kind of error.

It has been said that former expositors handed over the curses of the Old Testament to the Jew, and reserved its blessings for the Church. Is it not well to go a little deeper, and inquire the reason of this seeming want of fairness? Light on the future of the Jews is believed to have broken out of the written Word in these latter days. But our forefathers were not devoid of spiritual perception or of common-sense. They knew that the Legal dispensation existed for the purpose of proving human nature, whether man, as born of Adam and depraved by sin, would keep God's commandments or no. They also knew that Israel was Jehovah's vine, and the men of Judah his pleasant plant; and that when He sought grapes He found poisonous berries; that "He looked for judgment, but behold, oppression; for righteousness, but behold, a cry."

"Behold! Oppression!" For "He was oppressed, and He was afflicted, yet He opened not his mouth. He was led as a lamb to the slaughter." "Behold! A cry!" "Crucify Him! Crucify Him!" (Isa. v., liii.)

Those expositors also knew that the Church is that chosen generation, that royal priesthood, that holy nation, that people of God's own possession, which by union with the crucified, risen, and glorified Christ, has been raised out of the region of the curse, and blessed by the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, with every spiritual blessing in heavenly places and heavenly things, in Christ (Eph. i.)

By the Church as here defined we understand to be included the men of faith from Abel or from Adam onward, as many as, like Abraham, have believed God, and have seen the day of Jesus and been glad; as many as saw the promises from afar, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth (Heb. xi.).

Our fathers, looking at the dispensations from their point of view, were not without Scripture warrant, "for as many as are of the works of the Law are under the curse" (Gal. iii. 10); and there is no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus.

Nationally, the Jewish people are under the curse; and the Church of Christ, the Church which is in God the Father, is the body of which Christ is the Head, the fulness of Him that filleth all in all. But individually all of every nation, and through all time, who have believed God, are blessed with believing Abraham; and all of every nation, and through all time, who have gone about to establish their own righteousness, and have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God, revealed to them in nature or in grace (Rom. i. 20; Titus ii. 11), are under the curse.

The Apostle Paul divided mankind into three classes—"Give none offence to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, nor to the Church of God" (1 Cor. x. 13). It has been well, if quaintly, said, that when a Jew is born again he is un-Jewed, and when a Gentile is born again, he is un-Gentiled; for then each belongs to the Church of God. Of course, the Jew remains a Jew, as an Englishman remains an Englishman; but in Christ there is no distinction between Jew and Gentile, male and female, bond and free; all are one in Christ Jesus.

Earth's small distinctions vanish here;
To-day the young, the old,
The Saviour and his flock appear,
One Shepherd and one fold.

"Only a broken-hearted sinner can receive a crucified Christ." Not by argument, which ministers to his self-importance, but by convicting him of sin; not through the intellect, but through the heart; not nationally, but individually, must Jew and Gentile alike be saved, if saved at all. There is no surer way to stumble a Jew on his way to God than to foster the racial pride to which he is so prone.

The Zionist Congress.

THE meetings of the Zionist Congress, held at Basle last week, were very largely attended. Reviewing the proceedings, the Jewish Chronicle says: "The Congress has been called the Jewish Parliament, though it can hardly be regarded as representative of all the Jewish people. But if it is to receive this somewhat grandiloquent name, then it must in fairness be admitted that it bears favourable comparison with most of the other parliamentary bodies that fret and fume and sometimes legislate in Europe. In sheer picturesqueness, a body whose members hail from places so far apart as Astrachan and London, Manchuria and Canada, is difficult to rival." We give brief excerpts from three of the most important addresses:—

UNHAPPY AND UNSETTLED.

The Jewish proletariat to-day is not only the poorest and most unhappy, but also the most unsettled and the most disquieting. Wandering continually, and in great numbers, from one misery to another, we can see how great their present wretchedness must be when they expose themselves to the despair of such a migration to seek out a new misery. To make this proletariat settled and industrious were in itself a gigantic task, apart from national or religious considerations. You know that many have attempted the task before us, with a good will and also with great material means. You know, too, that the attempts have failed. Why? Because they started from a wrong standpoint. They thought: "First—money!" No! Gold will procure dependents, a people is not to be so moved. Only an idea can do that. An idea has done it!—Dr. Theodor Herzl.

A GREAT CHANGE.

Zionism does not propose to pauperise the people of Israel, but to redeem the land of Israel. And, therefore, I beg of you not to fritter away your money by starting businesses here and there, however profitable, for then your capital would be locked up, and not available when needed in a great sum. Use your money only to prepare a home for our wandering people. Our old home is in ruins, alas! And yet if it had not been in ruins it would not have been empty, it would not have been waiting for us. Give no alms to Jews; give them only wages for their share in the agricultural and industrial development of Palestine. I stand here and see delegates from all the lands of the Exile who still cry, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, may my right hand forget its cunning." That is miracle enough. Zionism is living and anti-Zionism in its coffin. What are five years in the life of a nation? Five years—when we have waited eighteen centuries! It may be that none of us is destined to see this great hope fulfilled; it may be that Dr. Herzl, like Moses, will but gaze upon the Promised Land. Yet, even so we are content, if we have helped to shape a practical policy towards the future, content if it shall be written of us—They found chaos and corruption; they left idealism and purpose.—Mr. Israel Zangwill.

CONDITION OF THE JEWISH PEOPLE.

The Jewish people, taken as a whole, are incomparably the poorest of all the peoples of the earth. The merest savages are incontestably richer than we are. The Eskimos have the right, the room, and the material to build their snow-huts how and where they will, and to hunt seals where they can. Even the Fire-worshippers can kindle their fire and fish where they choose. The Jewish people alone has not the right to give unrestricted play to its energies, to satisfy its most essential physical needs. While, economically, it is worse situated than the poorest savages, it still has all the needs of civilized beings, increased by certain expensive needs of a religious nature that a non-Jew does not know.

Admitting the well-known exceptions that confirm the rule, we may say in general that every Jew who becomes a millionaire is a Jew lost to Judaism. If a Jew becomes extraordinarily wealthy, it is naturally good for him, probably also good for his country; but for the Jewish people his wealth is a source of weakness rather than of strength.

In the sweating dens of East London and New York, the Jewish day-worker has no more freedom than in Russia, Galicia and Roumania. Let him remain where he is. He can there learn there the trade which he wants to learn in London. He can there make the clothes and boots which he makes in London. And he could send his goods to the markets of the world instead of travelling himself. If he earns the money at home which he might make by working in London, he is almost in good circumstances. What is a starvation wage in London, is a living wage in Minsk or Wilna, Jassy, or Galatz. And the workman is not torn from his family, his circle, and his habits.

Organization! this is the first and last word on the economic subject. And what is more competent to organize the helpless chaotic Jewish mass than Zionism? Let it take in hand the formation of co-operative societies. By this means it will give bread to the hungry, lead those who have been neglected into the paths of discipline, and convert weeping and helpless beggars into energetic and reliable future citizens of Zion.—Dr. Max Nordau.

A Call from Cherbourg.

CHERBOURG, at but a few hours' distance from several of our ports, carries on a considerable trade with England, and is frequented by a number of British vessels. I am just now spending three or four days here, and am struck by the fact that the sailors now in port have nowhere to go but to the public-house, not even a meeting of any kind on Sunday. I was otherwise occupied, and able but imperfectly to visit the ships in port, but had the pleasure during my stay of gathering together in the French Methodist Mission room twenty-five of my own countrymen. Some of the dozen vessels now here come regularly to Cherbourg, and some of the men present begged that something might be done that they might have meetings every Sunday. I promised to do what I could.

The shipping probably would not justify a society going to the expense of placing here a paid agent, of having a room, &c.; but any Christian friends (preferably man and wife) having private means, and wishing to settle where they might be of real help in the Master's vineyard, could not do better than to think prayerfully of coming here. Hundreds of British residents congregate at Dinard and St. Malo, or go on account of health a few miles from Cherbourg to the Channel Islands. If but some Christian couple reading these lines would examine if there be not here a Macedonian call to them! They can obtain information by writing to Monsieur le Pasteur Boisson, 17, Rue Louis Philippe, Cherbourg, France.—Yours in the Master's service, Geo. Whelpton.

The Evangelization Society.

IN spite of the difficulties of the season, a gathering of the evangelists of the above Society was held in Freemason's Hall, Great Queen Street, some days ago, when a few friends kindly joined for praise and prayer. The hon. secretary presided, and was supported by Rev. H. B. Macartney, Rev. F. Oliphant, Colonel Owen Hay, D.S.A.G., Messrs. Robert Barclay, W. H. Seagram, M. H. Foquet Sutton, W. G. Bradshaw, T. A. Denny, &c.

Praise was given that the work had been not only sustained but considerably extended during the past year. In the last eight months 14,143 meetings had been taken by 251 evangelists, and it was reported that, although sometimes there had been anxiety about money, yet God's faithfulness had never failed. Regret was expressed that so many of the supporters know comparatively little of the testimony to the permanent blessing granted to the work of these evangelists in many parts of the kingdom.

Colonel OWEN HAY asked, How did the Apostles, the earliest preachers, carry out the great commission? These men spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. We see a marked difference in their presentation of the Truth to the Jew and to the Gentile. The Gospel of the Cross came to the Jews as a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks it was foolishness; yet nevertheless it proved, then as now, God's power unto salvation. The Colonel proceeded to show that though God's sovereignty was everywhere seen, yet the discourses of which the Acts give us notes, were definite and direct, embracing statement and appeal; thus they went straight home to the hearts of the hearers. A perfect naturalness of manner is apparent, without any tendency to a laboured and heavy style. Their thoughts were clothed in simple language, so that a child might understand, and yet the glorious truths set forth were so profound that the greatest intellect could not fathom them. Their subject was Jesus—his life, his death, his resurrection, his coming again; and that, too, in days when his name was held in ignominy and contempt because of the felon's death which He, as sinbearer, died. But in due time that Name shook the world! The Holy Ghost fell on those who heard the Word, and multitudes believed.

It is still further to be noted that these early evangelists appealed to Scripture at every turn; those Scriptures which were our Saviour's Bible, which He loved so much and knew so intimately. The great foundation of the New Testament, and its only explanation, are in the Old. Leviticus alone fully explains many New Testament Scriptures. In Leviticus, the Atonement, the Resurrection, the Enthronement, are to be found in picture and type; indeed, throughout the Old Testament, the infinite preciousness of the work of Christ, which no tongue can tell, is set forth, that precious work which is all sufficient and complete, the Cross which must ever be in the forefront of all preaching worthy the name.

Rev. H. B. MACARTNEY took as the basis of his address the five points of the Society. We need to know and to preach Christ crucified for us, and also that we as believers are crucified with Him. Here is St. Paul's secret of victory, "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." In this busy age in which we live, let us see to it that the spirit of prayer is not allowed to be a substitute for seasons of prayer. We must have fellowship with God through the Word, and gain power from the prayerful study of the Word, if we are to use it skilfully in dealing with others, especially with anxious inquirers. A few timely words on each of the five points were skilfully introduced.

"Herbert Fry's Royal Guide to the London Charities" is a compilation of great practical interest. It shows in alphabetical order the name, date of foundation, address, objects, annual income, chief officials, &c., of the many philanthropic institutions of the metropolis. It is edited by John Lane, and the thirty-eighth annual edition is now issued. We find this book of great service daily. (1s. 6d. Chatto & Windus.)

A Prodigal Son.

THE story which follows was told recently by a commercial traveller in a meeting conducted by Mr. Leonard Weaver at Hastings. It referred to an experience in connection with the London Tent Campaign:—

"One evening, coming out of the Islington tent, I noticed a poor, wretched, and most despicable-looking man asking one of the workers for monetary assistance. He turned to me, asking me also for help.

"I considered what Christ would have done under the circumstance, and then took him to an eating house situated close to the Agricultural Hall, gave him a good supper, and also paid for his bed and breakfast, not forgetting to set before him the way of salvation.

"For six weeks, during my absence from the city, I constantly and prayerfully thought of him, and on my return, passing along Upper Street, Islington, I casually looked at the coffee house referred to, and was startled to see the same man standing outside.

"I immediately crossed to him, and said, 'Friend, are you hungry?'

"'What do you say?' he asked.

"'Friend, are you hungry?' I reiterated.

"'Friend!' said he, 'I have not one in the world.'

"I took him again into the coffee house and gave him a good meal, and he then volunteered to tell me his pitiful story. Nineteen years ago he ran away from home. By breaking open a missionary box he secured a little money and started for Birkenhead. From there he worked his way to America, and for seventeen years tramped from city to city.

"Two years ago he attended a mission service, and, hearing an old story of a mother's love to her wayward daughter, he was deeply moved and resolved to return to England. This he did, coming back to London in a cattle ship. For these many months he had been a homeless stranger in the great city, sleeping in parks when unable to secure sufficient money for a night's lodging.

"At length I induced him to give me his father's name and address, under the promise that I would write and see if he was willing to do anything for him. The next morning I received the following telegram: 'Keep in touch with my son; arrive Paddington 5 p.m.'

"I went to the station, and noticed, stepping from the train, a grey-headed, venerable-looking farmer. As I made myself known to him he inquired, with the greatest emotion, concerning his lost boy. He said he and his wife, the prodigal's mother, had never ceased to pray for the absent one, and they believed that God would give him back to them again.

"We took a hansom cab and drove immediately to the place where I had arranged the prodigal should be. I cannot describe the meeting. At first, the father did not recognize the boy, neither did the boy know the father; but when the assurance was given, the scene was one never to be forgotten. That night the father took his son to a hotel, provided everything that was necessary in clothing, &c., and the next morning before his return home, I took breakfast with them.

"Just before I left, the father took from his pocket his little Testament and read from the fifteenth chapter of Luke the words, 'Bring hither the fatted calf.' He said, 'My son, I have several of 'em at home, and you shall have which one you like.'"

The Hastings audience heard this story with much emotion. Before resuming his seat, the speaker read a touching note, telling of the repentant prodigal's well-being, and of the joy in that country home through the long-lost son's return.

Bible Class Federation.—Being deeply impressed with the large number of young people who come to London and from various causes drift away from religious influences, the Bible Class Federation is desirous of doing all in its power to welcome such persons, and to introduce them to some convenient church and Bible class. Communications should be addressed to Mr. R. M. Waterhouse, Maybank Road, South Woodford, Essex.

Christmas and New Year.

MISS MASON'S HOUSE OF REST.

AT the House of Rest a note was sounded which will echo throughout the year. Rev. H. B. MACARTNEY spoke on Rom. vii. and viii., and traced the Christian experience which leads to the death of self, with the subsequent resurrection into perfect liberty of life and service, through the merits and power of a risen Saviour. Miss MASON praised for answers to prayer offered at the beginning of 1901. Spiritual blessings had been vouchsafed to the visitors at the Houses, and all needs had been met. Rev. J. B. FIGGIS, of Brighton, spoke earnestly on the words, "Rejoicing in hope."

SEAMEN'S CHRISTIAN FRIEND SOCIETY.

Special gatherings were held at most of this Seamen's Christian Friend Society's Homes, Bethels and Rests. At the headquarters opposite the London Docks large companies of seamen of many nationalities were entertained. The closing meeting was one of much spiritual power and blessing. Mr. W. H. SEAGRAM and about a dozen earnest workers were engaged for over an hour leading anxious souls to the Saviour. When leaving, a Norse captain said, "I shall go back to my ship and call all hands to my cabin and pray with them."

THE HOME OF INDUSTRY.

It was not a juvenile party—for of the 200 guests over sixty belonged to the aged widows' sewing class, first started by Miss MACPHERSON after the cholera epidemic of 1866—but all were merry. That Miss Macpherson was in high favour was proved by the hearty clapping of the thin aged hands, as she came in to greet her guests. After the meal and a social chat, a New Year's address was given on the initial letters N.Y. A "New Yoke." Too many say "Not Yet," or listen to Satan as he says, "Not for You." All must give a No or a Yes. A happy New Year is for all who "Now Yield."

CENTRAL HALL, MANCHESTER.

The relief work has never been better organized. Over 8,000 poor children and 5,000 needy adults have been dealt with. Perhaps the best work has been done quietly in hundreds of homes where most worthy poor bear their distress without murmur or clamour for help. Had it not been for a large and self-denying band of workers, this effort to deal privately with these homes could not have been accomplished. We are very grateful to all the friends who have sent us money, provisions, clothing, &c., and thus enabled us in their name to do Christlike work. Day and night the work of rescue and relief is carried on throughout the year in the Mission.

(Rev.) S. F. COLLIER.

AMONG GLASGOW SAILORS.

There has been a ship loaded, on each side of the River Clyde, with gifts for the men who happened to be in port; and both houses were crowded with men, and interested spectators. On the North Mr. HUGH PATON and Rev. JOHN MCNEILL gave telling addresses, that must have gone home to men's hearts. Captain ROBINSON, after carrying troops to South Africa in successive voyages, was having his ship fitted for passengers; and, being in the habit of conducting daily religious services in his ship at sea, he held a meeting at the dock daily with the workmen at the dinner hour. He said, in his closing address, he had seen many Bethel meetings and Sailors' Rests, but he never met such soul-saving anywhere as in Glasgow.

Working Boys' Home.—The Home for Working Boys—established in 1897, by Lord Kinnaird, for the benefit of lads from the country who are earning small wages—at Hanover House, 44, King's Cross Road, W.C. (superintendent, Mr. F. Paine), accommodates ten youths, and has been taken advantage of by ninety since the opening. The home feeling is carefully cultivated, and everything done to make the house attractive. Intending residents should be over sixteen years of age, the charge for partial board and lodging being 8s. 6d. per week.

Young People.

All communications referring to this department must be addressed to Uncle Tom, Office of The Christian, 12 Paternoster Buildings, E.C.
I recommend my Elder "Young People" to read every week what Mr. Meyer writes on the Christian Endeavour Topic. Parents will also find in the S.S. Lesson Notes suggestive and helpful thoughts and illustrations for Sunday talks with their young folk. See next page.

Dinners and the Dinnerless.

AMONG the thousands of children who attend the great Board Schools of London are many whose parents are plunged in the deepest poverty, and who therefore seldom know what it is to be free from the pangs of hunger. Happily, a Free Dinner Fund was started some years ago in order to provide hot dinners for these dinnerless little ones, and the meals have since been given each recurring winter at a number of convenient centres in the metropolis.

One of the ladies connected with the Fund has been visiting both the schools and the homes of these suffering, half-fed, ill-clad children, and the outcome of her inquiries reminds us, not only of the terrible struggle for existence in which the very poor have to engage, but also of our responsibilities towards them.

A BRAVE BREADWINNER.

We are told, for instance, of a girl of thirteen who, on account of the poverty at home, left school and went to work at a factory. Being a little under age, however, she had to return to school.

"In their little living-room in a building off ——, we found the mother. It was a cold wintry day; there was no fire in the grate, although a 'wash' had been going on, and wet rags dangled from a cord across the room; in the adjoining bedroom lay the husband, very ill. The mother was eager to pour out her story: 'Governess says Mary has no chance of leaving school till April, that's near on three months, the worst of the year! She might leave directly if she could pass the sixth standard, but she can't overcome the 'rithmetic. Mary's earnings have been keeping us and paying the rent. I am not strong enough to do a day's work yet, if I could get it; and my man will not be about again for a goodish while, the doctor says.' With Mary back at school and earning nothing, the whole family were shortly turned out of doors. A relative almost as poor as themselves, defying, it seems, County Council regulations, took them all in—seven! With the greatest difficulty they secured other rooms, just as the kindness of a friend enabled the lady visitor to make this poor family a small weekly allowance.

TOILERS OUT OF SCHOOL.

Children who deserve warm sympathy are those who, after school hours, go to work at such employments as paper selling, button-hole making, trouser finishing, or matchbox making. Some of them labour in this way from thirty-six to sixty hours per week, in addition to school studies. When one girl of this class was offered a dinner, she declined it, in spite of her need.

"Please, governess, I can't stay to eat it," she said. "What do you mean?" asked the teacher. "I help mother with the trouser-work, and she can't get through anyway without I go back directly school is over," was the reply. "Have you been at work already to-day?" "Yes, governess, since seven o'clock." "And now you mean you're going on again till afternoon school?" "Yes, mother says it will be twelve o'clock to-night before we finish—it often is." So the poor little girl was allowed to take her dinner home.

NELLIE, THE NEWS-GIRL.

Another touching example is that of a little lassie named Nellie, who goes out with her young brother at five o'clock in the morning, selling newspapers to the workmen as they arrive at Poplar Station by the early trains. She did this in all weathers through last winter. She is a fair scholar, and a nice bright girl. But from what a home she came! There were eight children, the mother was in rags, and the father, at the best only a "casual" labourer, at home with a broken ankle. What a sorry beginning of a school day is the trudge of these shivering, half-awake children through the dismal streets which, for the best part of a mile, lie between their home and the railway station! The rain and sleet often soak through their thin rags and leaking boots; their breakfast has to be earned. How they would enjoy the good midday meal provided for them!

POOR WIDOWS' CHILDREN.

Many a brave mother, left a desolate widow, to fight the battle of life and keep her little ones bright and tidy, is thankful for the dinners. Here is a little lad of eleven in the seventh standard of a large school at the East End. He is a delicate boy, eager and lively. His mother and grandmother supported him and themselves by needlework. A few months ago his mother died of over-work and starvation, and now he is entirely dependent on his old grandmother, whose hands are sadly distorted and swollen by rheumatism. For the first time in her life she applied for parish relief, and obtained a small pittance for herself. But it will not keep the boy!

There is a widow, too, who has no fewer than three occupations. She goes out washing, makes large, coarse shirts, and she and her children sell papers. She cuts out and makes the shirts—all but the button-holes—for 1s. 1d. the dozen, often working till twelve o'clock at night. With all her labour she only earns nine shillings a week. Again, "These two girls," said a school-teacher, "are very delicate, both the children of widows." One is an outpatient at the London Hospital, "needing food more than medicine," but the mother cannot give it her; her own health is too broken for regular work. "But I struggle to keep a roof over our heads," says the poor mother. In both these families, certainly, the dinners for the children would be well appreciated.

These are but glimpses of the child-misery that exists among the poor Board School children of the slums; but they will suffice, perhaps, to remind those who are in more favoured circumstances of the privilege of helping their little brothers and sisters who dwell in the dark places of our great cities, and to whose lot falls so small a share of the comforts, or even the necessaries of life. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these . . . ye have done it unto Me."

Never Knew Him.

A TOUCHING story is told of a child of a well-known French painter. The little girl lost her sight in infancy, and her blindness was supposed to be incurable. A famous oculist in Paris, however, performed an operation on her eyes and restored her sight.

Her mother had long been dead, and her father had been her only friend and companion. When she was told that blindness could be cured, her one thought was that she could see him; and when the cure was complete and the bandages were removed, she ran to him, and, trembling, pored over his features, shutting her eyes now and then, and passing her fingers over his face as if to make sure that it was he.

The father had a noble head and presence, and his every look and motion was watched by his daughter with the keenest delight. For the first time his constant tenderness and care seemed real to her. If he caressed her, or even looked upon her kindly, it brought tears to her eyes.

"To think," she cried, holding his hand close in hers, "that I had this father so many years, and never knew him!"

Are not many of us like that, not realizing what a Good Father in heaven we have?

Crippled Boys.—At the National Industrial Home for Crippled Boys, Woolsthorpe House, Wright's Lane, Kensington, London, W., boys are received for three years, and instructed in useful trades. Two masters undertake the education of the boys, and special classes are held for religious instruction. An educational inspector holds a yearly examination in Holy Scripture, and in secular subjects. Over 800 boys have passed through the Home since its foundation in 1866. Owing to the heavy debt incurred in erecting the buildings, which was not finally paid off till December, 1897, the Committee have not as yet been able to receive the full number of 100 boys for whom accommodation is provided. As the debt has from time to time been reduced, the number of inmates has been increased, and at the present time there are ninety-five boys being maintained and trained in the Home; there is still room, therefore, for five more boys as soon as the requisite funds are forthcoming. Hitherto, under the Divine blessing, the work has prospered greatly. The Committee hopefully look for continued and increased support for a work which deals with a deserving class. The results which have been obtained in the respected and independent lives of former inmates are the best evidence of success, and the strongest claim which can be made on behalf of others, who only need a helping hand to attain to similar positions.

THE EARLY CHRISTIAN CHURCH (Acts ii. 37-47).

GOLDEN TEXT: Acts ii. 39.

SUBJECT.

THE wonderful result of the Apostles' first attempt to fulfil their Master's parting commission (Luke xxiv. 47) in the power of the Holy Ghost (Acts i. 8).

The opportunity was unique. A vast concourse of people from all parts of the civilized world had assembled in Jerusalem for the harvest festival, and during the earlier part of that memorable day the members of the Spirit-filled group from the upper room had been moving up and down among the eager crowds, telling out "the wonderful works of God" (v. 11) in languages miraculously given to suit the ears of the listening groups.

1. Which Apostle stood forth to preach the first Gospel sermon after the descent of the Holy Ghost? Peter. It may have been that his voice, as a fisherman, was stronger than the others (v. 14); or that his gift of tongues included the Judæan dialect, which was specially spoken in Jerusalem; or, again, that the mocking taunt (v. 13) from a group near by, reaching his ear, stirred the characteristic ardour of his temperament, and impelled him to his feet in defence of himself and his fellow apostles from the false charge. But, certain it is, that the impetuous Peter was now possessed and inspired by the Spirit of the Lord, and therefore his words were both gracious and convincing, with a strong sense of the love of truth, but no taint of personal resentment.

2. Did Peter address any special group of persons in the crowd?

First he dealt with the mockers, and then with the honest inquirers, showing to both, from the Scriptures, that what they had witnessed that day was a fulfilment of prophecy. Then he turned to the Jews (v. 22) who had been personally concerned in the accusation of Jesus (v. 23), and from a memory vividly charged with the scenes of which he had been an eye-witness, and a glowing enthusiasm, fired by the Holy Spirit of Power, he pressed home to the consciences of his hearers, facts and Scriptures with which they were perfectly familiar, until, under the power of the Holy Ghost, they were "pricked in their heart" (v. 37; John xvi. 9).

He preached Christ crucified (Acts ii. 23 and 36), Christ risen (v. 32), Christ exalted (v. 33 and 34; Acts v. 31), Christ reigning (v. 35, 36).

3. What reply did Peter make to their cry for help? Read verse 33; that met their need as sinners against God. As Jews also (Eze. xviii. 30) they needed to repent—TURN BACK.

a They had considered Him an impostor.	a They must accept Him as Messiah.
b They had thought to save themselves by rites and ceremonies.	b They must look to Jesus alone for salvation (Acts iv. 12).
c They had taken the side of his enemies.	c They must be baptized in his name, and thus publicly testify they are his friends.

If they did this, they would receive the Holy Ghost (v. 38).

REPENT	(Joel iii. 13.) (2 Cor. vii. 10.)	(Acts iii. 19). (Acts xxvi. 18-20.)
RECEIVE	(Acts x. 43). (Gal. iv. 5-6).	(Acts ii. 38. (Luke xix. 6).
REJOICE	(Luke i. 47). (Rom. v. 10-11). (1 Peter i. 8).	(Luke xix. 6). (Rom. xv. 13). (1 Peter iv. 13).

5. Who else were particularly mentioned as included in "the promise"? Children (v. 39), sons, and daughters (Joel ii. 28, 29): servants* and "all afar off" (Deut. xxix. 15). When teachers and scholars have agreed to unite in prayer for the blessing of God the Holy Ghost on their school, whole classes have been brought into the kingdom of Christ, and the teachers have been richly blessed. Why not now and here? (John xii. 22; xiv. 13-26; xvi. 14. Note xvii. 20).

6. To whom did Peter address his closing appeal? To the waverers and the undecided, calling them to "come out from among" the "untoward" (R.V.), "crooked," perverse, i.e., those who were persistent rejectors of truth concerning Christ and his salvation (2 Cor. vi. 17; Matt. vi. 24; James i. 6; 1 Kings xviii. 21).

RESULT.

About 3,000 souls were baptized in the name of Jesus Christ that day (v. 41), and "the Lord added to the Church daily (R.V.) those that were being saved." Note the evidences of genuine conversion.

1. Diligence to learn more of Christ (Eph. i. 17-23; Phil. iii. 10).

2. Steadfast desire to worship God in prayer and thanksgiving.

3. Love to the brethren (John xvii. 26; 1 Pet. i. 22).

4. Readiness to deny themselves for those in need (v. 45; 1 John iii. 17).

5. Singleness of heart; "all for Jesus" (Luke xi. 34; Heb. xii. 2).

6. Gladness (John xv. 11; xvi. 22, 24; Isa. xxix. 19).

The Lord adds to the Church to-day by the same means; preaching or teaching the Gospel of Christ, and prayer for the Holy Spirit's power.

* Illustration.—A godly man, while visiting at a country house, spoke to the young maidservant about her soul. The girl was very ignorant concerning spiritual truths, so he said to her. "Mary, will you kneel down every morning and evening and pray this prayer, 'LORD, SHOW ME MYSELF'?" The girl promised she would do so. Some months after, when the gentleman came that way again, he noticed Mary was looking very sad, and he asked her the cause of her sorrow. "Oh, sir! I prayed that prayer you taught me, and I have been getting worse and worse ever since. I never knew I was so wicked before!" "Mary," replied the gentleman, "I will teach you another prayer, and I want you to pray this one every morning and evening now. 'LORD, SHOW ME THYSELF'." Again Mary promised, and again some months elapsed before the gentleman came that way; but, when he did so, Mary met him with a countenance beaming with joy and gladness. "Well, Mary, how is it with you now?" "Oh, sir! the Lord showed me I was a great sinner first, but He has shown me since that He is a great Saviour, and that He loved me, and died for me, and I DO thank Him!"

ENTERING THE KINGDOM (John iii., 1-17).

NICODEMUS is a type of many men who are outside the Kingdom of God. He believed in God, having no sympathy with the cold infidelity of the Sadducees. He was probably, like Saul of Tarsus, blameless in all the righteousness of the law, and irreproachable in moral character. He was probably a good husband, father, and master, respectful, thoughtful, willing to consider the claims of any new system, prepared to acknowledge Christ as a teacher, and thinking it was only necessary to know in order to be.

Muffling his face in his cloak, he stole along in the shadows cast by the full Passover moon, startled by his own footfall, and fearful lest the watchman on his beat should recognise, in the suppliant at the door of the humble lodging of Jesus of Nazareth, one of the leaders of the Jewish Sanhedrim. To such a man Christ said, "Ye must be born again." When Christ says must (7) it is time for us to wake up. He is so gentle, winsome, tender; He is always persuading, inviting, entreating; He so seldom uses the imperative mood; it is a solemn question, therefore, to ask ourselves, "Have I been born anew, or from above?"

We are often unconscious of the moment of the new birth, as we are of that of our natural birth. It is not wise, therefore, to look back for the time or place where we were born again. To many the new birth came when they were quite little children, in the early dawn of consciousness, when beneath their mother's guidance they lifted their hearts to Christ. In many other cases the new birth occurred so quietly and gently that they were hardly aware that at a given moment they passed from death unto life, and from the power of Satan unto God. There are other tests more certain and reliable.

These thoughts are substantiated by our Lord's own words in verse 8, where He says that the new birth is something like the wind. While He was speaking the night breeze may have passed over the city, stirring the vine leaves as they drooped over the casement, and breathing through the open window. "Mark this wind," said our Lord. "You cannot see it, though you feel it. You know not why it is now a hurricane and again a zephyr. How can you understand the nature or laws of the new life?" We do not know whence the wind comes, or whither it goes, and yet we feel its power. So you may not know whence the power of the new life has come, or whither it bears you; but you may be conscious that you love the things you once hated, that you hate the things you once loved, that you are being borne Godward and heavenward, that there is a movement in your life towards the things which are unseen and eternal.

"Born of water and of the Spirit." All men were speaking of John's baptism (23), which was the symbol of repentance. Our Lord said "You must go to John and repent under his ministry, and witness to your repentance by an outward sign, and then you must open your heart to the blessed Spirit.

In verses 16 and 17 you have what Luther calls a little Bible, which comprehends within its brief space the message of redemption. Stand beneath the Cross; look to Christ dying for you; trust Him; open your heart to Him, and while your soul is going out in love and thankfulness for his supreme work, the Holy Spirit will perform his sacred office, and you will be born into the Kingdom of God (James i. 18; 1 Peter i. 3).

F. B. MEYER.

The Y.M.C.A.

A RECEPTION was given to the members of the Henley-on-Thames Association on January 1, by Mr. Phil. Sutton. The handsome new premises recently opened through the generous kindness of Mr. Martin John Sutton, are proving a great attraction to the young men of the town.

The thirty-sixth annual report of the Cape Town Y.M.C.A. describes a vigorous and successful work amongst young men in that important city. The membership roll now exceeds 800, in spite of great fluctuations arising out of the unsettled conditions which have prevailed owing to the war. "The future outlook of the Association," says the report, "gives promise of unlimited scope for the development of the work, and with a well-adapted and specially equipped building, in charge of an efficient and increased staff, we are hopeful of accomplishing a work amongst young men which will take first rank amongst organizations of this nature in any part of the globe."

A New Year's Christian Convention, arranged by the committee of the Central Association, was held in Exeter Hall during the first three days of the New Year. Three meetings were held on the first day, for praise and prayer, under the leadership of Revs. F. B. Meyer, F. S. Webster, and Captain Tottenham, while in the evening an evangelistic meeting for men was conducted by Mr. J. B. Wookey. On the two following days meetings were held both afternoon and evening, at which addresses on the development of spiritual life were delivered by Revs. Preb. H. W. Webb-Peploe, F. B. Meyer, E. W. Moore, Evan Hopkins, S. A. Selwyn, J. B. Figgis, E. Grose Hodge, and Pastor W. Fuller Gooch. The meetings throughout were well attended.

The twenty-fifth anniversary of the Weston-super-Mare Association was held recently. Mr. Herbert S. Smart, general secretary, presented an encouraging report. Alterations and improvements have been carried out which render the premises more convenient. Of the spiritual side of the work, the report speaks in high terms. The Sunday afternoon Bible class has a large attendance, and exercises a far-reaching influence, and the teacher's preparation class is much appreciated. The "Youths' Own," which was started for the purpose of reaching the lads of the town, soon outgrew its accommodation. The evangelistic cycling band has visited many villages, far and near, proclaiming the Gospel with earnestness and power. In many other departments of religious work, too, good progress was reported.

Sir Edmund Monson, His Majesty's Ambassador, presided over the annual meeting of the Paris Anglo-American Y.M.C.A., recently held, in the Rudy Hall, Paris. His Excellency was supported on the platform by Mr. Austin Lee (first secretary of Legation), Mr. H. H. Skepper (the president), Mr. Coleman, Mr. W. H. Mills (English National Council), and the clergy and ministers of most of the British and American churches. In the course of a thoughtful address, Sir Edmund Monson expressed his sense of the value of such an agency as the Y.M.C.A., in a city like Paris, so largely frequented by young men, who came there in the prosecution of business, as well as for the study of the language and fine arts. It had a further value in linking representatives of Great Britain and America in religious and philanthropic work, and still more in that it based its efforts for the formation of character on faith in our Redeemer.

The Y.W.C.A.

AN interesting gathering took place at Morley Hall, 26, George Street, Hanover Square, W., when 450 factory and laundry girls belonging to the various Factory Helpers' Union clubs and institutes in London met for their annual tea and prize-giving. Twenty-three clubs were represented. The prizes were presented by Lady Blanche Smith, the Challenge Shield being won by the Clifden House Club, Bow, E., and the prize of £5 by the Manchester Mill Girls' Institute for the two best classes working under the continuation schools scheme of H.M. Education Department. The Challenge Clock was awarded to the Ipswich Working Girls' Club for needlework and cookery.

Some ninety-five clubs and institutes are now working in connection with the F.H.U., to promote the moral and spiritual welfare of factory and working girls, and to lead them to the knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ. The closing address was given by Rev. E. A. Stuart, of St. Matthews, Bayswater.

Workers are needed for the clubs and classes, and the secretary will be glad to hear from any one able to give a few hours a week to help in the work—address, 26, George Street, Hanover Square, W.

Week of Prayer.

EXETER HALL.

THE meetings in connection with the Week of Prayer, as arranged by the Evangelical Alliance, were opened last Monday at Exeter Hall, with a quiet time of waiting upon God. The subject set down for the day was, "The Church Universal: Faith in our Lord Jesus, and in God the Father who sent Him to save." The chairman—Rev. Dr. David MacEwan, Trinity Presbyterian Church, Clapham Road, S.W.—read Psa. xlvi. and Phile. iii. 12-31; and a helpful and spiritual address was given by Mr. John Wood (Evangelization Society) dealing with (1) the family of God, and (2) the duties of those who belong to it. Turning to the Epistle to the Ephesians, he pointed out how it is mainly occupied with these subjects. It is an indivisible family, whose life is Christ—a life linked with the very throne of God; it has one Food, one Head, one Guide, one Name, one Hope.

Mr. Wood put special emphasis on the second part of his subject, dealing with the manner in which the Spirit of God, through the Apostle Paul, comes down, in the Epistle, to every-day duties of life. Remarking the large amount of counsel that is given in the form of "a hive of B's," he mentions a few—iv. 23, to "be renewed in the spirit of your mind"; iv. 32, to be "kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving"; v. 7, to be not partakers with the children of disobedience; v. 17, to "be not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is"; v. 18, to "be not drunk with wine . . . but be filled with the Spirit."

There was much liberty in prayer, special mention being made of a district in which it is feared that the only door at present open for undenominational work is about to be closed.

The chair was taken on Tuesday by Mr. W. H. Seagram, who read 1 Peter iv. 7-19. The speaker was Pastor Fuller Gooch. Subject: "Christendom." Reading Matt. v. 13-16, he showed that this is the ideal of what our Lord intended his Church to be and to do in the world. Every Christian who has been salted with the grace of God should also be like salt in his influence upon others. Christian life and influence should be the great anti-corruptionists, whether the corruption be in the church or in society. This is equally true of the aggregate of those who are brought into the knowledge of his name.

Changing the metaphor to that of light, every Christian is enlightened that he may be as a lamp lighted and set on a lamp-stand. Again, instead of the lamp on a stand, the light is a torch carried in the face of the storm to lighten those outside. There has been awful failure in the attainment of this ideal, and to-day the Evangelical Alliance is severely criticized for holding to its old position; but the speaker made a vigorous disclaimer of the charge of narrowness against those who teach the truths which, since Pentecost, have led to the evangelization of the world so far as it has been evangelized.

In all the New Testament references to the latter days there is an individualizing of things. The Lord calls for individual fidelity, faithfulness, and witnessing. These are more needed than ever, and God blesses them more than ever.

ALDERSGATE STREET Y.M.C.A.

The address given by Rev. F. B. Meyer, at the noon prayer meeting at Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A., on Monday, was a New Year's message, founded on Genesis i.: "The seed plot of the Bible." At the outset of the year we may well take the first words as the keynote of Christian effort. "In the beginning, God." After showing (v. 4) that God is ever "dividing," saying to man, "take this and put aside that," Mr. Meyer drew apt lessons for the times from the commands set forth in v. 28, be fruitful, multiply, replenish, subdue, have dominion.

In order to carry out the Divine instructions, we need spiritual empowering, and spiritual power comes immediately faith manifests itself in obedient action. Souls are not easily won; they will cost us labour and anguish. We come to use the words of Paul, "My little children, of whom I travail in birth again until Christ be formed in you" (Gal. iv. 19). The Christian Church will do well when it returns more generally to the method of every Christian seeking to win a soul, as Andrew sought his brother Peter.

Proceeding, the speaker dwelt on the question of spiritual replenishment from the standpoint of the Church's need. Our Sunday schools and many other departments of Christian work urgently call for more labourers. Moreover, there is the order to subdue, and in this connection it is needful to remember that we have either to subdue or be subdued. We must be conquerors through Christ, or there comes "reversion to type." Leave Kew Gardens uncared for for three months, and its condition may be imagined. Even as soon as we build a house nature begins to destroy it. Finally, there is to be dominion. By sin man lost dominion: in Christ man is regal, with power to command and lead, as he lives in the power of his risen Lord.

Mr. Meyer concluded with earnest and telling words on the need to realize both responsibility and privilege. He recalled a story told by Mr. Moody of an old slave woman of the Southern States, who could not believe the news of emancipation, since, said she, "Massa says it's a pack o' lies." On being shown Lincoln's proclamation, however, she cried, "I won't stop in bondage another hour." So Christians do not sufficiently grasp the blessings of their position, being deluded and kept in darkness by Satan. "Let us realize our privileges and 'have dominion.'"

On Tuesday the speaker was Pastor G. Turner, of Sutton, who founded a stimulating address on Matt. i. 23. He pointed out that while many mentally subscribe to the truth that the Lord Jesus Christ is "God with us," they have no living contact with the Almighty, and so lack the heart strength which they might richly possess. Proceeding, and addressing himself more particularly to commercial men, the speaker deplored the thirst for wealth which is so prevalent in all classes of society. "Take no unwise step in seeking to get a bigger loaf of bread; have what He gives, and enjoy it with Him." The concluding passages of the address dealt pointedly with Bible critics and their failures, and an earnest appeal was made to young men to hold on in the right way and, exercising faith in Divine wisdom, to prove that God's guidance is unfailing and unerring.

The Open-Air Mission.

THOUGH winter is upon us, the active operations of the Open-Air Mission have by no means ceased. Cattle shows and other gatherings are being visited, while some of the evangelists are engaged in villlage itineration, calling upon the people in their homes, giving Gospel literature, praying with the sick and dying, reading the Scriptures to the cottagers, and in other ways endeavouring to bring comfort and help to many who are isolated from spiritual privileges, and who all too seldom hear the pure Word of God.

Often the villagers' gratitude for such efforts on their behalf is most touching. Tears steal down many a rugged face, and the "God bless you, sir;" "Please come again soon; no one else visits us," and like utterances cheer the solitary worker, who has, perhaps, walked a dozen miles to hear them.

A very cheering feature of this year's work has been the large number of grateful letters received from converts, who have been won for Christ during the Society's missions at races, fairs, and the seaside. Many of them breathe a beautiful spirit of self-surrender, and tell of much growth in grace.

Wonderful things have indeed been wrought this year in the Master's name, and it is in order that the good work may wax yet stronger and stronger that the appeal is made for further liberal help. Frank Cockrem, Secretary.

Testimony from Business Men.

IN connection with the New Year's gathering of the Commercial Travellers' Christian Association, last Saturday, the sermon was preached by Rev. W. R. Mowll. At the Memorial Hall, in the evening, a meeting was presided over by Mr. J. Calvert Coates, who recalled that when he went to serve his apprenticeship, his mother said to him, "Commit the third chapter of Proverbs to memory, but take to yourself especially the words: 'In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths.'" The life of a commercial traveller was an eventful and interesting life, and afforded many opportunities for usefulness. It ought to be the object of business men to teach the people how to live, and to show them how to die.

Mr. J. Halford spoke upon "Individuality in Relation to the Kingdom of God." In the first place, which side were they on? The individual might do something wherever he was for the Kingdom. "Be ye clean, that bear the vessels of the Lord." Charles Kingsley was not far wrong when he said that if they wanted to be thoroughly miserable they should look at themselves, but that if they wanted to be happy they should get something to do for others, and do it, and learn the joy of holy service. Strong drink was the chief hindrance to the progress of the Kingdom of Heaven, and he appealed to moderate drinkers to set their faces against the drinking customs of society.

Mr. E. Underhay said he had been asked, What was the use of this society? and he answered the question by showing what it did in fellowship and beneficence. To hear the testimony borne to the value of religion by the older members of the society must be of much service to the younger members. F. T.

Rev. Dr. Henry's Meetings.

THE organization of the Twentieth Century Christian Temperance Campaign, to which reference was made in last week's issue of The Christian, proceeds apace, and from many parts of the United Kingdom earnest applications are being made for the services of Dr. Henry and the Fisk Jubilee Singers. The prospects are highly encouraging, in view of the enthusiasm that is being manifested, and the completeness with which supporters of the abstinence cause are arranging the demonstrations that are to be held by Dr. Henry and the Singers.

On Thursday, January 9, at 8 p.m., Dr. Henry is to speak at Devonshire Square Baptist Church, Stoke Newington, N.; Dr. Henry and the singers visit, on January 23-30, Nottingham; February 1-9, Dublin. Subsequent meetings will be announced at an early date.

Marylebone Medical Mission.

FOR over a quarter of a century Dr. Chambers has conducted the well-known Medical Mission to the poor at 12, Bell Street, Lisson Grove, W.

Dr. Chambers writes:—"The dispensary is open three days a week. Urgent cases are seen every day. At one o'clock all the patients are assembled for a Gospel service, lasting about twenty minutes. Very many at these services hear the Gospel who never enter any church or mission hall. After the service each patient is seen separately in the consulting-room and prescribed for by the medical superintendent. Those too ill to attend the dispensary are visited at their own homes. The patients are visited every day except Sunday. The cases visited at home are as severe as those seen in the wards of any hospital. The two deaconesses also visit daily. Sickness and poverty are the only recommendations any patient requires.

"Few probably realize the appalling distress and poverty we daily meet with in many of these homes, for when sickness has laid low the bread-winner, and everything has been pawned for food, the case becomes desperate. The destitute and sick poor are provided (so far as our funds permit) with nourishment, coals, bread, &c. Care is always taken not to encourage idleness or want of thrift. Since the starting of the Mission, vast numbers of the sick poor have been cured, others relieved; drunkards have been reclaimed, and many who were living without God, and had no hope, are now consistent Christians."

Obituary.

REV. JOSEPH TANNER.

THE death of Rev. Joseph Tanner, who passed away at Norwood on New Year's Day, removes an earnest Evangelical clergyman and an able and helpful writer. Although ill-health prevented him from undertaking parochial work, his writings exercised a wide influence. His treatise, entitled "Saving Faith," was published by the Religious Tract Society, and had a large circulation. His principal work, entitled "Daniel and the Revelation," was the fruit of many years' study.

MRS. ALFRED CRAWFORD.

Much sorrow is felt by a wide circle of friends at the death of Mrs. Alfred Crawford, of Dublin, who has been called away after a comparatively brief illness. Deceased took an active interest in social, religious, and temperance questions. She was especially interested in slum children, and gave evidence before the Peel Commission on Licensing, in reference to their welfare. She also published a pamphlet on the subject, and did much towards obtaining support for the Children's Bill. She was likewise an earnest Sunday-school worker, and a devoted member of the Methodist Church.

DR. BAURATH VON SCHICK.

The death of Dr. Schick, at the age of eighty, removes one who has attained great eminence as an explorer and archæologist in Palestine. Dr. Schick was one of the best authorities on the topography of ancient Jerusalem. He lived in the Holy City for nearly fifty-five years, having left Wurtemberg, his native country, in 1846. First working as an architect and afterwards occupying himself in study and researches, he became thoroughly acquainted with the history of the country, especially with "Underground" Jerusalem. The deceased was a regular contributor to the Quarterly Statement of the Palestine Exploration Fund, and has made a unique and beautiful model of the Great Temple of Solomon during different periods—a model which is familiar to most of the tourists who have visited the Holy City during the last fifteen years.

THE EARL OF CARRICK.

On December 22, the Earl of Carrick was taken home to be with the Lord at the age of sixty-six. Converted about thirty-three years ago through reading the Scriptures, he has ever since been a faithful follower of the Lord Jesus. He will be much missed. His godly life, so humble and gracious, could not fail to be a blessing to those amongst whom he lived, and those who were accustomed to hear him preach the Gospel, or speak to Christians, will long remember his simple, heart-searching words, and how they came home in the power of the Spirit. His private liberality in the Lord's work is known to but few. On the 27th his body was laid to rest in the family burial-place inside his demesne—Mount Juliet, Thomastown, County Kilkenny—in the presence of a large number of people, (Protestants and Roman Catholics), from the surrounding district, when the Gospel he loved so well was preached. His kindness to the poor around Mount Juliet will long be remembered.

MRS. JOSEPH TAYLOR.

Ellen, the widow of Joseph Taylor, formerly of The Lawn, Romford, recently passed into her eternal rest. Her illness was brief, but her sufferings were great. Shortly before her decease she asked to see Rev. J. Mountain, of Tunbridge Wells. On his arrival she said, "I want you to help me praise the Lord," and as he read a portion of Scripture, although weak and exhausted from severe pain, she followed with her "Amen." Then she told of her perfect peace and trust in the Lord, and that at the age of sixteen she was brought into the conscious enjoyment of salvation, and throughout her long life never once had she lost the consciousness of God's favour. Then, when Mr. Mountain was about to lead in prayer, she said, Will you sing, "My Jesus, I love Thee." After the first verse, she said, sing "I will love Thee in life, I will love Thee in death." In this, with a strong, clear voice, she joined so sweetly that it seemed impossible to realise she was dying. Her face was like the face of an angel. She died as she had lived, beautiful with the beauty of God. All who knew her loved her, and her children call her blessed. T. H.

REV. LEVI PALMER.

The death of Rev. Levi Palmer, of Taunton, removes one of the most highly esteemed Baptist ministers in the West country. Mr. Palmer took part in some Christmas gatherings at Blindmoor Baptist Chapel, Buckland St. Mary, on December 27, and returned home in the evening apparently in his usual health. Later, however, he complained of severe pains, and his wife went downstairs to procure a remedy for his suffering. Upon her return to the bedroom she was much shocked to find that her husband had passed away.

Mr. Palmer, who was about fifty years of age, was an old and much-respected student of the Pastors' College, and was an intimate friend of its founder, Mr. C. H. Spurgeon. The deceased had held the pastorate of Albemarle Chapel for just a quarter of a century, and had experienced an exceptionally properous ministry to a large church and congregation. He regularly conducted a men's Bible class numbering about 200 members. He was well known throughout the county and in the West of England generally, and had served as president of the Western Baptist Association. The funeral was attended by thousands of people. Many ministerial representatives of the Free Churches were present, and the Church of England friends who were present included Rev. Prebendary Askwith, vicar and rural dean of Taunton. The service was conducted by Rev. Thomas Spurgeon.

Temperance Notes.

THE annual meetings of the Temperance Ironsides was held last week at Liverpool. Dr. Edwards was elected president, and Mr. Tennyson Smith hon. superintendent. In the evening a public meeting was held in the Hope Hall, Mr. C. W. Elam presiding, when Mr. John G. Woolley, of New York, gave an inspiring address.

Colonel Banfield, C.B. presided on Saturday week over a crowded audience in Cardiff, at the deliverance of Mr. Glenelg Grant's Lantern Lecture, "Tommy Atkins and Temperance." The Colonel stated that he became a total abstainer in India, as an example to his men, and that over one-third of his battalion are now abstainers. He urged upon both soldiers and civilians to become teetotalers. Colonel Quirk, C.B., the present officer in command at Cardiff, wrote, saying, "Temperance has done much for the army in the past, and I am sure will do more in the future."

A powerful testimony to the good effects of total abstinence is given by Mr. W. J. Gane, master of the workhouse of Tonbridge Union, who says:—"Christmas Day was spent in the workhouse in a very happy way, without the issue of any intoxicants whatever either to the inmates or the staff; and this rule is in force at all times of the year, with the exception of such stimulants as are ordered by the medical officer as medicine. I have now spent twenty-two official Christmas Days in a workhouse, and I can say without the slightest hesitation that by far the happiest for both inmates and officials has been the last three, when no intoxicants have been given."

Personalia.

In February, Rev. F. B. Meyer is visiting St. Petersburg to hold conferences with the British community, under the auspices of the British-American Church.

Mr. Thomas A. Bailey is about to proceed to India in the capacity of honorary organizing secretary of the Mission to Lepers. He sails from Marseilles on January 10 for Bombay.

Mrs. Josephine Butler, as many friends will be glad to know, is living in retirement; and, though now unable for active work, still follows with deep interest the great movements of the world.

We have been asked to explain that Mr. and Mrs. Arthur J. Bowen are prevented by circumstances from returning to take part in the work on the Congo, as was stated in report of meeting held December 4, 1901.

Scottish Notes.

REV. W. W. MISKIMMING (Newry, co. Down), has just finished two weeks' work in connection with Perth Gospel Temperance Society, at which 641 pledges were taken. He is a brilliant and enthusiastic speaker, strong and advanced in all that pertains to total abstinence, and the power of the Gospel of Christ. The meetings were large, on Sabbath evening about 1,800.

Every Sabbath morning for the last twenty-seven years a free breakfast has been provided for the poor of Edinburgh in the Drill Hall, Forest Road. The guests at present number weekly about 800—600 being adults and 200 children. After breakfast a short Gospel address is given to the adults in the large hall, to which quiet attention is given; and in the small hall adjoining the children are told the old, old story in a way suitable to them. In the building in Old Fishmarket Close, belonging to the Mission, meetings are held every Sabbath afternoon and evening, as well as a large Sabbath-school, and classes for older boys and girls. Services in common lodging-houses are also conducted by the workers. During the week a mothers' meeting, Gospel meeting, temperance meeting, band of hope, and various classes for boys and girls are held. There is also a Penny Savings Bank for the encouragement of thrift. A sum of about £750 is required annually to meet the cost of the breakfast and the various expenses of the mission. Mr. Thomas Dymock, C.A., 8, Castle Street, is acting as treasurer.

Irish Notes.

A SOCIETY has been formed at Nenagh, co Tipperary, for the purpose of helping to bring about a better observance of the Lord's Day. The society consists of laymen and ladies only, and at the inaugural meeting some of the speakers said that time had come when they should, by active personal influence, try to create a more healthy public opinion on the subject, and they urged that if the movement for secularizing the Lord's Day was allowed to go on, it would be difficult to heck it in a short time.

A misunderstanding has arisen among the Roman Catholics in Belfast. Dr. Henry, the Roman Catholic Bishop, has for some time been endeavouring to control the municipal and Parliamentary elections as well as ecclesiastical matters. Now a party has sprung up among the Roman Catholics who say they will not allow him to control them, and these appear to be determined to take independent action. This is a good sign, for hitherto the Irish Roman Catholics have been only too willing to take their politics as well as their theology from Rome. If only they can be got to think for themselves in any matter it will be clear gain.

The periodical public receptions of converts held in the Dublin Mission Church of the Society for Irish Church Missions, are among the most interesting features of the work of the society. Two of these receptions were held, on December 20 and 22, when ten adult converts from Rome were solemnly received into the Church of Ireland by Rev. P. B. Johnson. Several other converts are anxious to come forward after a course of further instruction in the Scriptures.

Prayer for Ireland should occupy a prominent place in the hearts of God's people, particularly at the present time of unrest and disturbance in that land. The Society for Irish Church Missions hopes for a good response to its annual invitation to the observance of January 16 (the anniversary of W. Dallas' first striking effort for Ireland), as a day of special prayer, to be held in the parlour of Exeter Hall, London, at 3 p.m., on the 16th inst.

Evangelistic.

Paglesham Congregational Chapel, Essex.

A WEEK'S mission has been held at Paglesham by Mr. J. S. Brunning. The wet nights, together with the scattered nature of the villages, somewhat interfered with the attendance, but benefit was felt, and will be, in the stimulus given to the church life in this remote part of Essex. Mr. Brunning closed the mission by giving a lecture entitled, "The Story of My Life," which was well attended and much appreciated.

(Rev.) Walter Fuller.

Rev. A. Allan at Peebles.

A two weeks' mission under the auspices of the three United Free Churches in Peebles and the local Y.M.C.A. was held lately. The services were conducted by Rev. A. Allan, late of Johannesburg. Each evening during the first week Mr. Allan spoke in the West Church and during the second in St. Andrew's Church, while afternoon meetings for Bible readings were held in the Leckie Memorial Church. At several of the afternoon meetings Mr. Allan answered questions that had been addressed to him, and explained difficulties. The mission has afforded a time of great privilege, and much blessing has resulted. The Bible readings on "The Overcoming Life" were specially helpful, and new light was thrown on the teaching of Scripture concerning the ministry of the Holy Spirit. Mr. Allan's teaching has all the marks of earnest study of the Word.

Blackhorse Road Baptist Church, Walthamstow.

A fruitful nine-days' mission was recently held at Blackhorse Road Baptist Church, Walthamstow, conducted by Mr. W. Olney, of Haddon Hall, Bermondsey, and Mr. F. Spencer Johnson, the Gospel singer. The spiritual results were encouraging. Up to the last night of the mission some scores of decision cards had been handed in, and from the children a number of letters expressing desire to follow the Saviour had been received. There were still more inquirers on the last evening of the mission. The revival has been most encouraging; many families of the church were blessed, sons and daughters having been brought to Christ. The work was of a thoroughly solid nature, and the whole mission free from sensationalism. Sanctified speech and song have, by the Spirit, wrought wonders in this needy district. W.

Dr. Harry Guinness in Melbourne.

During his recent stay at Melbourne Dr. Harry Guinness has, among other meetings, spoken at the midday meeting for business men.

The Southern Cross says:—"The meetings are held in the Baptist Church, Collins Street. The daily attendance ranges from 200 to 250, and varies little in character. There is quite a large percentage of elderly men, a few boys, a sprinkling of Salvation Army soldiers, an occasional khaki-clad figure returned from the front, and the rest thoughtful middle-aged men. On the platform, Dr. Guinness is flanked by half a dozen brother ministers—three or four Baptists, a Methodist chaplain, a Presbyterian, and a Salvation Army major. After opening prayer Mr. Virgo, the Y.M.C.A.'s Australasian secretary, who has an excellent baritone voice, renders a 'Moody and Sankey' with great feeling, Dr. Guinness accompanying him at the piano.

"Then comes the address. It is admirably suited to the audience, both as regards length and substance. To condense a page into a paragraph is not an easy matter, particularly when the page is a good one; but Dr. Guinness has a fine knack of delivering, in a few clear sentences, the very heart of what might well have been, given time, a much longer address."

Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Sims at Auchterarder.

A mission, which proved helpful to many hearers, has been held at Auchterarder, N.B., by Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Sims. For nearly a fortnight the meetings were held in the Evangelistic Hall, after which they were held in two of the U.F. churches and in the parish church, the week-end meetings continuing in the Hall. The ministers showed a very kindly interest, doing what they could to help forward the work. The subjects which Mr. Sims took up dealt mainly with prophetic truths, in view of which the presentation of the Gospel, given at the same time, was all the more solemn and forcible. Limelight services were also held every Saturday night, and also the last week in the parish church. These were very well attended, some of them proving to be a time of deep solemnity. A great attraction in the meetings was the singing. Mrs. Sims possesses a beautiful and very expressive voice, and this she uses with untiring earnestness and power in the cause of the Gospel. It is believed that many have been spiritually helped, and that the fruit will be seen in the lives of not a few. V. A. G.

New Year Services in Glasgow.

To cope with the enormous forces of evil which are let loose at this season of the year, at all the three halls of the United Evangelistic Association—Bethany Hall in the east, Mizpah Hall in the west, and at the Tent Hall in the heart of the city—special endeavours to win to Christ the drunken and the sunken, as well as to aid the tempted and the tried, have been made right throughout the New Year week. Each hall has had an extensive programme to carry out, and in connection with two of the halls, in addition to services indoors each night, open-air services have been held both in the forenoons and in the evenings. Mr. J. C. Blackater, a business man, who leads in the work at Mizpah Hall; Mr. Robert Logan, superintendent of the Tent Hall; and Mr. P. T. McRostie, leader of the work at Bethany Hall, have, with large bands of hearty, enthusiastic workers, thrown themselves with all their ransomed powers into the crusade, and tokens of encouragement have not been absent.

Glasgow's civic head, Lord Provost Chisholm, whose evangelical sympathies are of no uncertain kind, gave an address at the Hogmanay supper for the poor in the Tent Hall, at which also Rev. G. L. Carstairs, Mr. Alex Mackeith, and others, spoke. A number of well-known evangelists have taken part in the campaign, and there have been large congregations. "Keep religion in its own place" is the cry of some who would give it no place. Open-air meetings in the forenoons seemed to some carrying things too far, but the devil's territory has never yet been invaded half far enough.

At St. George's Cross Tabernacle the annual "Saints' Festival" was held on Thursday evening, January 2. To the joy of his many friends and well-wishers, Pastor D. J. Findlay occupied the chair. The throat affection from which he has been suffering, and for which he recently underwent a surgical operation, has precluded him from much speaking for a considerable time, but there now seems to be some improvement, which it is hoped may be permanent. There was a large attendance. Addresses were given by Mr. James McFarlane, Mr. Harry Alfred Long, Mr. D. J. Knox, and Mr. Hugh Paton, with a brief word from Mr. W. M. Oatts.

In many other parts of the city, Christian workers have been actively engaged seeking to rescue the perishing, while the days are going by. J. C.

The Boy Preacher.

On Sunday evening I arrived at the Great Assembly Hall at the usual hour of service, only to find the doors closed, and the words "Hall full" hung up in front. Outside was a seething crowd of people all anxious to obtain admission, having to be kept back by the police. The closed doors were a silent sermon in themselves. "Too late, too late; ye cannot enter now." Still the people tried, but in vain, to find an entrance. An official came to my assistance, and passed me through a side entrance. I shall not soon forget the spectacle that met my gaze. The huge orchestra with its two platforms, the immense area and galleries, were simply packed with men and women. To those who believe in the solemn realities of eternal things it was a vision to drive one to his knees with a cry to the Mighty One for grace and wisdom to be vouchsafed to those who were responsible for the conducting of the proceedings.

The grandeur of so many thousand voices singing from "Songs and Solos," the reading of Holy Scripture, the simple but profoundly solemn prayers, are all to me indescribable. The slim Boy Preacher arose and announced his text, "What must I do to be saved?" It seems incredible, but it is nevertheless true that this young lad spoke for sixty-five minutes with scarce a pause, repeating himself but rarely, and holding that vast assembly of not fewer than 5,000 persons spellbound as he reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come till people trembled like Felix of old.

The Boy Preacher did not tell a single anecdote; it was a marvellously Scriptural address—full of point and fire, and it was wonderfully owned of God. In his peroration the preacher asked any who liked to surrender themselves to the Lord Jesus Christ to leave their seats in the presence of the whole assembly and make their way to the hall beneath the orchestra, where they could be spoken to and prayed with. In a few minutes that hall was filled with anxious people. I acted as doorkeeper, and could not restrain my tears as I saw old men and women, young men and maidens, thus seeking the Lord. How many passed into the kingdom, "the day of his appearing" only will reveal; but one very dear to the writer was among those who sought and found peace in believing. Will the readers of The Christian pray much for Mr. Charrington and his band of workers, who, with the Boy Preacher, will every night this month (D.V.) be sowing in tears and reaping in joy among the vast crowds that are sure to be found nightly in the Great Assembly Hall?

J. B. W.

Mr. William Collard recently conducted a Gospel Temperance Mission at Whitefield's Tabernacle, Tottenham Court Road, N.W. A good number of pledges were secured, and there were several decisions for Christ. On the last evening Mr. Collard related his life story, which proved both interesting and helpful.

Mr. Wm. Hill, who recently returned from South Africa, has been labouring at Greenock. His services have had distinct evidence of blessing, especially towards the close. Backsliders have been restored, and young men and women have made decision.

A. D. G.

Rev. J. F. T. Hallowes, late Principal of Cliff College, Derbyshire, recently conducted a ten days' mission for the Hastings and St. Leonards Branch of the Railway Mission. The Holy Spirit used the strong and weighty words to awaken souls, restore backsliders, and stir up Christians to higher ideals.

An eight-days' mission was arranged for Mr. John Oyston, of Horsham, from the 24th ult. to the 1st inst., at Penybout, but at the request of those attending was extended to ten days. The meetings were "times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord," and the messages were earnest, thoughtful expositions of Gospel truth.

At Alford, Lincs, Mr. Bob Johnson has conducted a mission, in the course of which he visited all the Nonconformist places of worship in the town. The last three services were held in the Corn Exchange, which was crowded. The interest gathered force as the mission proceeded. The last service was particularly inspiring, pledges were taken and Gospel temperance workers were encouraged to fight still more valiantly. On Sunday, December 22, Mr. Johnson sang and spoke to two crowded audiences in Berger Hall, Bromley, E. Much good surely must result from such a clear and telling testimony to the might of the Gospel in its saving efficacy.

Mr. William Forbes, continuing his work in behalf of theatrical employés, is conducting a series of social and evangelistic meetings in the provinces. After visiting Sheffield, Mr. Forbes held a meeting in the Brunswick Rooms, Leeds, on Thursday last for the chorus women and dancers employed in the local theatres. Addresses were given by Mr. Forbes and by Rev. Simpson Johnson, of Brunswick Chapel. A similar gathering was held on Friday at Bradford.

At Cottingham, Yorkshire, Mr. Charles Gallelty, of the London Evangelization Society, has just concluded a fifteen days' mission. All the Free Churches co-operated in this effort to extend the Redeemer's kingdom, and the interest in the services was well sustained to the end. The simple and earnest exposition of the Word of God, and the fervent appeals to those present to renounce all sin, and, by faith in a crucified Saviour, to prepare for the coming of the Lord, made a deep, and, we trust, a lasting impression upon many who came night after night to hear the missioner. We rejoice to be able to state that God's own people have been blessed and their spiritual life deepened, and that the unconverted have yielded themselves to Him who died that they might have life. E. A.

Notes & Comments

"The Church and the Children." We are commencing this week an important series of articles upon this momentous subject. With the frequent complaint as to the inadequacy of our Sunday-school work in view, and the special effort of the Sunday-school Union in immediate prospect, we believe that these articles will be particularly timely. The contributors to the series will be Revs. E. Griffith-Jones (Balham), Alexander Smellie (Carluke, N.B.), Griffith-Thomas (Portman Square), James Mursell (Clapton), Thos. Champness (Joyful News), Albert Swift (E. Dulwich), and Mr. Newton Jones (S.S.U. Evangelist). The Class, the Individual, and the Mission will in turn be considered by these writers, who are men of experimental knowledge and experience in work among the young. We hope our readers will take pains to bring these articles under the notice of Sunday-school teachers, and all workers who seek to lead the feet of children and young people into the ways of the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

What of Our New Year's Wishes? The somewhat violent epidemic of well-wishing which marks the beginning of a New Year is now over. What are we doing with these good wishes for our well-being? The thought seldom strikes us that our happiness is largely under our own control, and that what others can only wish for us, we can do much to ensure for ourselves. The cultivation of the spirit that makes for brightness and cheerfulness, for contentment and peace of heart, is a duty on all. We depend too much on externals, as though happiness were the result of a mere fortunate combination of circumstances, instead of being largely a contribution of the inner man. The best sunshine comes from within, and the truest happiness is self-evolved. "Rejoice in the Lord."

"Paper" Reformations. It is reported that in view of the return of the Emperor and Dowager Empress of China back to Pekin, the mandarins repaired the damaged walls of the city and many of the public buildings with paper, in order to hide the effects of the siege, and "make-believe" that all was well. This art of make-believe is not confined to mandarins. It is to be found in all nations and classes, being one of the attributes of our fallen humanity. It is responsible for every act of patchwork reformation in character, for every shoddy social scheme for the reformation of the world. In a thousand subtle and resourceful ways this tendency keeps on repeating and improving itself with a view to improving appearances at the cost of sincerity. In many cases it would appear that nothing short of a terrible calamity, or a mighty revolution, can make men who love evil, or are too indolent and careless to remedy it, put themselves to the task of a thorough renewal. Opening the eyes of these blind, is an act requiring Divine power and quickening. To do this, is the first work of the Gospel.

Seeking for Sunlight. Naturalists have long been puzzled by a strange habit of the swifts and sand martins, which, at twilight, when the day is darkening, ascend, as the lark does in the brighter hours, until they seem to be but tremulous specks, or become actually invisible. It has now been suggested, however, that the explanation is a simple one, and that the bird rises from the earth in search of the sunshine which, after the shadows have fallen upon the fields, still glows in the upper skies. And so it may be with the believer, who, when the eventide deepens around him, can rise in meditation, and thanksgiving, and prayer to those higher regions where there are no earth-born clouds to obscure the light. And, as the tiny bird brings back warmth for the night, so he too may bring down with him to his daily round some reflection of the glory of Him "dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto" (1 Tim. vi. 16).

Lonely Men and Women. Some months ago, we put in a plea, in these columns, on behalf of the great number of lonely men and women to be found in all large towns and cities; suggesting that some attempt should be made to cure their loneliness by offering to them occasional hospitality in our homes. We are glad to notice that a practical move is now being made in this direction, and we wish it success. It would be an unspeakable boon to thousands of persons to partake of the joys of some home. Of course, the grave difficulty that presents itself relates to the personal character both of host and guest. To receive some persons into the home life would be a calamity, as also would it be for some innocent creatures to enter certain homes. But so far as Christian people are concerned, this difficulty is not so very great. Let the churches make an earnest attempt to discover fellow Christians, or children of Christian parents who are all alone in great cities, and supply to them, as far as possible, some of the home joys which they have been compelled to sacrifice. To do this would save many a one from drifting into indifference or worse.

A Ministry of Quietness. It is worthy of notice that two or three leading Christian teachers are asking for a lessening of the strain and rush which characterize much of modern religious life. The ceaseless demands made upon the time of public men, and the tendency towards rushing to and fro in the fulfilment of engagements, must have a detrimental effect upon that quietness of spirit which is one condition of receiving continual power from on high. It is quite possible for men to be so "busy here and there" that their work lacks concentration, and consequently force. Many of the petty things which busy men are asked to do might just as well be done by others who are less fully occupied. The mere number of strokes does not tell so effectively as their force and directness.

The Churches and Criticism. Novelists and journalists have recently been possessed with an epidemic of criticism against "organized Christianity" which is marked more by virulence than justice. The churches have many faults and failings, ministers are distinctly imperfect men, and their members are often inconsistent. But is it true that the "working classes" and the "poor" are "outside" the churches through no fault of their own? To hear some critics talk one would think that the world was kept back from Christ solely by the hypocrisy of his followers. Nothing must be put down to the inherent sinfulness of human nature; to the prevalence of gambling, drunkenness and impurity; to the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eye, and the pride of life. After all, these are the really operant causes of antagonism to the Gospel; it has ever been so, and it will be so to the end. The Church is responsible for its imperfect witness to the "faith once delivered to the saints;" it has many abuses to correct; but it is not accountable for the world's indifference to the kingdom of God.

Publicans' Champions. Lord Balfour of Burleigh, in his reply last week to the deputation from the Temperance Legislative Board, practically took a brief for the publican when he declared that the relation between the number of public-houses and excessive drinking, as tested by the number of offences, was not so easily proved as temperance people generally thought. This is an old plea, but facts are stubborn things, and the Secretary of the United Kingdom Alliance replies with some figures which should settle the question. In Liverpool, for example, which once was "the black spot on the Mersey," the convictions for drunkenness have decreased nearly seventy-five per cent. since the justices began to reduce the number of licences. In 1890 there were 13,121 convictions, and in 1900 only 3,938, but 348 licences had in the meantime been refused, although the city had increased by more than one hundred thousand people. Surely this is significant enough.

A Preposterous Plea. Another publicans' champion is the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach. Speaking before the Bristol Licensed Victuallers' Protection Association last week, he rejoiced the hearts of his hearers with the implied assurance that no further taxation upon drink would be levied at the next Budget. Speaking of the Child Messenger Bill, he argued that, because as a lad of fourteen he had frequently been supplied with liquor for his own consumption at a certain public-house at Eton, and had yet escaped moral contamination, the view that children are demoralized by public-house surroundings is an exaggeration. As if the cases were analogous! Contending further that, if a child did not take home the full quota of liquor for which it had been sent, it would probably be punished by the parent, he expressed the following astounding opinion:—

> Of all things that Parliament need have done, he did not think it need have supplemented parental selfishness by passing a law for the purpose of preventing children consuming liquor between the public house where it was sold and the home of the person who should receive it.

What on earth has "parental selfishness" got to do with it? This is indeed a new plea for allowing children to acquire a taste for liquor. If they take it, punish them; if their parents punish them, charge them with selfishness for doing so. The generous parent is he who allows his children to sip and steal! To such straits is an eminent statesman driven for argument!

Drink at Home and Abroad. An article by Mr. Holt Schooling, the statistician, in The Fortnightly, on the drink figures of England, the United States, Germany, and France, brings out the appalling fact that while "John Bull" leads in the average consumption of drink per head, his rivals are following fast in his wake, and threaten to pass him. In other words, the civilized world is going back instead of forward in the matter of sobriety. If the consumption of drink during the years 1886-1900 be taken as 100, the consumption during the last five years of the century would be respectively as follows:—Germany 123, France 132, United States 120, and the United Kingdom 113. These figures are most disquieting, and show that the problem before the temperance reformer, so far from being solved, is becoming more and more accentuated. It means that the chief cause of crime, and one of the leading hindrances to the spread of true religion, is tightening its hold upon the most advanced nations. Is the Christian Church truly awake to this fact?

A Dangerous Poem. Mr. Kipling's recent poem in the Times advocating conscription in this country, is a strange conglomeration. His criticism of some of our national failings, our shallow optimism, our absorption in sports and pastimes, while our fellow-countrymen are bleeding and dying in thousands in South Africa, strikes a lofty note. But his remedy is worse than the disease. To fall back on exaggerated militarism as a corrective of sport-mania is a strange and futile notion. This country and America stand alone in their abhorrence of the military system which weighs so heavily on other civilized nations. The cure for frivolity is found in a more earnest spirit, in a realization of the essential solemnity of life, and in the deepening of the sense of daily duty and of spiritual trust. Would conscription help to foster these ideals? We should say, decidedly not.

"The New Christology." The prediction of a learned theologian some months ago that "the Church will yet have to fight, not simply for the Bible, but for her Lord Himself," seems about to be realized. Criticism concerning the dates of the Old Testament books is child's play compared with the determined attack now being made in every direction upon the Deity of our Lord. It is simply amazing to find how widespread is that spirit which calmly assumes the supernatural in Christ to be "impossible." The remarkable thing is, that in so many cases, a personal dictum that "miracle is impossible" is offered as a serious argument. A recent book on these lines most arrogantly brushes aside all the scholarship of the Christian Church—treating it with contempt—and unblushingly preaches bald rationalism from a theological professor's chair! This kind of literature, too, is offered free to all applicants through the post. So far as personal faith is concerned, only a deep practical experience of our Lord's Divine action can safeguard Christians from these attacks. But meanwhile, we may well be anxious for the young and immature.

Exit the Old Testament. There is a saying, "If extremists are only allowed to go far enough, they will solve all their questions in a final catastrophe." This saying is recalled by a perusal of Canon Cheyne's article on the Old Testament in the Nineteenth Century and After. Not content with relegating the patriarchs to the realms of myth, Canon Cheyne now asks for a hospitable reception to be given to the "advanced" German view that David, Saul, Jonathan, and Solomon are mere mythical characters—impersonations of solar powers! There is a limit to most things, and probably Canon Cheyne's daring demand will prove to be the limit of most men's patience with a theory as ridiculous as it is profane. While they are about it, the Iconoclasts might as well cry, "Exit the Old Testament;" for, according to them, there is next to nothing left worth guarding. After these fanciful theories have had their day, we may expect the rehabilitation of the sacred history by the critics as the natural order of things. Meanwhile, the devout reader of the Bible can go his way without much misgiving. Time and commonsense are on his side in spite of the critics. The myth theory has not been found very fruitful of results in the sphere of natural religion. It is not likely to have a better fate in that of revelation.

Light from China. Two items of good news reach us from China. The Court has returned to Pekin, and if its initial action is intended to be the keynote of the future policy, then the country will be open, as never before, to the Gospel. Sad and tragic as have been the events of the last three years, the martyrs' blood will not have been spilled in vain if, through their sacrifice, a larger door is opened for the Gospel. The more significant thing is the action of the Government in setting apart half a million taels for the founding of a university at Tai Yuen, where the worst of the massacres occurred. Rev. Timothy Richard, the well-known missionary to China, whose portrait and sketch appear in our present issue, is entrusted with the administration of the work of the university. Only those who know the intense conservatism of China can appreciate this step. God be thanked for it.

Progress in India. Persons who have been influenced adversely by the recent virulent criticisms passed upon missionary work in India should note the letter from Sir Charles Elliott which appeared last week in The Times. He gives official statistics showing that in the last decade alone the number of Christians has increased by considerably more than half a million. It is very satisfactory and most encouraging to have so cheerful a report from such a high authority as Sir Charles Elliott. In the face of such figures, which were obtained from the Imperial Census Commissioner, it is evident that the missionary critics, who complain that nothing is being done, are either ignorant of their subject or they wilfully misrepresent the facts. In either case they are entitled to no credence.

The Case of Miss Stone. The almost incredible delay in bringing to a satisfactory conclusion the negotiations with regard to Miss Stone's release is strongly suggestive of another sinister power at work, besides that of the villainy of brigands. Two or three very broad hints have been given in the newspapers as to the part that Russian agents are playing in the matter. A contemporary publishes part of a letter received from an American missionary residing in the East, in which he states that he has seen documents showing the hand of Joab in the matter. He declares that the Russian Consul-General at Sofia frankly told the American Consul-General that American missionaries were not wanted in Bulgaria. It is openly alleged that the brigands were paid to do their work. If this be so, something more is demanded than the payment of a ransom. America will not allow the methods applied to Stundists to be applied to her free citizens. We shall anxiously await the end of this affair.

A Continental Example. The Times' correspondent states that a Bill for the abolition of Sunday labour has been prepared by the Conseil Superieur du Travail, and that it will be dealt with very shortly by the Belgian Chamber of Representatives. The industrial population of Belgium certainly is a very hard worked one, and the amount of Sunday work is excessive; in fact, as The Times' correspondent remarks, "to the great proportion of the smaller shopkeepers, artisans, and mechanics, the Fourth Commandment is unknown in practice." Therefore, if the Bill is intended to have even the effect of making Sunday labour optional instead of obligatory, the result will be of the greatest benefit to the working classes, and, doubtless, it will pave the way for still greater changes in the national habits in regard to the Lord's Day. If only the English National Union of Organised Labour and the powerful trades-unions would take up the question of Sunday labour in these islands, they would act in the truest interests of the working men and women, for whose physical and spiritual advantage the Sabbath was divinely instituted.

The Morals of Mohammedanism. Recently there have been several attempts made to whitewash Mohammedanism, and to claim for it that in the countries in which it is a power, vice and intemperance do not flourish. The Koran, however, sanctions both slavery and polygamy, and in lands where Mohammedanism prevails vice is rampant. An able observer who has just returned from Morocco says that the slave market at Fez offers the key to a large part of the social system of that country, and it may safely be added, that slavery and polygamy are undoubtedly the most potent factors in the moral and intellectual degradation of that country. It says little for Mohammedanism that the disgusting slave market is opened with a form of prayer, and that after the cruel and indecent proceedings, buyers and sellers and vicious spectators alike resort to the Mosques. It is asserted that nearly 3,000 of these slaves, chiefly girls of from ten to twelve years of age, are imported annually, and that the trade brings in a large revenue to the authorities. France, since her occupation of Algeria, has done much to injure the trade, and it is certainly desirable that our own country should take action in regard to the suppression of that slave-hunting in Africa upon which the whole infamous traffic depends.

Luke xii. 20.

Beware of golden gods, nor dare to say,
"Soul, thou hast wealth for many a future day."
This night thy soul may be required of thee;
Then whose will all thy boasted increase be?
At thy too-late repentance hell will laugh,
And God inscribe "Thou fool!" for epitaph.

Practical Papers.

On "THE DISAPPOINTMENTS OF GOD."

WE are apt to ponder so much upon our disappointments in life that it is well to consider, with all reverence and godly fear, how frequently we are the cause of disappointment to our heavenly Father.

When a man makes a machine, upon which he has expended infinite time and thought and labour, great is his mortification if it should fail of its purpose. A month or two ago, an inventor of a "flying machine" announced his intention of testing his contrivance on an open space near London. A great crowd foregathered—curious, sceptical, ready to mock at the first signs of failure. Nor had they long to wait before the opportunity came to hoot the chagrined inventor from the field.

We may not draw too close a parallel between the human and the Divine, but we may legitimately say that failure on our part to fulfil the eternal purpose for which we were created and redeemed is a source of disappointment, more grievous than man can feel, to the Heart of infinite love which broods over our lives with passionate desire. We do not here enter into the bye-paths of surmise as to why God allows such failure, or as to his power to prevent it, nor kindred questions that will occur to thoughtful minds. We are concerned primarily with the one general thought, that it is in our power to disappoint our Maker; and with the consideration that we may, if we will, so live as to bring joy to his heart and glory to his name.

The suggestion that God, in some inscrutable sense, suffers disappointment is borne out by various glimpses given to us in Scripture of the intensity with which He yearns over his erring children. What a painfully fruitful garden of weeds was the heart of Israel from the day of redemption out of Egypt to those of the Captivity.

"I had planted thee a noble vine, wholly a right seed; how then art thou turned into the degenerate plant of a strange vine unto Me?" (Jer. ii. 21).

"Oh that my people had hearkened unto Me, and Israel had walked in my ways!" (Psa. lxxxi. 13). "Oh that thou hadst hearkened to my commandments!" (Isa. xlviii. 18).

So, too, is a similar thought evident in the tearful lament of our Lord over the holy city in its degeneracy—"If thou hadst known, even thou, in this thy day . . . . but now . . . !" And the same note breathes through the divine indictment of Laodicea—"I would thou wert . . . !"

But we must note that in each of these verses there is revealed an essential distinction between the disappointment of God and that of man. Man makes his machine, perhaps to bring renown to himself, perhaps to benefit his fellows, and is grieved at failure for their sake or his own; but in no sense can he regret it for the sake of the machine itself. But is not the lament of God for his people's loss? He "removeth one and setteth up another;" his purposes ripen fast; the wheels of his chariot brook no delay, in spite of the failure of men to do his bidding; but the loss to man himself calls forth the expression of His intensest regret. Complete the passages already quoted in part—"I should soon have subdued their enemies, and turned my hand against their adversaries." "Then had thy peace been as a river, and thy righteousness as the waves of the sea!" "If thou hadst known . . . the things which belong unto thy peace!" Similarly, his desire for Laodicea was that she should possess the gold, the raiment, the eye-salve—those spiritual attainments, the conspicuous lack of which so sadly impoverished her.

It is here that Divine disappointment and Divine compassion meet in one. It is not the petulant chagrin of a master-mind who is mocked of his fellow-men, but the depths of the Creator's heart stirred at the reckless folly of his rebellious creatures.

Can we estimate the irreparable loss we suffer by failing of his purpose for us? "Oh that thou hadst hearkened!" "If thou hadst known!" "Thou sayest . . . and knowest not!" Ah, the wilful stopping of the ear! Ah, the sorry ignorance that says so much and knows so little! Deaf to the wisdom of God, we are full of our own ignorance; blind to the things that belong unto our peace, we trifle with the elements of death; the adversaries surge in to our discomfiture, while God stays the hand that longs to put them all to rout; the enemy "comes in like a flood" when our peace should have been as a river, and our righteousness as the waves of the sea.

And some have found the world is vain,
Yet from the world they break not free,
And some have friends that cause them pain,
Yet have not sought a Friend in Thee.

Disappointment to God; unspeakable loss to ourselves—these are the reward of the rebellious heart—the spirit that in Church or individual is wise in its own conceits; that says, "I am rich, and have need of nothing," and knows not the miserable poverty of its own unspeakable nakedness.

On two occasions we read that Jesus "sighed"—when the deaf and dumb man stood before Him (Mark vii. 34), and when the Pharisees "began to question with Him, seeking of Him a sign, tempting Him" (Mark viii. 12). In the one case He sighed over the *un*used and *un*developed faculties of the afflicted man; in the other, over the *mis*used, *mis*directed energies of those who perversely vaunted their mental powers.

Is it not thus to-day? As the Saviour of men looks down upon the world, does He not sigh over the unused faculties lying dormant in the heart and in the Church? Multitudes there are who could accomplish so much for God, if only their ears were unstopped to heed his voice of counsel, if only their tongues were loosed to speak plainly of the things of God. Does He not sigh also over the misused energies of those who, whether of sincerity or hypocrisy, clamour so loudly with questionings of human reason that the still small voice is drowned in the strife of tongues? The latter cause Him even more pain than the former, for over the Pharisees He "sighed deeply in his spirit."

Well may He sigh over the manly forms and beautiful faces given over to the world, and lust, and sin. More deeply still may He sigh over those strong intellects and thoughtful minds which obtrude the din of human theories in antagonism to the Divine voice in its tender pleadings—"Take my yoke upon you, and learn of Me, . . . and ye shall find rest unto your souls."

For turbulent waters, peace; for tumult of men, rest—these are the rewards of the open ear and the obedient heart, which, in the stillness of communion with their Maker, will dare to listen—and to do. G.

Proportional Growth.*

By Rev. W. L. WATKINSON.

WE see Christian people give a one-sided preference to knowledge, feeling, conscience, or action, and the result is most unhappy. Some are betrayed into an exaggerated development of knowledge. Andrew Bonar says: "I fear that my delight in the Scriptures is very much because of the joy of the understanding." Now it is a good thing to read the Scriptures because of the joy of the understanding—not, however, if that intellectual joy so far predominates as to repress the pulses of the heart. Religion may so far become a matter of the understanding as to be little better than an abstract orthodoxy or a cold philosophy.

A one-sided preference of feeling is the fault of others. They delight in the imaginative, pathetic, and emotional side of the faith, to the neglect of the culture of the mind, will, and conscience. Their piety is lyrical, mystical, feverish, ecstatic. Duty is the one absorbing question, conscience the all-monopolising oracle, whilst it is forgotten that knowledge is essential to just judgment, and that love alone makes duty light.

UNPRACTICAL HOLINESS.

Others give undue prominence to the meditative and devotional side of life. A German writer says: "In this world we must not only have wings for the sky, but also a stout pair of boots for the paving-stones." Some Christians have more wing than boot—six wings, indeed, and hardly a shoe to their foot. They delight in flights of faith and fancy, and cut the poorest figure in practical life. We knew a saintly sister who with a week's ashes in the grate would sit with her feet on the fender talking eagerly about entire sanctification. She had a fine eye for pictures in the fire, and her soul was ravished with visions and reveries; but, entranced with her little apocalypse, she forgot the dust and cinders. Her neighbours saw the untidy hearth.

It is equally true, however, that some of a different temper despise meditation, and exaggerate the significance of practical life. A writer the other day expressed a wish that Thomas à Kempis' immortal book "Of the Imitation of Christ" had dealt rather with practical than with contemplative Christianity. As if practical life could ever become noble without the informing life of the Spirit!

THE BALANCE OF GRACES.

So we often witness a one-sided and morbid kind of religious character. As athletes train the body and ignore the intellect; as scholars sometimes develop the intellect unequally, the mathematical faculty excluding the poetic, the scientific passion starving the artistic—so truly devout people miss the sense of proportion in spiritual life; they underdo and overdo, and consequently present to the world in the name of Christ a false and puzzling phase of character.

How best shall we maintain that completeness and balance of graces which are so desirable? The most wonderful character ever displayed to the eyes of men is that of our Master, and a very remarkable thing about that character is its absolute completeness and perfect balance. Our Lord had no extravagancies or eccentricities. . . . What better, then, can we do than closely study our Master, live with Him, drink into his spirit? The New Testament gives no sanction to any inequality or disproportion of character, and it is impossible to study it carefully, daily, and sympathetically, without growing into a large, orderly, and balanced life. Every excess, every defect, is there rebuked. The incomparable One is ever before us, filling our soul with the thought and passion of perfect beauty. We are changed into His glory; we are complete in Him.

THE CHURCH AND THE CHILDREN.

SOME CONSIDERATIONS IN VIEW OF THE

SIMULTANEOUS MISSION TO THE YOUNG,

NOW BEING ARRANGED FOR BY THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL UNION.

Class-Effort.

By Rev. E. GRIFFITH-JONES, B.A., Balham.

WORK among the young is distributed along three channels—that in which each child is dealt with individually, in, and for, and by itself; that in which children are dealt with in classes, where the individual is still kept definitely in mind, though the teaching is collective in form; and that in which the appeal is to the multitude, as in special efforts and missions. Each method has its own laws and principles. In dealing with them it will be convenient to begin with the second; and this article will be devoted to the work and function of the Sunday-school teacher in influencing the young on behalf of Jesus Christ as their Saviour.

A word first on the importance and privilege of the work. There is a tendency to depreciate the value of Sunday-school teaching nowadays. In many churches it is very difficult to secure the necessary staff of teachers, and many of those best qualified for the work are prone to look down upon it, and to prefer their ease to the call of duty. It is true that no social éclat, no public recognition, belongs to the Sunday-school worker. The minister, and the deacons and elders occupy prominent positions in the church, and receive honour and praise for their efforts in the common good; seldom is this honour shown to teachers in the name of the church.

And yet, is there not something unique in a teacher's opportunity? The minister has a more intelligent and responsive audience, but he addresses people whose character is already more or less formed, and he has to penetrate through many integuments of custom and prejudice ere he can reach the heart; whereas children are plastic, impressionable and retentive, because of their very immaturity. The preacher has more influence over the present, the teacher over the future; the preacher over facts, the teacher over possibilities; the preacher has a wider field now, but no one knows how broad the river may become which finds its rise in the little fountain which bubbles up in the narrow pasturage of the Sunday-school class.

There is indeed only one person who has a higher function to fulfil than the teacher, and that is the mother, who has the advantage of having her children linked to her by natural ties of love and dependence. Therefore, those who seek the office of teacher, seek a good thing; and they who refuse it and reject it, are letting slip one of the most precious chances of doing good, and of moulding the lives of future generations.

Naturally the subject divides itself into three sections, which, however, are vitally interrelated—the Message, the Teacher, the Scholars.

I.—THE MESSAGE.

This is the religion of Jesus Christ as embodied in the Holy Scriptures. We begin with the assumption that this can be, and ought to be, imparted to the young from their earliest days.

This function primarily belongs to the parents, so that the teacher's work should properly be regarded as an adjunct to the parental office, contributory to it, and enriching it with a broader and more definite stream of instruction. In too many cases, however, the teacher is a substitute for the parents, in which case his responsibility is enhanced. Now, to teach religion to children, it would be well to remember, is a great task. It demands the highest use of all the faculties of brain and heart. There should of course be a sufficient intellectual apprehension of the facts and truths of the Christian faith to ensure their proper exposition; and there should be, still more, so firm a grasp of the vital verities as to enable the teacher to keep "the proportion of the faith," and to put all the teaching in its right perspective.

The true teacher is therefore an enthusiastic and devoted student of the Bible, up-to-date in his information, competent to distinguish between "the letter" that "killeth" and "the spirit" that "maketh alive," and careful not to present the Book in any such aspect as would later on lead the scholars into needless distress and difficulty. More than all, the teacher must make the very substance of the saving message of the Gospel his own, and be careful, in its exposition, not to allow himself to be shunted into side-tracks of discussion, or wander in mere by-ways of information. He has only one brief half-hour in the week for his work, and he must see to it that the very marrow of each lesson is first mastered, and then expounded to the best of his ability. Superficiality is the bugbear of Sunday-school teaching.

II.—THE TEACHER.

Is it needless to point out that only a Christian can properly teach the Christian faith? I fear not. Some superintendents and committees of selection are too prone to be satisfied with other qualifications in the absence of this, the great determining condition. To do this is to stultify a great work. Religion is not something that can be taught by an outsider; the teacher is not a professor or lecturer, expounding a system of thought in which he may, or may not be, a believer; he is the personal bearer of a message from God to the children; he should be chosen for this task, first and foremost, because he has himself experienced the saving grace of God in his own heart. While certain intellectual gifts are necessary to a successful teacher, the primal thing is that he must be a believer, full of earnest faith in the Gospel, and eager to be used as a medium for its transmission to others. It is the presence or absence of this "missionary quality" which ultimately determines the success or failure of a teacher with his class.

Further, the teacher must love his work. Better a few such men and women, aflame with their message, than a large staff whose interest in it is secondary and evanescent. And he should be a lover of children, full of interest in their ways, familiar with their limitations and preferences, and skilful in adapting the great Gospel to their immature but developing natures. There should be a close rapport between teacher and pupils, or their attention will not be given—and without that, no lesson can be taught or retained. Finally, he should remember that the one valuable thing he has to impart is his own faith in Christ, his own grasp of Divine truth, his own experience of things spiritual. The cultivation of his own piety should be his first care; and next to that, his power of imparting the flavour and quality of his own life to others.

III.—THE SCHOLARS.

These are men and women in the making, who need an intelligent religion as the crowning factor of their character. To make them realize their need of it, is the first condition of their acceptance of it. This is no easy task in many cases; the spiritual instinct in many children is very undeveloped; but it is there; and when once stirred into activity, there is no limit to the receptivity of the child-heart.

But the food must be adapted to their mental and spiritual digestion. "Milk for babes, strong meat for men," and a graduated course of nourishment and appeal all the way! Many boys and girls have tender consciences, and a very tormenting sense of sin; others are open to pathos and the appeal of love; others must be terrified with the consequences of wrong-doing ere they feel its peril and shame. It should be the aim of the teacher to set every string of the young heart vibrating to the music and thunder of the Gospel; every avenue of approach should be attacked in turn; no door should be untried, no faculty or sensibility left alone; the armoury of God should be ransacked for effective weapons of persuasion, attack, appeal, and constraint, till every member of the class is taken captive by the love and truth of Christ. This is a large programme; anything less comprehensive is inadequate to the need and the opportunity.

TWO FINAL HINTS.

(1) All teaching for children should be concrete, pictorial, imaginative. Abstractions and generalities glide over the child-brain like water off a smooth surface, but if interest is aroused by some definite incident, picture, or fact, there is some chance of impression and retention. At the same time, mere anecdotal teaching is bound to be superficial; and the habit of some teachers to spend their priceless time in "telling stories" is debauching to the minds, and debilitating to the characters, of their scholars. Sunday-school work is a serious matter, and can only be done well by keeping in full view the practical end of it all.

(2) A word should be said for the fast-vanishing method of question and answer, as opposed to the habit of most teachers of doing all the talking themselves. The most successful instructors have always pursued the Socratic method of taking in the pupil as partner in the labour and joy of thinking. This, in a much higher form, was the method of our Lord; and it should be followed by those who instruct others in his truth. It is not easy, but when definitely pursued, it is most effectual, and it greatly enhances the pleasure of the work, and makes the time fly.

By Rev. ALEX. SMELLIE, M.A., Carluke, N.B.

LET us look at four portraits—four portraits of one and the same person. They will help us to understand what the teacher must be whose efforts in the class itself are likely to win the young for the Lord Jesus Christ.

I.—A MAN.

First, in order of time, and in order of importance, comes the portrait of a man—a new man, a true man, a spiritual man, a man whom Christ leads in daily and happy captivity behind his chariot wheels. In New Testament Greek there is a rich variety of words to depict the servant of the Lord. One brings out the thoroughness of our service—how it extends to every member of the body, every faculty of the mind, every affection of the soul. A second insists on the swiftness of our service—how the business of the King, our Master, requires haste. A third delineates the strenuousness of our service—how it should evoke and employ our uttermost energy. A fourth reminds us of the sweetness of our service—how we are friends as well as vassals and thralls. The teacher must covet each of these words as the description of his own activity. But, before them all, another word stands, which declares, as its distinctive and momentous message, the inwardness of our service. We must ourselves be born into the home. The motive to teach and to work must come from within, from a conscience quickened, a mind enlightened, a heart satisfied, a will for which the commandments of Christ "wear the Godhead's most benignant grace."

Nowhere does a renewed, holy, winsome character count for so much as in the school. If we would guide our scholars into the truth, we must have a firm and experimental grasp of the truth ourselves; we must be able to give a reason for the hope that is in us. If we would lead the children to Him who is our Physician and Shepherd, we must be careful that we are keeping in close communion with Him. If we would certify them that the land is "good and large," they must see what brightness and vivacity and brotherliness vital religion has infused into our own disposition and life.

It has been said by Canon Wilberforce of his father that, in later years, he gave up preparing sermons, and simply prepared himself. Probably none of us has reached the stage when we can with safety abandon the preparation of the lesson; but the preparation of ourselves is yet more primary and imperative. Any falsehood is fatal. Any hypocrisy will shatter our influence. We must be oiketai, servants within the household of our Master, Christ.

II.—AN INTERCESSOR.

The next portrait is that of a Suppliant, an Intercessor, a Wrestler with God. He is the best and most successful teacher who comes to the class directly from the secret place of prayer. The glory of the Mount will linger in his face. The power of the Highest will overshadow him. The children, with all their mischief and boisterous spirit, are likely to hear God's footfall beating time to his. In a way which they cannot well explain, they will be impressed, and lifted to thoughts of better things.

When the lesson for the day has been studied and mastered, is the equipment then complete? No, it is not complete, until you have kneeled down, and rehearsed its various points and truths in God's hearing, and begged Him that his Holy Spirit may use each of these for his own gracious and saving purposes.

When, as you read and pondered your subject, you kept the different members of your class before the eye of your imagination, and considered the temperament and the need of each, have you done everything that you can do? No, you have still to make mention of every name to their Father and yours, their Redeemer and yours, pleading for them one by one with an importunity which will not let God go.

Once James Guthrie, of Stirling, "the short man who could not bow," the brave captain of the Covenant, lay sick and at the point of death. But Archibald Johnston, Lord Wariston, came to visit him. Let Wodrow tell the story. "All that prayed before Wariston were conditional in their petitions for his life. When he came to pray he was mighty peremptory, and would not at all take a refusal, and said, 'Lord, Thou knowest this church cannot want him.'" We must learn to be "violent men" like Archibald Johnston, to be "mighty peremptory," to take no refusal. When we have prevailed with God, it will be strange if we do not prevail with the children.

III.—A LOVING INSTRUCTOR.

And the third portrait is that of a Lover, an Instructor who speaks the right word in the right tone. Here is the teacher face to face with his class. It is not sufficient that he should manage to convey to them some understanding of the contents of the lesson. It is not even sufficient, though it is much, that he should capture their interest, and should make the people and the events of the Bible live before their minds. Unless they feel that he loves them, his work is in vain; he is "become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal." The love must be personal; it must see with its clear vision into each separate nature; it must find the particular path which runs straight to the citadel of every young heart. The love must be patient; like Browning's Grammarian, it must remember that "man has for ever," that it is toiling for eternity, that it deals with souls which have an immortal future stretching in front of them; these thoughts will prevent it from fretting because it does not immediately see the fruits of its labour. The love must be lowly; it must be prepared to stoop to any condescension, after the transcendent pattern of Him who became poor for our sakes, in order that thus it may gain some; it must take as much pains with the unattractive and troublesome scholars as with those who are bright and lovable; always in front of it there must float the dream, which is not all a dream, of how the poorest may be lifted from the dust and may be set with princes. The love must be Christ-captivated and heavenly; no doubt must be left in the children's thought regarding the teacher's master-passion; every Sabbath they must hear him beseech them, in his Lord's stead, to be reconciled to God. Mr. Jowett, of Birmingham, has done well to remind us how essential "the wooing note" is in our preaching. But is there anybody so susceptible to that note, anybody so disdainful of a less tender accent, as a child? We shall make no headway unless we love him.

IV.—AN ANGLER.

The last portrait is the portrait of a Fisher—an Angler rather, for he does not now throw out his net to encompass and secure as many as possible—he is intent on gaining one individual life. Perhaps I am straying beyond my special subject of class-effort; if I am, the importance of the matter and the value of this method must be my excuse. When the hour of teaching is over, have you ever kept a single member of the class behind with yourself for a little while? Have you travelled through all the members in this way, one after the other? Have you appealed to each to yield heart and life, there and then, to the seeking Saviour? Have you, remembering his promise that, if any two agree as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done, knelt down in the child's company, and pleaded for her—for him—that now "the morning may awaken, the shadows may decay"? The memory of such conversations and such prayers remains long in young souls; if they have not their harvest at once, though often they have, they have it after many days. After all, the presentation of general truths, let them be never so solemn, leaves the majority of us indifferent and unaffected. We have to feel ourselves standing alone, burdened with individual sin, requiring individual pardon, before we can comprehend what salvation is. Our duty as teachers is only fulfilled when we have brought Christ to the heart's door of every scholar in our classes. A Man in Christ, a Suppliant, a Lover, a Fisher for separate souls—may the fourfold portrait indeed hold true of us!

The Holy Spirit.

O God the Holy Ghost!
We yield us to thy sway;
Have Thou, unhindered in our souls,
Thine own, thy perfect way.
Awake each heart to meet
Its Pentecostal hour;
And make us willing for thy will,
In this thy day of power.

O God the Holy Ghost!
Our hearts have grieved Thee sore;
But now we open wide to Thee
Each hidden chamber's door.
No longer, now in part,
Thy presence there be known;
But let us be possessed and filled
Henceforth by Thee alone.

O God the Holy Ghost!
We know not all we need;
We only know that we have come
The promise now to plead.
We know not all we ask;
Nor all we long to be;
We only know our inmost hearts
Are all athirst for Thee.

O God the Holy Ghost!
Low, low our spirits bow;
Thy presence, Holy and Divine,
Unseen, is with us now.
Be this an hour of death,
And yet of Life indeed;
For we would die, that we may live,
And thus from sin be freed.

O God the Holy Ghost!
Thine own great work perform,
Come with the fire, or rushing wind,
The earthquake, or the storm;
Or in the "still small voice,"
As seemeth best to Thee,
But let these waiting hearts of ours
Thy dwelling places be.

At Mr. Moody's Grave.

By HENRY VARLEY.

THE snow had fallen thickly, carpeting with its fleecy whiteness the whole of the surrounding scene. The Christmas season was at hand. Numbers of the students from Northfield Seminary were leaving the goodly buildings by sleigh and railway car for "home, sweet home."

It was on "Round Top," whither sacred memories had drawn the writer, that thought and feeling were busy. Two brief years had intervened since yonder home of simplicity and welcome had known the latest breathings of a life endeared to millions by reason of the exceeding riches of God's grace seen in it. Slightly raised, and just a wee bit aside from the actual summit, stands the simple but substantial headstone, enclosed with chains, telling that beneath lies buried all that could die of the honoured D. L. Moody. A fresh wreath of green had just been placed beside the stone by loving hands. Residents, students, and friends had come to look upon a spot sacred to choice and varied memories.

The shades of night were gathering rapidly, and there passed in review times of the years gone by—early days when the Spirit of the Lord wrought effectually in the energetic, vigorous young life. The promise of great fruitfulness was there. Look around and note the tree of that life to-day. How broad-spreading its branches, how abundant the goodly fruit! At least thirty substantial buildings devoted to education, training, and Bible study are seen, wherein young lives have been and are being instructed and characters fashioned. Here thousands of the sons and daughters of the great Republic have found home and friendship and blessing. Chicago also, with its vigorous and effective Bible Institute and People's Church has been and continues to be a great centre of Christian training of life and work. This is also the fruit of our beloved friend's life.

There is a remarkable echo at Northfield. When any sound, such as the whistle of the distant engine, is made, it passes into wide repetitions that track the encircling hills. Clear, distinct, and oft-repeated, yet for all this the strains gradually become faint, and are eventually lost. But far more remarkable are the echoes of the voice of the Lord, telling of his love and grace, which have, through his beloved servant, gone out to the ends of the earth; they have not been lost, but have gathered volume in their spread.

Where others in such service might have reaped a fortune for themselves, is it not true that Dwight L. Moody used "royalties" and "gifts" as accumulating seed corn, constantly expending them in view of increasing and reproducing harvests for God? There the proofs stand—Hermon and Northfield!

Methinks I hear him still speak of Northfield's natural beauty and loveliness, nor can I affect surprise that his latest years revealed increasing hold upon his native town—a hold so strong that nothing less powerful than the winning of souls for God in distant fields could take him from the home he loved so well. As of Bethany it is written, "The town of Mary and her sister Martha," so may it be said of Northfield, "The town of D. L. Moody." Here in his life's intent and work he still lives, though to the dim outlook of the sense of sight he has ceased to be. As we leave, the reigning quiet of this hallowed spot desire indites petition: "Great Lord of the harvest, grant us here and now a double portion of the Spirit with which Thou didst inspire Thy servant whose name speaks loudly to us as it fades before the waning light. We ask Thee, Father in heaven, to supply the needs of this great work. Let Hermon and Northfield live before Thee. Move the hearts of the stewards of substance to aid by symyathy, prayer, and purse, in the furtherance of this remarkable service. Grant to all the workers, upon whom responsibility rests, 'wisdom, love, and a sound mind!' May spiritual life and power maintain the chief place amongst the hundreds who are here!"

Samuel and Saul.

The Young Levite.

(1 Sam. ii. and iii.).

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

DEAN STANLEY tells us that, in his gentler moments, Luther used to dwell on these early chapters of the Books of Samuel with the tenderness which formed the occasional counterpoise to the ruder passions and enterprises of his stormy life. Indeed, all students of the Scriptures in all ages have been arrested by the figure of this little child, girded with his linen ephod, or in the little robe which his mother brought him from year to year, when she came up with her husband to offer the yearly sacrifice.

With what passionate and almost irrepressible desire the mother must have anticipated that annual visit, all too transient to satisfy her natural longings. It must have been hard enough to leave him at all at so tender an age as three; and specially with the women who seem to have been regularly occupied in the service of the Tabernacle, and to whose care he was probably entrusted. Probably not all of them were infected with the shameful sin into which several seem to have been seduced (1 Sam. ii. 22, R.V.). There may have been among them some, like Anna, the prophetess, who departed not from the sacred shrine, worshipping with fastings and supplications, night and day (Luke ii. 37). These would attend to the physical needs of the child, whilst his training in the law and the elements of such education as was possible, would be under the direct supervision of the high priest.

But Hannah was solaced for her deprivation. There was the precious memory of those early years, when he had filled the house with his childish prattle, and she had been able to sow in the receptive soil of his tender heart the seeds of manhood's harvest. Other children also were born to her; and, as three sons and two daughters grew up at her knees, surely the thought of their little brother in his sacred office, must have been a continual inspiration, and a subject of keen perennial interest. We need not accept the Jewish legend, which narrates that, as one of Hannah's children was born, one of Peninnah's died. Such an infliction would have given no satisfaction to Hannah. Enough that Jehovah had vindicated the woman's wrongs, as He will assuredly vindicate all those who, when they are reviled revile not again, when they suffer threaten not, but commit themselves and their complaint to Him who judgeth righteously. Peaceful, reverent, and loving thoughts filled the mother's heart as she wrought at the little robe.

THE INFLUENCE OF A MOTHER.

Mothers still make garments for their children, not on the loom or with their busy needles merely, but by their holy and ennobling characters displayed from day to day before young and quickly-observant eyes, by their words and conversation, and by the habits of their daily devotion. What the children see they imitate, and unconsciously array themselves in the gentleness or rudeness, the reverence for religion or indifference, the refinement or coarseness of manner, which are daily presented to their gaze. As fish take on the mottled colour of the ground on which they lie, and as the plovers change their plumage to match the winter or the spring, so children wear the robes which their mother's character and behaviour, temper and tones, weave for them.

"And so the child did minister unto the Lord before Eli the priest," slept his innocent sleep unconscious of the sins around him, attracted the growing attachment of the old man by his reverent affection and endearing ways, and gave many evidences that he was being prepared to become a link between God and his people, a mediator between the old and the new, between the turbulent days of Samson and the splendid peace of the reign of Solomon.

THE SIN OF ELI'S SONS.

Notice THE SACRILEGE AND SINS OF ELI'S SONS. "Now the sons of Eli were sons of Belial (worthlessness); they knew not the Lord, nor the due of the priests from the people" (ii. 12, R.V.). The law of Moses authorized the priest to take as his portion, and instead of fees in coin, the whole of the sin-offerings, and the breast and right shoulder of the peace-offerings, the fat only of the latter being burned on the altar, whilst the remainder of the animal was handed back to the offerer, to be consumed by himself, his sons and his daughters, his men-servants and his maid-servants, and the Levite that was within his gates (Deut. xii. 12). It was befitting, as the Apostle states it, that they which ministered about sacred things should eat of the things of the temple, and that they which waited upon the altar should have their portion with the altar (1 Cor. ix. 13).

The first act of every peace-offering was the sprinkling of blood upon the altar round about; the second was the burning of the internal fat. It was never eaten, but always consumed by fire. The flame fed on it, as the food of God, who, so to speak, ate with the accepted worshipper (Lev. iii. 16, 17). After this solemn rite was performed, the priest's portion was waved and presented to God, and the group of worshippers made way for others, carrying with them their portion for the joyful sacrificial feast.

Here Eli's sons stepped in with their rapacious greed. Not satisfied with their portion, they sent their servant after the retiring group, with a flesh-hook of three teeth in his hand, and while the meat was boiling for the sacred meal, he thrust his trident into the cauldron, and claimed as the priest's perquisite whatever was brought up. "So they did in Shiloh unto all the Israelites that came thither."

But even this did not long satisfy them. They went on to insist that after the breast and shoulder had been handed them, but before the remainder had been put to boil, they should be supplied with raw meat from the offerer's portion; nor would they burn the fat, which was the essential part of the whole sacrifice, and one for which the worshippers must needs wait, until their demands were satisfied. This final touch seems to have aroused the long-suffering people to exasperation. "At least," they said, "wait till the Lord's portion has been presented before you proceed to your lawless depredations. Burn the fat, and then you may take as much as you desire." "Nay," was the ruthless answer of the priest, "but you shall give it me now, or I will take what I choose by force." "And the sin of the young men was very great before the Lord, for men abhorred the offering of the Lord."

STUMBLING BLOCKS TO OTHERS.

It becomes us to inquire with much anxiety and heart-searching, whether we, as the servants of Christ, are doing or abetting things which cause men to abhor that holy Name by which we are called. We may begin with our own characters and habits, and thence proceed to our doctrinal statements, and ecclesiastical arrangements. Rightly or wrongly, I have heard of men forswearing the Christian religion, to which they were once attached, because professing Christians were so dilatory in paying their debts, so evasive in their excuses, so profuse in promises that were never kept, so difficult to please, so thoughtless and careless in their demands on work-people and servants, so touchy and fretful, so liable to do things in business which high-minded men of the world would not permit. I have heard of men, rightly or wrongly, turning from misstatements of Christian doctrine which revolted their moral sense and made God our Father as cruel as Chemosh or Molech. I have heard of men, rightly or wrongly, refusing to enter places of worship because of the class distinctions which were maintained, and the strong dislike with which a stranger's admission into the family pew was resented. For these things too many excuse their refusal of the Gospel and their absence from the house of prayer.

Not content with their extortionate greed, Hophni and Phinehas perpetrated the vilest excesses of heathenism amid the woods and vineyards of Shiloh. Licentious rites had, from time immemorial, been associated with heathen festivals, but never before had they sullied the sacred vestures of the priests of Aaron's line. So abandoned were these young men, though they had wives of their own, that they did not scruple to lead astray the women who were appointed to perform the various offices about the sanctuary that demanded female labour.

Remonstrances were addressed to the aged priest, he heard of their evil doings from all the people (ii. 23); but instead of strong disapproval and stringent threats, he contented himself with a mild rebuke, "He said unto them, Why do ye such things? Nay, my sons, for it is no good report that I hear; ye make the Lord's people to transgress." On this, the Divine Judge makes the terrible comment, that his sons made themselves vile, and he restrained them not. He had reproved, but not restrained them. Even supposing they had disregarded the reproof of their father, they could hardly have defied their deposition by him as High Priest, embodying as He did the highest authority in the realm. And for this weak laxity he was condemned and deposed. "Therefore the Lord, the God of Israel, saith, I said, indeed, that thy house and the house of thy father should walk before Me for ever; but now the Lord saith, Be it far from Me, for them that honour Me I will honour, and they that despise Me shall be lightly esteemed."

THE NEED OF FAMILY TRAINING.

This suggests a very serious inquiry for those who take a prominent position in the Church, and before the world, but who neglect their own families. We are held responsible for our children. Our weakness in restraining them is sin, which will be inevitably followed, not only by their punishment, but by our own. Better do less in the Church and the world, than allow your children to grow up a misery to themselves and a reproach to you. Remember that one essential qualification for office in the primitive Church, was the wise and wholesome rule of house and children. If a man could not keep his children in subjection, with all gravity, and rule his house well, he surely could not know how to take care of the house of God (1 Tim. iii. 4, 12). Probably Eli had not begun early enough. The wise parent will begin training children from their earliest months, to say nothing of years; and the early strain of careful observation and chastisement may well be lightened and eased by remembering that the child who from the earliest is trained in God's way will not depart from it when he is old.

Above all, let us seek the conversion of our young children to God. The Apostle distinctly affirms that God will give us life for those who sin not unto death; and this description is, above all, applicable to little children. Surely He will not be unrighteous to forget the tears and prayers, or to overlook the faith, of those who travail a second time till Christ is formed in the hearts of their offspring. As the child of godly parents, who cannot date the hour of my conversion, because the love of God stole over my heart in early boyhood, like the dawn of a summer sky, I put my seal to that word of God as true:—"My Spirit that is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, from henceforth and for ever" (Isa. lix. 21, and 1 John v. 16).

SUNDAY, January 19. Revelation xvi.

IN this chapter we have the judgment of the Kingdom and Empire of the Beast. The dragon, the beast, and the false prophet (v 13) form a blasphemous and God-opposing trinity. It is an instance of the awful mimicry of Divine things which has always been present in our world since the fall of man. "The mystery of iniquity" is the counterfeit of "the mystery of godliness." The dragon assigns his authority to the beast, as the Father his to the Son. As the ten-horned beast is crowned with diadems (xiii. 1), so our Lord has many. The false prophet, like the Holy Spirit, tells all men to worship, and confirms his testimony to the beast by miracles. We need wisdom and grace to try the spirits whether they be of God, for many false prophets are gone out into the world.

There are a great many points of similarity between these vials and the plagues of Egypt. It is perhaps impossible to allocate their exact fulfilment and application. But as it has been in the past, so it will be; great physical disturbances seem indissolubly associated with the sins of mankind or the transition from one age to another. In the midst of such disturbed conditions of human and physical life, the Son of Man comes (v. 15). And the more unmistakably trouble comes on the world, the more eagerly may we expect the advent of the Lord.

The word Armageddon (v. 16) is derived from the Hebrew Har, a mountain, and Megiddo, which was the scene of the overthrow of the Canaanites under Deborah and Barak. It is in the great plain of Esdraelon. There also Josiah, who was allied to the empire of Babylon, was defeated and slain. The drying up of the Euphrates (v. 12) may refer to the wasting away of the Turkish power, and the return of the Jews to their own land; but, for my part, I am content to do my best in the service of Christ and his Church, leaving Him to unfold the majestic programme of his purpose.

MONDAY, January 20. Revelation xvii.

The great city, Babylon, is described in the preceding visions as a woman seated on a scarlet monster (comp. v. 5 with xiv. 8). She stands for either the pagan Roman Empire, or the Roman Catholic Church. The descriptions of this and other chapters befit either. Generally, probably Babylon is the emblem of any great anti-Christian power which depends on material force, and is permeated by the love of sensuous gratification. Perhaps, says one, the Apostate Church, including the Roman, Greek, and even Protestant Churches, is referred to. As soon as professing Christians are seduced from their first love to Christ, and become mere professors, and not possessors, they are classed as members of the polluted and fallen church, which is characterized by impurity and persecution (5, 6).

As to the ninth verse, it is, of course, notorious that Rome is situated on seven hills. In pagan times, an annual feast commemorated this; and on imperial coins she is represented as a woman seated on seven hills. There is obviously some closer connection than we can perhaps decipher between the seven hills and the ten horns. If the former represent spiritual power, may not the latter stand for the temporal? And if so, does not the whole figure describe the union of the spiritual pretensions and assumptions of the apostate Church, which have been, in all ages, associated with the alliance of kings and princes, of governments and armies? But this alliance always ends in disaster.

TUESDAY, January 21. Revelation xviii.

Babylon's final judgment is celebrated in an ode of sublime splendour. But before her fall God's people are exhorted to come out and be separate (Jer. l. 8; li. 6, 45). In every apostate and world-conforming community there are individual members belonging to God's invisible and true Church, and these, if they would be safe, must come out. As Lot was warned to leave Sodom before its overthrow, and as the early Christians fled from Jerusalem to Pella, before the legions of Vespasian closed in on the doomed city—so, when the servants of God have delivered their protests within the Church, and they have been disregarded, they have simply no alternative but to come out and be separate, and not touch the unclean thing. "Babylon, which stands for Apostate Christendom, is not to be converted, but destroyed."

Let us recall here a remark of St. Augustine, which contains a deep truth: "Babylon is a former Rome, and Rome a latter Babylon. Rome is a daughter of Babylon, and by her, as by her mother, God has been pleased to subdue the world under one sway." The people of God have always been opposed by this apostate power, known under different names. To Noah's descendants, there was Babel under Nimrod; to Israel, Babylon under Nebuchadnezzar; to the New Jerusalem, the Lamb's Bride, the Apostate and Fallen Woman.

The merchandise, here enumerated, does not refer, probably, to literal commerce; but to carnal luxury and pleasure-seeking which are associated with professing Christendom. When a Church, which should hold fellowship with the unseen and eternal, makes flesh her arm, she often fascinates and compensates her children by sensual ritualism, by flattery, and by liberal indulgence as to the gratification of the flesh. How needful it is for us to examine ourselves, and ask whether we be absolutely true and faithful to our Bridegroom, Jesus!

WEDNESDAY, January 22. Revelation xix.

Here is the thanksgiving of the Church! In a great voice, the much people of Heaven celebrate the overthrow of her great rival, which corrupted the earth. It is only when the whole plan of God is achieved that we shall come to see how true and righteous were God's judgments. With this song of triumph another mingles full of congratulation. It is the marriage-ode, which celebrates the marriage of the Lamb, referred to by our Lord in his notable parables, when Israel shall be fully united with Jehovah, her husband.

It is, of course, true that Jew and Gentile, during the present dispensation, make the one Church, of whom the Apostle says (Eph. v.), that the Lord will present her to Himself without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but it is a grave question how far we are justified in introducing that conception into this book, the whole imagery of which is so distinctly Jewish.

The white horse (v. 2) on which the Son of God rides forth differs greatly from the ass-colt on which He entered Jerusalem. The ass is for peace, the horse for war. He comes to judge the beast—i.e., the world-power, which has ever been in antagonism to the principles of his Kingdom. We must distinguish between this and the final judgment. Here we have the introduction of the millennial reign (compare Matt. xxiv. 27, 29, 37, 39). His vesture is dipped in blood—not his own, but of his foes (Isa. lxiii. 2). Here at last is the fulfilment of the second Psalm (v. 15; and Psa. ii. 9). Whatever opposes the Kingdom of Christ, which involves the true blessedness of man, is doomed to destruction, for the Lord Jesus will remove from that kingdom all that offends, oppresses, and defiles. Perhaps even now He is riding forth. Are we following in his train?

THURSDAY, January 23. Revelation xx.

Satan had given his power, throne, and authority to the Beast, and False Prophet. It was appropriate, therefore, that his judgment should follow theirs. When our Lord took his seat as the Mediator and Intercessor at the right hand of the throne, the Accuser was cast out. Having no longer place in heaven, he came down to earth to build up a powerful confederacy against the Bride and Kingdom of Christ, but again he was foiled. As we have seen, Babylon, the Beast, and the False Prophet are overthrown; and now Satan himself is cast into the pit, and the seal there is faster than the one he caused to be affixed to the sepulchre of our Lord. Surely this is the characteristic of the millennial age—not that every one should be regenerate, but that the strong influences on the side of sin which now emanate from the prince of the power of the air should be arrested, and be replaced by holy and blessed influences, making for peace and righteousness, and proceeding from Christ and his enthroned saints. Then we shall reign on the earth (v. 5).

But every one will not be regenerate, else there could be no uprising of war against the beloved city. There will be one last supreme effort against holiness and righteousness, but it will be abortive. Then will follow the general resurrection, the great assize, the opening of the books, and the final judgment. We whose names are written in the Lamb's Book of Life, shall not stand at that bar; we have already been judged in Christ, and shall have received our rewards at his judgment-seat. (2 Cor. v. 10).

This chapter describes the new creation, which shall arise on the ruins of the old. The present is reserved unto fire, and out of that baptism there shall arise a new heavens and earth—no single grain or particle of the old being lost, but all purified and transfigured. All things shall be new, but best of all we shall be new—new creatures for the new creation.

The New Jerusalem is the redeemed Church in its permanent union with the Lord. Man began in a garden, but the last vision given of his condition is in a city. In that blessed condition there shall be fellowship with all the good and great of every age. In a very literal sense, we shall be fellow-citizens with the saints. All ages and dispensations will blend there. Angels at the gates, the names of the twelve tribes and of the apostles of the Lamb, engraved in imperishable characters—there shall be infinite variety, as indicated by the enumeration of the precious stones, but an essential unity, as they glow in the light of the one Blessed Lamb.

No temple, because every act is worship. No luminary, for the presence of God is light, in which is no darkness at all. No closing of the gates, for there shall be nothing to exclude. No lack of aught, for the whole universe shall be laid under contribution. All this is at the best but material imagery. We know not what we shall be. The most exalted mind can form no satisfactory conception of that glorious condition. It is enough that we shall be with Him and like Him for ever.

SATURDAY, January 25. Revelation xxii.

The first five verses of this chapter obviously belong to the previous one, from which they should not be severed. The ever-flowing river shows that the whole life of the blessed depends on the Life of God, resident in the enthroned Lamb, and communicated through the Holy Spirit. In Eden there was one tree of life; here a grove with perennial fruit, not protected by a flaming sword, but standing freely in the main thoroughfare, that all who will may pluck the fruit.

When the visions are ended, John is assured of the reality and truth of all that he has heard and seen, and it would seem as though the voice of the Master Himself broke in on them with the assurance, repeated again and again, that He was coming quickly; and who shall say that that assurance has failed, when we measure the flight of time by the years of the right hand of the Most High (vv. 7, 12, 20)? Let it also be borne in mind that every great event, like the fall of Jerusalem, or the sack of Rome, is a coming of the Christ. It is interesting to notice that the angel describes himself as "a fellow-servant," both with John and the prophets. Notice also the alteration made in R.V. of v. 14—very significant and in keeping with the constant reference throughout the Book to the precious blood.

The appeal of verse 17 is to the Saviour, "Come, Lord Jesus!" The blessed Spirit is in and with the Church through the present age, and teaches her to long for the Lord.

So we close the last page of Scripture with the hope of the Advent thrilling in our hearts; and as we turn again to the first page, how little can any of us tell whether that Advent may not have taken place before we come again to these words? "Come, Lord Jesus," and until then thy grace be with us. F. B. M.

A Home for the Homeless.

Mr. E. WILSON GATES.

FOR eleven years, Medland Hall, Ratcliff, has been the centre of one of the most remarkable and successful undertakings that our practical Christianity has established. It provides a free shelter and a square meal for men who are homeless and penniless. It is filled every night in the week, and every week in the year, with those who have the key of the street, and it has done much to rescue from despair many hundreds who have had the misfortune to fall upon evil times.

The superintendent of the work carried on at Medland Hall is Mr. E. Wilson Gates. No one can doubt his entire fitness for his post. He has the qualifications of mind and heart. He is as far-seeing as he is sympathetic. He is seldom if ever imposed upon. He seems as if he could smell an impostor. Yet a true tale of woe always awakens a chord of helpful pity in him. He devotes himself to the Mission with an intense energy, a real unselfishness, a splendid consecration. He knows how to get funds, and how to use them to the best advantage; and whether in his office at the Memorial Hall, or conducting a service for his homeless clients, you feel that he is cut to the pattern of a man needed for that position.

The story of this "Home for the Homeless" is full of pathos. It presents many real tragedies. It shows how vast is the number included in what is called "the submerged tenth." It tells the sad story of multitudes who have been reduced to something worse than beggary through sheer misfortune, and how, in numerous cases, a little help, a warm shelter, and a common meal for a few days have been the means of setting them on their feet again. There are more homeless men in London than there are homeless dogs, and inquests are constantly revealing cases of death from starvation. Yet Medland Hall is the only free shelter in London. The casual ward of a workhouse is not a free shelter; so much oakum must be picked, so many stones broken. The result is that casuals are unable to go in search of work until a day has passed, and the morning of the next day far spent, with the jobbing appointments all made. At Medland Hall, no matter what time a man wishes to rise, he is called by the attendant, and is among the early applicants for any casual job which is to be obtained. It is this free aspect of the shelter and help which are given which makes this Mission so effective.

The Hall was opened in 1891. On the first night fifty-one inmates were accommodated. At that time, and for the first four years, no sleeping bunks were provided. Yet, even for the comparatively poor accommodation then made, there were far more applicants than could be received. In 1895, 300 bunks were introduced. Three years later the building was enlarged; separate beds and comfortable bedding were provided. From 1895 to the end of 1900 the average admissions have been 126,000 a year, and during the time that the Hall has been opened as a free shelter nearly one million and a half have received its benefits. Unfortunately the accommodation is not equal to the applications. During the last four years as many as 81,000 men have been turned away for lack of room. Happily, if a sleeping bunk could not be supplied them, they could and did receive food, the same as those who remained.

The only condition of entrance to Medland Hall is the condition of being penniless and homeless. A man who has sixpence can secure accommodation elsewhere. But Medland Hall is for the man who has nothing. Any poor man who can give a satisfactory account of himself can obtain a ticket for admission. Each ticket entitles a man to a bunk for six nights. He can use the first, and then if next day he finds work and earns enough to pay for food and lodging elsewhere, he can reserve his tickets until such time as he is "down on his luck" again, or he may use his tickets for six consecutive nights. The giving of food was not commenced until after the free shelter had been opened a year. Now every man on entering receives a half-pound of bread and butter, and from the year 1892 to the end of the century 300 tons of bread was consumed, costing about £2,500. If any of the men have a halfpenny in their pocket, they can, if they wish, obtain a little tea; and as friends in trouble are often sympathetic, it is common enough for those who can purchase this luxury to share it with their less fortunate neighbours.

There are no cast-iron rules at Medland Hall. Within the limits of good order the men are perfectly free to smoke, read, or chat among themselves. If they want to write to their friends, stationery and stamps are furnished to them. If any of them desire to be shaved or have their hair cut, provision is made for that; and if their clothes or boots are too far worn even for penniless men, they can be supplied with materials for mending them. During the winter evenings concerts are frequently arranged, and always on Sunday evening there are song-sermons, and "brief, bright, brotherly" addresses given by Mr. Gates or someone interested in his work.

The cost of this Mission, considering the immense good it is doing, is surprisingly small; £1,000 a year covers the outlay on administration, rent, repairs, furnishing, food, lighting, and firing; and when that amount is divided, it will be found that this work of helping men over temporary difficulties and saving them from despair is done for three half-pence per man per night. There is no other institution, either in London or the country, where such real help is rendered at so small a cost.

The men who are to be found at Medland Hall come from all classes of society. There is only one point of similarity—they are penniless, and homeless in London. Among them have been found clergymen, Nonconformist ministers, university scholars, doctors, lawyers, editors, while every trade known to man has been represented. They have come from the four quarters of the globe. Medland Hall is a house of cosmopolitans, a home for the nationalities of the world. The question, Who is my neighbour? is answered on the broad lines indicated by Christ Himself.

One of the most useful branches of this philanthropic enterprise is that of emigration. No fewer than 400 men have been sent to Canada, where new openings have been found for them, and, with few exceptions, all have improved their condition and prospects. Their testimony is uniform and emphatic, that in going abroad they have found a stepping-stone to better things. Instead of being hampered by misfortune, and crowded out where there were more people than places, they have had presented to them a future which is full of bright possibilities. In a recent issue we gave three illustrations of the kind of cases which Medland Hall has to deal with. We add a few more:—

Thomas —— came from Sussex. He had been a farm labourer, and thought he could do better for himself in London. He came, and saw, but did not conquer. The right niche for him did not present itself. He was reduced to want. Medland Hall took him in. Inquiries concerning him were satisfactory. He remained for two weeks at the Hall, after which he agreed to cross the Atlantic. Now he is prospering on something better than a Sussex starvation wage of 18s. a week.

A man who, in the spring of 1895, was homeless and penniless in London, and glad to avail himself of free shelter at Medland Hall, was, with a number of others, sent to Canada. After six years experience of life in the Dominion, he sends a friendly letter to Mr. Gates, with whom he regularly corresponds, saying, "I have been here six years, come May. I am glad to say that I am now my own master. I own a shop and 300 acres of timber. I hope, by the help of God, to come over and see you all in the spring of 1902, and to take back twenty men with me. They will have to keep away from the drink, and God will bless them as He has me."

A like story could be repeated of nearly all the many homeless ones whom Medland Hall has saved by helping off to Canada. The tale of helpfulness to those who have remained in this country is equally encouraging. A poor Austrian lost his situation as a ship's steward, and was stranded in London. He was at Medland Hall for four nights, and then happily found another berth as a ship's steward, and was saved from becoming a pauper.

Alfred —— was thrown out of employment as a compositor, in consequence of the increase of labour-saving machines. Like many others, he rushed to London in hope, but soon almost reached despair. The London market was glutted. After six weeks his little savings were gone, and he was destitute. He was kept from begging, borrowing, or stealing, saved from the pauperism of the casual ward by some ministering angel pointing him to Medland Hall. There, instead of being made a criminal, he was helped to employment, and though it was not at his own trade, he could earn enough to meet his daily needs.

Space fails to allow us to tell of workmen who, having pawned their tools for food, and being unable to obtain work without them, have their pledges redeemed on condition that they refund the money out of their earnings, a trust which is seldom abused; of the weak and ailing tenderly cared for in the sick ward; of surgical appliances, artificial legs and arms, presented to those needing them, and of how with these new limbs many a cripple is able to earn a living for himself. Everything that a generous and thoughtful Christianity can suggest and devise seems to have been done to meet the needs of this large class of suffering humanity. The teachings of our Lord are here having their practical application. Medland Hall is seeking to save that part of the lost world which is beyond the touch of the ordinary agencies of the Church. It is saving men from despair. It is lifting them out of the pit, and rescuing them from the miry clay. A want like that ought not to need appeals oft repeated. The hearts of Christian people ought to be so moved by the work of such a Mission that funds should ever be abundant for carrying on and enlarging operations. We trust that all our readers will remember Medland Hall, and gladden the heart of Mr. Gates, Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, London.

Rev. Timothy Richard, D.D., of China.

THE prominent references recently made in the public press to the potent influence exerted in China by the subject of this week's sketch give opportuneness to the biographical particulars we are able to publish. The high tribute paid lately by The Times newspaper is as deservedly generous to the man himself as it is justly appreciative of the value of the missionary work with which he is identified. Who is the individual thus brought into this conspicuous notice as enjoying to so large an extent the esteem and confidence of some of the most exalted officials in the Chinese Empire? We note, for instance, the statement that the Emperor's brother, Prince Chun, had an interview relative to his mission of apology to the German Emperor, as did also Na Tung, a foremost leader in the Boxer movement, before proceeding on a similar mission to Japan; also that Yuan Shih Kai, the then eminent Governor of Shantung, telegraphed urging him to come and help him settle the difficulties the recent troubles had created. Information as to the past history of such a personality cannot but be read with deep interest.

Dr. Timothy Richard hails from the Principality, like his distinguished fellow-missionary, Dr. Griffith John, his native place being Ffaldybrenin, an obscure village in Carmarthenshire. He was born in 1845, and when quite a boy was baptized on a profession of his repentance towards God and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, uniting himself in fellowship with the church at Salem Caio. From his father's farm he entered, at eighteen years of age, upon the scholastic profession, and shortly afterwards became a student in the Baptist College at Haverfordwest, a ministerial training institution. It was, however, in no home pastorate that Timothy Richard was to exercise his gifts. God had other work for him to do. When his college course was nearing its close, a well-known Indian missionary, Dr. Rouse, rendered temporary tutorial assistance, the result being that the desire which had long been cherished in the young student's heart, to take the Gospel to the heathen, grew into an imperative call. Thus it came to pass that he offered his services to the Baptist Missionary Society. His offer was accepted, and in November, 1869, he sailed for China.

It is interesting and instructive, in the light of subsequent events, to recall the sentiments with which he voyaged towards the land of his adoption. Unable to hold public services on board, he felt that he must nevertheless engage in his Master's work. He writes:—

> What did we leave home for, unless we were prepared to be constantly and heartily devoted to the work of preaching the glad tidings of salvation, through evil as well as through good report? Although I found public attention to be more than some would pay to religion, yet I was not sure that they might not give heed to it in private, or that they would not by-and-by think of the one thing needful with more seriousness. So I constantly watched opportunities of speaking to my fellow-passengers, individually and privately. God granted me opportunities (and opportunities can sometimes be made) to speak to everyone who left us at Mauritius. What was the result, or what it may be, I know not.

Located for a while at the treaty port of Chefoo, the new missionary threw all his energy into the acquisition of the language. Good progress having been made in that direction, Mr. Richard eagerly addressed himself to the great object for which he had entered China, viz., to take the Gospel into the interior; and with that view he made a prospective journey with Mr. R. Lilley, of the National Bible Society of Scotland, into Manchuria. Eventually, however, he settled down in a provincial city called Tsing Chou Fu, in the province of Shantung, a place containing some 30,000 inhabitants, he being the only European resident. For some two years he devoted his time to gaining knowledge of the Chinese classics, not alone by the study of sacred books, but also by seeking out and conversing with leaders of religious sects. During this formative period, he became more and more convinced of the importance of endeavouring to influence the official classes in favour of Christianity, and the foundation was then laid for the splendid services he was destined thereafter to render.

Mr. Richard's plans were, however, for the time being, checked by the outbreak of the terrible famine in Shansi, imperatively demanding his most energetic efforts on behalf of the starving and perishing people. It is estimated that no fewer than 20,000,000 of the people fell victims to its ravages. Mr. Richard was foremost in organizing relief. How diligently and unsparingly he devoted himself to his trying task, may be seen by reference to Government documents. Writing to Lord Salisbury, the British Consul said:—

> Li Timotai (the name given by the Chinese) is known far and wide among all classes of natives, standing out so conspicuously that he must be regarded as the chief of the distributors. By his great tact and power of organization, he has been a powerful agent in bringing the relief through to a successful termination.

REV. TIMOTHY RICHARD.

Having, by these philanthropic labours, ingratiated himself in the favour of the Shansi people, Mr. Richard resolved to settle down in their midst. This he did in the capital of the Province, Tai Yuen Fu, the city which has gained such terrible notoriety as the scene of the recent massacres. On resuming his literary pursuits, he was thrown into close contact with the students and officials abounding in this populous centre. About this time he entered into matrimonial relations with Miss Mary Martin, who was one of three ladies (known as "the three Marys") who went out to China under the auspices of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland; and never did a missionary find a more like-minded and devoted helpmeet.

In 1881, impressed with the urgent need for reinforcements, Mr. Richard, with his fellow-missionaries, two in number, drew up an appeal, which was largely circulated in this country, and in order to show "the spirit of the man," we cannot do better than quote a few extracts. It began:—

> Brother, we have an appeal to make to you. We are missionaries in China, and we wish to speak with you about the work we are engaged in. We want you to know and feel that scores of millions of people in this empire are living in utter ignorance of the truth, and of the promise and hope of eternal life.

After describing the moral and spiritual condition of the Chinese, the appeal continued:—

> Brother, will you not pity these weary, heavy-laden wanderers? Will you desert those whom Christ loves, or not pity those whom He compassionates? Is there no remedy, or no way to apply it? Yes, there is one, and only one—it is the Revelation which God has given for the healing of mankind; it is the religion which has come down from heaven to be the charm and balm of man's life on earth. Such is the work to which Christ has sent us—to open their blind eyes and to lead and turn them from darkness to light. Brother, have you no desire to join in that work, to put your own hand to an undertaking of such eternal dignity and glory? O brother, open your eyes to the glorious vision which will be before you if you devote yourself to work in China. Imagine these heathen all aglow with the love of God in Christ Jesus. Imagine them establishing places of worship in their villages and towns, singing the praises of their Redeemer until all around are captivated with the glad tidings of salvation.

These quotations are but a sample of the entreaties with which this enthusiastic missionary sought to bring home to his brethren in England the urgent needs of the heathenism in the midst of which he daily lived; but they suffice to show how tender was his compassion, and how strong his faith in the all-sufficiency of the Gospel.

As foreshadowing the important position Mr. Richard was destined to occupy, it may be mentioned that whilst in Tientsin he was asked to edit the Chinese Times, the only newspaper in the vernacular circulating in Northern China, an opportunity of which he was not slow to avail himself, in order that he might present civil and national questions in their relation to Christianity. And such was the effect of his editorship that many of the articles which appeared, mostly from his own pen, were reprinted in the Chinese papers in Southern and Central China; and one of the Viceroys, not the least distinguished, wired a special telegram instructing the editor to send him a copy of the paper regularly.

The immediate cause of Mr. Richard's accession to his present post as Secretary of the Society for the Diffusion of Christian and General Knowledge amongst the Chinese, in which he is to-day wielding such vast influence, was the publication in the Chinese Recorder of an article he wrote bearing the title, "How One Man May Preach to a Million." The article caught the eye of Dr. Murdoch, the Secretary of the Christian Literature Society of India, and a vacancy in a similar office having occurred in China through the death of Dr. Williamson, Dr. Murdoch at once took steps with a view to Mr. Richard's appointment. The committee of the Baptist Missionary Society, realizing the power for good appertaining to such a post, and believing in Mr. Richard's pre-eminent fitness for it, agreed to loan their missionary to the Literature Society for three years, and in the year 1891 he removed to Shanghai, and entered upon his secretarial duties, the well-known missionary, Dr. Muirhead (L.M.S.), approving the arrangement in the following commendatory terms: "We are well assured that Mr. Richard will in this post be a vast blessing to China. His work will doubtless be effectual for the highest and holiest principles." At the termination of the proposed temporary period, the Baptist Missionary Society gave further consent to the allocation of their agent to the special work for which he had practically proved himself to be so admirably qualified.

In translation work, the secretary has received invaluable help from those who have been associated with him, and whose manuscripts he has been enabled to publish. It is impossible to convey any adequate idea in this brief sketch of the numerous publications this Society has issued. The translation by Mr. Richard of Mackenzie's "History of Christian Civilization in the Nineteenth Century," in eight volumes, is one of the most important. During the year before last it was stated that 18,000,000 pages were issued, and no less than 185,960 copies of publications. In reporting these figures, Mr. Richard wrote:—

These are remarkable signs which ought to make the pulse of every lover of China beat faster. Let us rejoice that the seeds we sow are not dead dogmas, but living seeds with the omnipotence of new life in them.

Mr. Richard's aim, as already intimated, has been, and still is, to diffuse a knowledge of Christianity amongst the official and educated classes. The most distinguished of these literati are known as the Hanlins, from whom are chosen the highest functionaries in the state. With many of these men he was in the closest fellowship, and probably owing largely to his influence they became strong advocates of reform. Great was his sorrow when, at the instance of the Empress Dowager some three years ago, these reformers were degraded, some of them being imprisoned and even executed, but there was no failing of confidence. He wrote:—

The day cannot be far distant when we shall see a fresh band of devoted reformers rising up in China, as it were from the grave of the martyred heroes, and going forth like the angels of God to carry the everlasting Gospel to the utmost corners of the vast Chinese empire.

And even still less is he daunted by the awful tragedies of more recent date. Believing that the dawn of a new China is at hand, with more courage and more vigour than ever, he feels he must continue his great work of Christian enlightenment.

No wonder that for such a man, engaged in such a work, generous help is extended, not only by those in this country who have watched his course, but as well by Chinese friends who are intensely anxious for the well-being of their native land.

A significant proof of the extent to which Dr. Richard enjoys the confidence of Chinese officials has been just furnished in connection with the proposed university to be established at Tai Yuen Fu, he having been asked to administer the fund of 500,000 taels set apart by the Government for that purpose, and to undertake the superintendence of the institution for a period of ten years.

Quite recently Mr. Richard has had conferred upon him by an American University the degrees of Doctor of Divinity and Doctor of Literature. Will our readers pray for God's blessing ever to rest upon this his servant? The English secretary of the Christian Literature Society is Rev. Wm. Fisher, 146, Queen Victoria Street, London.

India's Present Need.—I.

CAUSES and remedies of the ills of India in Transition are topics much discussed in the present day. There are leading native editors and others who, from false patriotism and race-feeling, or from ignorance of India's political economy, accuse the British Government of draining the country of its wealth, and of being the immediate and chief cause of its alleged growing poverty.

Dr. John Murdoch, in a memorandum prepared for Lord Curzon, and entitled, "India's Needs: The Duties Both of Government and People," proves such charges to be without foundation. One of the palpable causes of India's needs is the increasing pressure of population, and the consequent limitation of food supply. The Hindu religion teaches, through Mano, that the Self-Existent One called a son a "putra," because he delivers from put (that is, hell) every man who has a son to perform the funeral rites on his death. The masses, therefore, marry and multiply like rabbits, as someone has said, regardless of the means of livelihood.

Eighty per cent. of the whole population depend upon the soil for their subsistence. There are districts with 800 people to the square mile, whereas in France—e.g., the average is 180. In former times, the people, taught by priests that famine, plague, cholera were the consequences of sins committed in a previous life, placidly submitted to their fate. Since Christian charity and philanthropy have stepped in, millions of lives have been saved from death, but not from the danger of future famines. Every years there are two millions more mouths to be fed. A great bulk of the population consists of labourers without land property, and the tenants or ryots are for the most part at the mercy of cruel money-lenders.

PRACTICAL REMEDIES.

The remedies as proposed by Dr. Murdoch are:—Improvement of agriculture, which would effect a gradual increase of the produce from thirteen bushels per acre to thirty; the establishment of agricultural banks by the Government, by means of which working capital could be supplied at 6¼ per cent. instead of 37½ per cent.; development of manufactures, irrigation works, relief of congested districts by emigration into less populated ones, educational reform, &c. Great stress is laid upon the last proposal. So far, education has produced an undue craving for positions under Government. He says:—

The country is being filled with imperfectly educated young men, who think it beneath their dignity to engage in industrial employments. Unless a change takes place, men of this class will become an intolerable burden upon their relatives, while they lead miserable lives themselves.

Missionaries have to a certain extent to cope with the same difficulty. Converts, only fit for manual labour, are sometimes ambitious of becoming preachers, and it is not always easy to persuade them that they can render better service to Christianity by living consistent lives in a secular calling.

The last census showed that there were 20,000 college students in India, and that the secondary and primary Government schools were attended by four millions of pupils. While the quality of teaching, according to some authorities, makes gradual improvement, the numbers under instruction are constantly increasing. Dr. Murdoch, supported by other men of weight, advocates a greater adaptation of school-books to India's needs, which are, in some instances, very different from those of Great Britain:—

An Indian student may pass through the entire course in some schools, and never read a word about female education—the crying need of India. Self-help, the dignity of labour, the encouragement of thrift, instead of the inveterate tendency to run into debt, are subjects requiring special attention in India. Political Economy is taught by English text-books, not dealing with Indian problems. Its aimless, general character robs education of half its value.

In a pamphlet on "Plague," the same writer urges the necessity of teaching hygiene in the primary departments and onward. The sorest point in the present system is the complete absense of direct moral teaching. According to Dr. Martin, late Director of Public Instruction in Bengal, the policy of religious neutrality has been carried too far, and the system of Godless training has been more destructive than constructive in its effect. How could it be otherwise? Where scepticism and irreverence take the place of ignorance and superstition, Christ's parable of the unclean spirit returning with seven others to the empty house, receives practical illustration (Luke xi. 24-26).

The Hindu, unvarnished by the Materialism of the West, is a religious being. He is, indeed, the bondman, the first links of whose chains were forged in remote ages by crafty men; but miserable as his life is among the shadows of demons, he may as well continue to hug his fetters as exchange them for the false freedom of cynicism and atheism.

While, therefore, strongly advocating agricultural, technical and commercial education as means towards solving the huge problem of India's future, Dr. Murdoch lays most stress upon the necessity of moral instruction:—

According to the principle of neutrality, the distinctive doctrines of Christianity cannot be taught in Government schools; but apart from them, religious instruction of great value may be given. A Godless education is fitted to create a Frankenstein, which would be the bitterest enemy of the English Government, employing its powers against the author of its existence.

> You taught me language; and my profit on't
> Is, I know how to curse; the red plague rid you
> For learning me your language.

We are distressed to learn that there is great fear of famine recurring this year. Indeed, already there is scarcity in various places, amounting to famine in some localities. In addition to the failure of the rains, there have been locusts in some parts, and the rats have so increased in Gujerat, Rajputana, and in parts of the Punjab and the N.W. Provinces, as to be a very serious scourge. Farmers refrain from sowing because their last sowing was eaten up by these pestilent creatures before it germinated.

Besides this, many thousands of children, whose lives were saved in the famines, have to be supported until able to maintain themselves. We cannot speak too highly of the devotedness and ability made manifest in the missionaries during those terrible experiences. But unless all that has been done is to have no permanent result, the stream of beneficent and liberal giving must continue to flow freely.

WILMA MORGAN.

Tour by Rev. R. A. Torrey.

FOR the current year, Rev. R. A. TORREY (superintendent of the Bible Institute), has left his duties at Chicago in other hands in order to undertake an evangelistic tour round the world, on which he is accompanied by Mrs. Torrey. Leaving San Francisco in the closing days of 1901, they expect to begin work in Japan about the middle of the present month, believing that God will open doors for their testimony during this time of refreshing in that land. They plan to leave Japan for China about the middle of February and to spend a month there also, visiting several up-country stations. On March 16, they hope to sail for Australia.

The tour was primarily at the request of the Evangelization Society of Australasia, and three or more months will be reserved for these British Colonies. It is expected that Mr. Torrey will hold Bible Lectures of three or four weeks' duration at several of the large centres of Australia, giving instruction in Bible doctrine and practical Christian work, on the same lines as at the Moody Institute.

September will, God willing, be spent in India; November, travelling towards Europe and the Holy Land; in December friends in London and other parts of Great Britain may hope to greet the travellers, while it is their desire to be back in Chicago by January 1, 1903.

Our readers are asked to bear Mr. and Mrs. Torrey up in prayer, that they may be guided in all their plans, and that the presence of the Lord may go before them.

From Dr. Harry Guinness.

AFTER a period of rest in Tasmania, I found myself able for a little work, and went over to the Geelong Convention. I had an opportunity of speaking several times, and at the request of the ministers of the city lingered for a mission at the close, which was remarkably blessed. On one of the Saturday nights a number of ministers came into the open air for a united meeting, and we had hundreds of helpers, with whom we walked down the main streets of the city. The crowds who accompanied us, and made room for us to pass, rather reminded us of the similar crowds that welcomed home the soldiers who had been fighting in South Africa. We had a tremendous demonstration in the Market Place; several of the ministers spoke splendidly, and persons who had not entered the house of God for many years were brought to Christ.

AMONG THE KANAKAS.

On leaving Geelong, I accepted an invitation to go right up to Bundaberg, in Queensland (a journey there and back of some 3,000 miles), where I saw the work among the Kanakas. These South Sea Islanders, who are brought to Queensland for the purpose of labour on the sugar plantations, are many of them reached during their period of engagement by the efforts of the Queensland Kanaka Mission. I had the privilege of seeing thirty-five of them baptized in the river at Bundaberg. I shall never forget the sight; these dear men, till so recently utter savages, and some of them cannibals, walking down into the flowing stream with folded hands, and there receiving from Mr. Frikie, their missionary, the new name they had chosen, and then being baptized into the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; then with hands still clasped, walking out of those waters, lost as far as the great crowd was concerned, which surged around them on every side, and conscious apparently only of the Saviour whose name they had confessed.

AT BRISBANE AND SYDNEY.

Returning from Bundaberg, I stopped three nights in Brisbane, when services were arranged —one for men only in the great Centenary Hall, which was crowded—and two on the following day for mixed audiences. At night the largest church in the town was crammed to excess when I was speaking about the Congo, and the friends gave substantial help towards sending out the steamer. I did not delay in passing through Sydney on my return journey, but had previously lingered there for one week to help our old student, Pastor Rose, who has a Baptist Church in the city. On my return journey arrangements were made for me to take part in a great consentaneous movement about to be inaugurated there. Forty-eight missions are to be held in and around the city.

THE CONGO STEAMER, "LIVINGSTONE."

Leaving Sydney, I travelled to Adelaide for the fortnight's mission which had been arranged in the Y.M.C.A. Hall and in the Town Hall. The latter building was crowded at the great men's meeting, and the Theatre Royal on both Sunday evenings could not contain the people who wished to come. The meetings at the Y.M.C.A. were not so numerous; but I trust good work was done. The friends became particularly interested in the enterprise of sending out the Livingstone, and I am thankful to say that the prayers of years were answered in the Lord's own wonderful fashion, by moving the hearts of two friends who certainly, apart from my sickness, would never have been likely to help. One of these promised me £1,000, and the other dear old gentleman, only now coming into saving contact with Christ, told me that whatever was lacking towards the £3,000 after my Melbourne and Sydney visits, he would gladly make up. I was thus able to wire to Tasmania and to the friends at home, "Whole amount needed for transport and reconstruction of boat given and promised. Hallelujah." I can just imagine the astonished joy at this almost unexpectedly rapid answer to prayer. I was definitely looking for this sum to come in by Christmas, but our gracious God gave us the promise of it before the close of October. My health, meanwhile, has been wonderfully maintained. I came on to Melbourne feeling better than at any other time I had been in the Colonies.

MISSION AT MELBOURNE.

Here the work has been most interestingly arranged in connection with the Baptist Church in Collins Street. Hundreds of people were turned away on the Sunday evening from the magnificent old Theatre Royal, which I well remember preaching in on my previous visit to the Colonies. We also had a good gathering of men at the Town Hall. Some remarkable cases of conversion took place, one especially of a man who came 130 miles to the races, but instead of even going to the course he found the Saviour on the previous night in this gathering, and went away rejoicing in Jesus Christ. At the close of this mission I go on to Sydney, where I shall be for about eight days in the consentaneous movement, and then return to Tasmania.

It has been a great joy to me to hear that during the closing three weeks of September, £3,000 came to hand at Harley House in answer to earnest prayer and endeavour, and that thus one of the most difficult sessions ever known has been closed with a clear balance sheet.

A MISSIONARY INVESTIGATOR.

A remarkable man, Mr. Geil, is just now in the Colonies; he is deputed by a number of wealthy American gentlemen to spend four years in visiting the missionary world, and forming his own independent opinion concerning the value, not alone of the work, but of the apparently malevolent criticisms that have been frequently raised. He has been six months in the South Seas, and has already managed to expose the source and worthlessness of a great number of such criticisms. He is a fine fellow, and is just leaving in a few days for New Guinea, Borneo, and Formosa. He will travel through China, and visit practically the whole missionary world, with the exception of South America. He is hoping to cross Africa, entering at Mombasa, investigating the work at Uganda, crossing Stanley's forest, and visiting the Congo. Is it not a matter of intense gratitude that such a journey should be taken for such purposes? This gentleman will become the greatest missionary observer in the world, and, as far as I can judge, he is likely to help on missions immensely.

H. GRATTAN GUINNESS.

Among the Japanese Islands.

ONE of the most interesting branches of the work of the American Baptist Missionary Union is that carried on, under difficult conditions, among the inhabitants of the numerous islands in the inland sea of Japan. The superintendent of this effort—Captain LUKE M. BICKEL—assures us that Christians in Britain and America cannot understand how completely residents in Japan away from the principal ports are still shut off from the rest of the world. Writing recently, when convalescent after a serious illness, he says:—

"I shall be very grateful to see my ship and islands, and hills and narrow channels again, despite all the difficulties that have to be met. The appalling need of the people gives one courage under the assurance of Divine guidance, but in spite of all that can be done one seems almost helpless in view of the vastness of the undertaking.

"If I had not strong faith in God's ability to use poor instruments with which to do acceptable work, I should get out of it to-morrow. For a man with no theological training to be thrown into the midst of a field of labour larger than that of any other missionary in Japan, vastly more difficult of access, with the navigation of his own vessel, with exceptional dangers and difficulties added to his lot, makes him get down on his knees. There is some talk of sending out a steamer, which would help greatly."

Revival in the Far South.

[FROM A CORRESPONDENT.]

TWO years ago a number of Christians banded together to pray for blessing on Queensland. The need was pressing. The land was given over to indifference and pleasure-seeking; no widespread revival had ever swept over the colony. God answered prayer by sending out workers. From Scotland, England, and America, a band of evangelists were gathered, meeting in Queensland in May last. In a wonderful way God bound the workers together, opened doors among the churches, gave favour with the people, and followed with blessing the preaching of the Gospel. For quite four months the work went on in the city of Brisbane, and a daily gathering of Christians was held for prayer. Special services were conducted in almost every part of the city, in some cases continued for a month. One minister wrote, "I do not think that there is a home in connection with the congregation that has not been blessed."

It was quite impossible for the evangelists to fill all the openings that offered. Calls came from every part of the land for services. The evangelists scattered through the country districts for hundreds of miles, finding the heartiest reception from ministers and people, and reaping in many places an abundant harvest. Some country villages were stirred in the most marvellous manner. People came driving twenty miles to the services. Farmers left their harvest uncut. From 10.30 a.m. to 10 p.m. on Sundays the congregation remained.

The work still goes on. Four of the preachers have arranged to stay permanently in Queensland—Messrs. Sloan, King and Tulloch from Scotland, and Mr. Sweet from England. Rev. James Lyall left for New Zealand. Rev. D. C. Davidson had arranged to visit Tasmania, but has been unable to leave on account of the calls to remain. One Christian worker had travelled 160 miles to see him with the hope of inducing him to visit his town. Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Stewart have returned to Scotland with commissions from the churches to send out suitable missionaries to continue the work.

The hope of the workers is that this movement will spread over the whole of Queensland and throughout the Commonwealth of Australia. The importance of a deep spiritual movement in a young country, where the foundations of a nation are being laid, and where the people are impressionable, is incalculable. To a great extent the future of those rich lands depends upon what is done now. Almost every farmer in this land has some friend in the Australian Colonies. For the sake of absent ones who may be drifting into carelessness and open sin, the prayers of God's people are asked for blessing on the efforts.

Lebanon Hospital for the Insane.

WE have often drawn attention to this institution, which is doing so much good in Palestine and Syria. All who have witnessed it bear witness to its usefulness. The natives themselves have practically repudiated the superstitions of generations, and are now sending their mentally afflicted friends to the Hospital instead of to the places of torture instituted by the priests.

As a proof of the appreciation of such an institution, relatives of patients have paid about £150 during the past three months towards the maintenance of patients. Just lately, the whole city of Beyrout has been moved by the cure (miraculous they call it) of a young man who had been unable to speak, move, or eat, for six months. He was a cataleptic, and by careful treatment has been fully restored.

A great need has lately been met by a lady friend, who has promised to erect a new building for patients suffering from mental excitement. The additional building will involve an increase of expenditure; so the committee are appealing for additional contributions.

About Nicknames.

I WONDER how many of my young readers have a nickname. I expect if I were to ask each of you who has one to send me a postcard telling me what it was, the postman would wish I had let the matter alone, so many would he have to deliver. And what a long list there would be, beginning, no doubt, with every letter of the alphabet many times over.

A nickname is generally a pretty correct description of something about you—some habit you have acquired, or something you have said or done; and when you get older, and go from one school to another, or leave school altogether, you will forget the real names of many of your old schoolfellows, but you will remember them by their nicknames perhaps for years.

Now there is, as you know, a very great variety of nicknames, so that in the largest school in England I do not suppose any two boys have the same one. And yet there is one that applies to us all. At least, it is not exactly a nickname, but it is that which causes us to have one. It is a very long word, INDIVIDUALITY. I am afraid many of you will not know at first what it means. I am not sure that I knew myself how best to describe it to you until I looked it up in the dictionary, and this is what I found: "That quality which distinguishes one person from another."

Now each of us has something about us by which our friends can distinguish us from other children. I used to wonder how mothers could tell one baby from another, because to me they all looked so much alike. I once told a fond mother that I saw no difference between her baby and other people's, but that was the first and last time I ever ventured so foolish a remark!

As I grew older, I learned that there is always a something which marks what we call individuality in babies and children and grown-up people. It may be the colour of eyes or hair, the expression of the face—all of which enable us to say, "That is So-and-so!" Sometimes we can recognise our friends a long way off by the manner of their walk, or by the clothes they wear; and sometimes by their voice, without being able to see them at all.

But there are other things besides these which mark "individuality." We read in Prov. xx. 11, "Even a child is known by his doings." Now that is a very important test, and such a true one that we must be very careful what we do, and how we do it.

You remember that when Robinson Crusoe was on the desert island, he saw a footprint in the sand, by which he knew that a man had been there. I have sometimes heard a mother exclaim on entering an untidy room, strewn with toys, or when she found marks of fingers in the jam-pot, "Those children have been here!" and soon afterwards they wished they had not! Besides our features, our voice, or our clothes, we may be known by our habits, our actions, our "doings." Now, none of you would like to be known by such descriptions as "the ugly girl," or "the boy with holes in his knickers." You would rather be called nice looking, or well dressed; and it is much more desirable still to be described by good actions instead of by bad ones. "The dishonest boy," "the bad-tempered girl," are nicknames that we should be careful to avoid, and all others of the same kind.

Boys and girls are remembered by their characters—whether they were kind and good, or untruthful, greedy, or mean.

It does not matter so much what you look like outwardly, as what you are within. You may be strong and handsome, but if you are overbearing and unkind, that is what you will be most clearly remembered by.

Or you may be delicate, or ugly, or even deformed in body, and yet be as "lovely and pleasant" in your life as Jonathan was to David. Even if circumstances compel you to be shabby in dress, see that you are not shabby in heart; "be clothed with humility" (1 Pet. v. 5). And if you cannot afford to buy trinkets and other pretty things, and have to wear a leather watch-guard because you cannot buy a silver one, be careful to have the "ornament of a meek and quiet spirit which is, in the sight of God, of great price" (1 Pet. iii. 14); and a love for kindness, truth, and honour, which will cause you to be remembered lovingly and gratefully by those who have known you.

Let these be marks of your "individuality," and may you live long in the memories of schoolfellows, parents, brothers, sisters, and friends as "true-hearted, whole-hearted, faithful and loyal"—and, above all, grow up like Jesus, "in favour with God" as well as with men.

THE LAME MAN HEALED (Acts iii. 1-26).

GOLDEN TEXT: Ex. xv. 2.

TIME.

FOR some days at least, after the events recorded on the day of Pentecost, the Apostles were left unmolested by the authorities (Acts ii. 43). Among "the many wonders," only one has been specially described, and that possibly because it led to the first collision with the rulers, by means of the hold it took on the people, and the effectual sermon Peter preached on that occasion.

PLACE.

The Gate Beautiful of the Temple (Herod's) at Jerusalem. Generally supposed to have been the inner gate, made of Corinthian bronze, leading from the Court of the Gentiles into the Court of the Women; called by Josephus the Corinthian Gate, which he tells us was much larger than the other gates, and "was adorned after a most costly manner, as having much richer and thicker plates of gold and silver than any other." It took twenty men to open and close it morning and evening. Solomon's Porch was a portico or colonnade which ran the entire length of the eastern side of the Temple, and overlooked the terraces, with fifteen steps, up which the worshippers had to ascend in order to reach the Temple (Acts iii. 1).

PERSONS.

The lame man lay at the gate asking alms. The two Apostles, Peter and John, fishermen and friends from boyhood, now drawn into closer sympathy with each other by mutual love to their absent Lord, coming up to the Temple with other worshippers at the hour of evening prayer.

1. What was the limit of the lame man's hope and expectation, and in how far was it met? Money wherewith to buy food, clothing, and shelter for his body which had been crippled from birth, was all he asked; but he got health and strength to earn enough for his own support, and perhaps that of others also (Eph. iii. 20).

2. Had Peter and John enriched themselves through their wealthy converts? Silver and gold, none. But they were "rich in faith" (James ii. 5). Faith in Jesus was their purchasing power. Their trust was in the living God (1 Tim. vi. 17).

3. What had Peter to give? Only a willing human hand which the Lord Jesus Christ could use when HE wanted to give health and renewed life to the poor cripple. And Peter was well assured that the gift of healing was not vested in himself, but came by way of his faith from the Prince of Life (vv. 6, 12, 13, 16).

4. How did the lame man show he was healed, and how might he have done so? He might only have stood upright, and then have been too fainthearted and mistrustful to take the first step in all his life alone; or he might have taken it with cries and groans. Instead of which he glorified the Son of God by the instant "obedience of faith," and unwavering trust "in the name of Jesus Christ"; and the Lord gave him such abundant joy that ordinary bounds were powerless to restrain (Golden text; Matt. ix. 29; Mark ix. 23).

5. What were the results of this courageous and triumphant testimony to the grace of God and the power of Jesus? (a) A large congregation, affording Peter another opportunity of preaching the Gospel to the Jews in the very porch where they had taken "up stones to cast at Jesus" (John viii. 59). (b) The healed man had an opportunity to stand up and witness for the Lord by showing what he had done for him (10, 16), "and many of them which heard the word believed." "Miracles were the bells by which God drew the people together to hear the sermon concerning Jesus."—M. Henry.

ADDITIONAL POINTS FOR SENIORS.

Peter stands up again as a faithful witnesser for Christ (12-26) ready to seize any opportunity. Holding a living text by the hand (11), he preached Christ crucified and risen with holy boldness and fearless courage. Divisions of sermon. (1) Disclaimed all power or merit on the Apostles' part. (2) Traced the miracle to its source. (3) Declared that power to heal flowed from the risen Christ. Five points—(1) Christ's Divine authority (John xiii. 3); (2) Christ's mission (Heb. x. 7) denied by men (John xix. 15); (3) Christ's innocence as regards men and righteousness before God (John xix. 4; Matt. xvii. 5); (4) By his resurrection Christ became Conqueror of Death, and Giver of Life (John x. 15; John iii. 16, 35, 36); (5) This resurrection, borne witness to by the disciples, was a proof, therefore, of Christ's Messiahship, of his Divine mission, and of his power to save. The healed and saved man stood before them whole and glad in the Lord, through the accepted work and present power of Christ—loving consideration (17) earnest pleading (19). Faith, like the couplings of a locomotive, secures the carriages, inasmuch as it links them on to the engine. Faith, too, is the gift of God. All of Grace (Eph. ii. 8). Lame man, born a cripple, and helpless, type of man's condition by nature (Ps. li. 5; Rom. iii. 10-23; Isa. liii. 5, 6).

Christian Endeavour Topic.

A CHIVALROUS CHOICE (Josh. xiv. 6-13).

ONE of the most interesting figures in the Bible is Caleb. He and Joshua were the sole survivors of the generation which had come out of Egypt, and with careful discrimination the sacred writers always draw attention to the fact. (Num. xiv. 6, 24, 30.) His characteristic was whole-heartedness. He followed the Lord fully, swerving neither to the right hand nor to the left for fear or favour of man. A glorious specimen of whole-hearted consecration. Throughout the forty years of wandering he must have suffered keenly, as he saw the companions of his youth and middle life carried one by one to the grave, but he still followed the Lord and had fellowship with Him, and already entered into the rest of God (verses 8, 9, 14). You will remember Psalm xcv. 7, &c., which is quoted in Hebrews iii. and iv., by which we are reminded that they could not enter into God's rest because of unbelief. Must we not, therefore, infer that since Caleb perfectly believed, he did enter into the rest of faith, long before he crossed the Jordan and settled with the remainder of the nation in the Land of Promise?

Let us never forget that whole-heartedness is the foundation of faith, and where there is any difficulty to believe, it is always wise to probe the heart and see whether it is not concealing some accursed thing, or holding back part of the price. It should be written in letters of light before every Christian Endeavourer that consecration and faith are but two sides of the same act, and are always in exact proportion to each other. The more absolutely you follow the Lord in every detail of your life, filling up fully the measure of possibility, you will find yourself growing in faith, to which nothing can be impossible, and by which mountains can be removed.

It was a memorable interview when the two old men stood face to face (v. 6). It was good also to hear how Caleb had treasured the Divine promise through long years. It must have seemed sometimes as though the weary wheels of time would never bring him to the realization of his hopes, but over all his despondency his heart triumphed; God must keep his word; and according to his faith it was done to him. Jehovah had kept him alive (v. 10), and, more, had kept him in vigorous health, so that he was well able to enjoy his inheritance as it now came into his hands. The years might have left him a decrepit invalid; but God does not do his work by halves with those that trust Him. If in your own life God speaks a promise to your heart, and you are sure it is not the result of your own imagining, you may cling to it.

The old warrior chose the hill country because the Anakim were there, and the cities were great and fortified. He had great faith that God was going to give him things that were beyond the reach of other men. He laughed at impossibilities. At a time of life when most men seek rest he undertook a vigorous campaign; yet probably there was nothing for him to do more that follow after the guiding hand of Jehovah, for Hebron would be specially a Divine reward for his faithful service.

Hebron means fellowship. It had some of the most ancient and sacred associations to the Israelites from its connection with Abraham. Surely there is a deep lesson here. The man who follows God fully has faith before which mountains remove, and he finds the secret of dwelling in fellowship with God. One always feels that the Epistles of St. John might have been indited by Caleb from the city of Hebron.

Notice that the life of a godly man sends benediction far down the ages. Hebron was the inheritance of Caleb's descendants (14). The spirit that God had put on him did not depart from his seed or his seed's seed.

Cardiff Christian Workers.—A movement for the purpose of bringing together Christian workers for the higher cultivation of the soul life by means of conversation on Biblical and general literature, was inaugurated last week at Cardiff. The meeting opened with a period of quiet waiting upon God, and earnest petition for the outpouring of the Spirit, followed by the reading of the Scriptures with comment, dealing with the promise of power given in Acts i. 8, and thoughts on the Holy Spirit's influence to purify, illumine, and unite the soul with God. Afterwards selections from well-known writers on the atonement, &c., were set forth and conversed on. This is a development in connection with the Christian Workers Monthly Fellowship Meetings, held at the Police Institute, under the leadership of Mr. J. Meyler.

Scottish Notes.

THE circulation of Scriptures in 1901 through the National Bible Society of Scotland included 115,862 Bibles, 156,258 Testaments, and 420,483 Portions, in all 692,603 copies, of which 152,640 were at home and 539,963 abroad. China received 184,991, India 89,216, and Japan 31,790.

The question whether something on the lines of the Boys' Brigade could not be devised for the benefit of girls has been solved by Dr. W. F. Somerville (son of the late evangelist of world-wide fame, Rev. Dr. Alexander Somerville) at Glasgow. With the co-operation of several ladies the first company has been formed of the Girls' Guildry, in connection with Hillhead U.F. Church. The honorary secretary is Miss Annie T. Fullarton, 23, Glasgow Street, Glasgow, W., from whom particulars of the new movement may be obtained.

Nearly three hundred men of all professions and trades (from schoolmaster to labourer) have been dealt with since the inception of the Scottish Labour Colony four years ago, one hundred having passed through during 1901. The directors have purchased the farm, but with a burden of over £3,000, while the general annual expenses amount to £600 or upwards, according to the number of inmates. Many applicants are awaiting for admission, if only means allowed. Meanwhile readers are asked to pray for increased blessing in this difficult but interesting work. All information may be had from the superintendent, the Colony, Ruthwell, N.B.

Irish Notes.

THE famine has thrown about 1,500 orphans on the hands of the missionaries of the Irish Presbyterian Church in India. Of these, nearly 600 have been provided for, but about 1,000 are still in a destitute condition and are slowly dying of starvation. The missionaries are therefore wistfully looking to the home church for their support. It takes about £4 per annum to maintain a child in India.

Miss Letitia E. Egan, B.A., LL.B., who left Dublin about two years ago to enter upon mission work in India under Irish Presbyterian auspices, has died at her post at Ahmedabad. Miss Egan was a distinguished graduate of the Royal University, and her early death is a great loss to the mission. She was an able and devoted worker, and was a prime favourite with her fellow missionaries, as well as with the natives. She had been only about three weeks ill.

The Irish Church in Dublin has sustained a serious lost in the death of Dr. Jellett, Dean of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin. At the time of the Disendowment and Disestablishment of the Church in 1869 he did probably more than any one else to place the finances of the Church on a sound basis. He was a most exact man of business, and yet most kind hearted in all the relationships of life. He was also most earnest and devout in the service of his Master.

Rev. C. H. Yatman, the American evangelist, is at present engaged in conducting a six weeks' series of meetings in Dublin.

Welsh Notes.

THE Christian Endeavour topics have just been issued for the first time in the Welsh language. The National Council has long contemplated this step, but has deferred carrying out its intention until recently. So far the demands for the Welsh cards has been rather disappointing.

One of the best known of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodist missionaries on the Khassia Hills, India, is now home on furlough, and is doing good work on behalf of foreign mission work by his addresses, &c. Recently he addressed the Bangor Ministers' Union with much acceptance, and again he has spoken before the students of the Brecon Congregational College.

On Monday, January 6, Pendref Welsh Wesleyan Church, Denbigh, celebrated its centenary. The occasion was noteworthy as Pendref Church is the oldest in the Connexion in Wales. Amongst those taking part in the celebration were Rev. Hugh Jones, Chairman of the Welsh Synod; and J. Hughes, D.D. A deputation from the Free Churches was present, and conveyed the congratulations and good wishes of the various Nonconformists in the town.

The General Committee of the Welsh Forward Movement has sent out its annual appeal for financial assistance. The brief recapitulation of the leading facts in the history of the movement is full of cheer and encouragement. By to-day the work has prospered so greatly that there are forty evangelistic centres, with an aggregate membership of over 3,000. The attendance in the Sunday schools has reached 7,000, and the number of adherents is estimated at 17,000.

The Week of Prayer.

THE special gatherings in connection with the Week of Prayer, as arranged by the Evangelical Alliance, were continued on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of last week at Exeter Hall, Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A., Mildmay Conference Hall, and a number of other centres in the city and suburbs of London.

EXETER HALL.

On Wednesday the chair was taken at Exeter Hall by Colonel Douglas-Jones, the topic for the day being "Nations and their Rulers." After the chairman had read Romans xiii., an address was given by Mr. W. F. A. Archibald. Referring to the present state of affairs in the world, he pointed out how easily international peace is broken through rivalries, jealousies, conceit, and pride, all making for unkindness and separation. "It is a terrible thing to think that, humanly speaking, all that separates us from a great European war is the fact that all the nations are afraid to begin; but if the peace were once broken we should probably be face to face with the most terrible conflict the world has ever seen."

Turning to his personal experience in foreign lands, Mr. Archibald testified to the joy with which he found that throughout the Roman Catholic land of Mexico there is a real and great desire for true liberty of worship; and to the pleasure with which he had joined with Americans and others in the unity of the Spirit. At another time, when in Holland, he had found himself in a gathering of Dutch and English fishermen in the Zuyder Zee, where the same earnest spirit of evangelical unity was manifest.

At Thursday's meeting, the chairman (Mr. James E. Mathieson) read Col. iii. 1—iv. 1, and introduced as the speaker Rev. Trevor Fielder. Intercession and thanksgiving was specially directed to the rising generation—"Families, colleges, schools." The educational problem is in every one's mind, and it ought to be our constant prayer that the young men and women, the boys and girls of our land should be brought into direct contact with the Son of God. Christ bids us all enter his school that we may learn those lessons which go on all through life. (1) There must be entrance to this school. Moses brought us to the confines of the Promised Land, Joshua brought us across. (2) One of the first requisites of a pupil is attention. We may be busy in the Lord's work, and yet not be waiting quietly upon Him. (3) We need the cheerful prompt obedience which can come only from love. (4) We need discipline and chastisement. (5) The result of all this will be progress. (6) Then will follow the evangelization of the world.

Colonel Douglas-Jones again took the chair on Friday, and read Matt. xxviii. 18-20 and Acts i. 8, the topic for the day being "Non-Christian Races," there was much prayer for foreign missions, special mention made of the position of affairs in the Soudan. An address was given by Major Liebenrood.

ALDERSGATE STREET Y.M.C.A.

The speaker at the noon meeting on Wednesday week at Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A. was Rev. John Wilson, of Woolwich, who founded a stimulating address on Deuteronomy viii. Reminding his hearers of blessings enjoyed in the year that has gone, Mr. Wilson said that faith has surely received the confirmation of experience—"Ye lacked nothing." Doubtless those who have been tempted to use the words of Jacob, "Few and evil have the days of the years of my life been," have yet gone on to speak of "God, which fed me all my life long . . . the Angel which redeemed me from all evil."

Experience, too, has taught dependence. The lesson was learned by the children of Israel that "man doth not live by bread alone." The book of Deuteronomy makes but little of the wilderness life, but much of the providential care of the Almighty. We come to realize that it is as a father chasteneth his son that the Lord chastens his people. There may come hunger and weariness, but in all we learn more and more of the love of God. The night with its dews has a ministry as definite as that of the noonday sunshine. We learn obedience in order that we may glorify God, and be of service to our fellows; "therefore shalt thou keep the commandments of the Lord thy God." Concluding, Mr. Wilson encouraged his hearers in the thought that having been led so far in the journey of life, God would lead them on to a glorious future. "The Lord thy God bringeth thee into a good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths."

Rev. T. C. Udall was the speaker on the following day. He dwelt helpfully on the lessons of Psalm xxiii., and particularly on the Divine provision made for both spiritual and bodily needs. The concluding address on Friday last was given by Rev. G. C. Fooks, who spoke with earnestness on Matt. ix. 36-39, and in considering the spiritual destitution of the non-Christian races of the world, urged his hearers to obey the Divine command, "Pray ye."

MILDMAY CONFERENCE HALL.

The special opportunity for united waiting upon God was, as usual, taken advantage of at Mildmay Conference Hall by holding two meetings each day. The following representatives of many different churches took part in the gatherings, and the addresses from beginning to end were of a highly spiritual order:—Rev. J. Wilkinson, Colonel Morton, Rev. G. Soltau, Rev. P. Carmichael, Mr. E. Trotter, Rev. James Mursell, Rev. H. J. Lancaster, Mr. W. H. Seagram, Rev. James Smith, Mr. A. Furse, Dr. J. L. Maxwell, Mr. H. C. Nisbet, Mr. George E. Morgan, Mr. W. B. Sloan, Dr. William Gauld, Mr. E. Glenny, Mr. J. E. Mathieson, Rev. T. George, and Pastor W. Fuller Gooch.

There was much liberty in prayer at most of the meetings, and the week will doubtless be remembered as an exceptionally happy time.

The attendances were good, the only regret being that congregations seem hardly anywhere to rise to the great importance and privilege of responding fully to the invitations of the Evangelical Alliance.

STRATFORD.

During recent years difficulty has stood in the way of evangelical co-operation in the Week of Prayer at Stratford E.; but it is a joy to find that, as the result of praiseworthy endeavours on the part of one or two large-hearted workers, a cordial understanding been Churchmen and Nonconformists was brought about before the recent meetings. Neutral ground being desirable, the gatherings were held at the Conference Hall, West Ham Lane; they were well attended, and those who have a right to be heard declare them to have been, generally speaking, more hearty and helpful than have been known for some years.

The addresses were given by Rev. H. E. Selwyn, of St. Matthew's; Rev. Alex. Jeffrey, of Trinity Presbyterian; Rev. R. Nicholson, of St. John's; Rev. H. J. Howell, of the Grove Congregational; and Rev. Hamilton Watts, of the New Town Tabernacle (Baptist); whilst the chairmen have been Rev. Robert Morton (Wesleyan), Rev. Canon Pelly, Mr. C. Boardman, Mr. W. Medcalf, and Rev. W. H. Hewett, of St. Paul's.

Mr. C. Boardman, J.P., and Rev, Alex. Jeffrey acted as the secretaries, as in former years.

Protestant Alliance.—Having been informed by Lord Salisbury that the Government does not propose to take any steps in the matter of dealing with the illegal settlement of Jesuits in this country, the Protestant Alliance has replied, respectfully reminding his lordship that the presence of members of the Jesuit order in any kingdom or state has been so detrimental to the public interest, that they have been again and again expelled from Roman Catholic countries; and that the most prominent of the principles and teachings of the "Society of Jesus" were and are (1) The end justifies the means; (2) Probabilism; (3) Directing the intention; (4) Equivocation and lying; (5) Murder; and (6) Regicide. We understand that the Alliance has definitely decided to proceed with the effort for the expulsion of the Jesuits under the existing law.

Mildmay Mission to Jews.

ANNUAL MEETINGS.

THE annual meetings of the Mildmay Mission to the Jews were held at the Conference Hall, Mildmay, on Saturday last, the closing day of the Week of Prayer. Addresses were given by Mr. James E. Mathieson and Rev. T. George; while the children from the Home for Jewish Children sang and recited a portion of Scripture, a feature of the meeting much appreciated by the audience.

Rev. J. Wilkinson made a statement about the work, and gave some statistics, showing that during 1901 £8,041 was received in voluntary contributions, £100 less than in 1900. There had been some sharp trials when almost the last shilling was spent, but the Lord had provided the funds to meet the need. There were about 60,000 attendances at the Central Hall, at Medical Mission, Gospel meetings, and various classes. At the Medical Mission, 5,411 individuals were treated, and the total number of attendances and visits to patients in their homes was 25,112. The number of Bibles, New Testaments, and portions of Scripture distributed during 1901 was 36,452, making a total since the beginning of the New Testament movement in 1886 of 1,127,786. Mr. Wilkinson referred to the Zionist movement, and asked for prayer for Dr. Herzl, that the truths of the Gospel, which are familiar to his mind, might be brought home to his heart.

There was a good attendance again in the evening, when Colonel Morton presided, and read Isaiah lxi. Pastor Fuller Gooch said that the only way to understand the Jewish question was through prayerful study of the Scriptures. Nothing else could bring us into line with God's purposes, and to the understanding of our own responsibilities. He wished to call attention to Jer. xxxiii. The Prophet Jeremiah might be taken as a typical representative of the remnant of God's people. Here he was shut up in prison, despised, cast out for the cause of God, and a message of comfort, hope, and cheer came to him from the Lord. The land of Palestine and the people were inseparable in God's covenant purpose. And it is important to remember that the future and the land are inseparable. There is no blessing for Israel as a nation outside the land. They will go back to the land unsaved, impenitent, but in the land they will be saved, and will receive the blessing. The Zionist movement seemed to be a preparing of the land for the people. Prayer is the great link between God and Israel, and not only prayer by Israel, but prayer for Israel. It is for us to take the place of intercessors with God that Israel lost by its apostasy.

Dr. Dixon gave some account of the medical work. He said it was very different now to the early days of the Mission. Then there used to be great disturbances and much persecution for the workers, as well as for the Jewish patients. Now all is quiet, and there is very little disturbance. Then there were very few Hebrew Christians, now there are quite a number who have professed faith in Christ, and many of them are Christian workers. Two half-days a week are set apart for paying patients since the year before last. Now that there are so many free dispensaries for the poor, it was thought well to try in this way to reach a different class. They are poor Jews, too, but they are able to pay for their medicine, and they hear the Gospel just as the others do.

NEW YEAR GATHERINGS.

The annual tea and Gospel services for Jewish adults and children were held at the Central Hall, Philpot Street, E., on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, January 7 and 8. On the former evening, from 250 to 300 Hebrews, men and women, crowded the tea-tables, and a more orderly and appreciative company of guests could hardly be conceived. Yet many of their faces bore witness to the fact that they had come from different parts of the earth, and told tales of wandering, weariness, want, and woe, touching beyond expression.

The tables having been cleared, hymns were sung from Sankey's Mission Hymnal and a number of addresses in English, German, and Yiddish were eagerly listened to. Rev. John Wilkinson, the revered founder of the Mildmay Mission to the Jews, for whose fifty years of faithful and fruitful service we cannot but continually praise God, conducted the meeting, and unfolded the message of the prophet Zechariah regarding the Messiah, of whom Jehovah spoke, as "the Man that is my Fellow," or equal. Dr. Dixon, of the Medical Mission, also spoke, being followed by addresses from Revs. Elijah Samuel, H. Goodman, and Samuel Wilkinson. Mr. Ehrlich (L.C.M.) and Dr. Rocha and others engaged in prayer. Gifts of fruit and literature were distributed as the friends left.

An immensely excited crowd of little Hebrew children gathered long before the time for tea on the following evening, and on the doors being opened, they rapidly filled up all available space in the hall, so that it be. came necessary to supplement the first meal by an extra and later one in a side room. Considering the class of children present, their behaviour and appearance were most pleasing; and when, after tea, the night-school children, under the conductorship of Miss Maddicks and Mrs. Samuel, sang their hymns, and said their Scripture portions, the conduct of the rest was most exemplary. To hear these little ones sing, "When mothers of Salem," "Children of Jerusalem," and "Once in David's royal city," one seemed to be taken back to the actual sites and scenes of 2,000 years ago, and one's heart was filled with praise, and one's eyes with tears, as the prayer rose to the lips that Jerusalem might once again become a praise in the earth.

Open Air Work in Ireland.

THE following extracts from a letter, received from one of the most earnest workers of the Open-Air Mission for Ireland, shows the bright side of Gospel work; but in many places a different story has to be told.

We have had the very best meetings yet in many of the towns. B. to-day was worth all the Mission ever cost. The crowd has immense, and as orderly and attentive as any church, while the power of God was manifestly present. C. on Thursday was triumphant. A man, evidently paid for opposing us, did his utmost, but, after a whole hour, had to decamp ingloriously, because the people gave heed unto us. He served us well by drawing a bigger crowd, and a vast number remained; many hymns were sung, and five addresses given. O. in County Galway, where a year ago the opposition was so bitter and intense, is now one of the greatest trophies of the Redeemer's power. Twice lately I preached in the market place, and got such a hearing as made us to exult with joy. R. on Thursday week was worth all the persecution we ever suffered there; surely the "lion has become a lamb." Not a breath of opposition or look of hostility, but an eager, earnest hearing that challenged all our strength and sympathy.

On Sunday last Mrs. W——, who is working among soldiers, told me recently she had a girl named S—— whose conduct and life testified to a true change of heart, and who told her that her knowledge and conversion was altogether due, under God, to our preaching in the market place. At first, she suffered much from her people, on account of Christ, but her changed life has won them. N——, who was converted there in February last, has also proved by her life the reality and genuineness of the work of grace. When the priest came to remonstrate with her, he said, "I suppose this is true that I hear you have turned Protestant." "Sir," she said, "I have turned to Christ." When a woman spoke to her of the disgrace she was bringing on her people, she replied, "If you only knew the Saviour and read your Bible, as I do, you would not have the sad face you have." She goes in and out of church and Gospel meetings, no one interfering with her. What a change since the time K. W. was so persecuted for doing the same! Praise God! "His doings are marvellous in our eyes."

Funds are much required to carry on the work. Those who wish to aid may write to Captain R. Wade Thompson, J.P., Hon. Treasurer, Closkeagh Castle, Dublin.

Dr. Henry and the Jubilee Singers.

THE campaign of Rev. Dr. J. Q. A. Henry and the Fisk Jubilee Singers continues to arouse deep interest in many parts of the country, and a large number of applications for missions are being received.

For the information of friends who may contemplate arranging for a series of demonstrations it may be pointed out that the campaign is conducted with the strictest regard to financial economy. The work of general direction, and the great amount of clerical labour which is involved, are undertaken without charge.

There has been no movement with results equal to this for the past twenty-five or thirty years, if then, and if it is allowed to pass by without advantage being taken of the tremendous impetus which is being given to the cause of Christian Total Abstinence, simply for want of financial support, an untold opportunity will be lost.

THE NOTTINGHAM PLAN.

The loyal temperance people of Nottingham have felt their great need of an extended mission. The one meeting held in October under the conduct of Dr. Henry and the Jubilee Singers was so strikingly successful that they determined to have more of the same kind.

The usual difficulties of halls, organization, advertising, and general expense simply challenged their faith and endeavour. A preliminary meeting was held, and after prayer and conference, a week of meetings beginning January 24 was decided upon. To provide against the possibility of a deficit, they decided upon a guarantee fund of £150. To secure this in the easiest way, they agreed to give to every guarantor one free ticket to a reserved seat for every meeting, lecture, or special meeting, for every ten shillings guaranteed. The following form was used:—

"I guarantee the sum of £ toward the expenses of the mission in consideration of your furnishing me with a free ticket to all the meetings for every 10s. guaranteed. Please forward me — tickets."

This form was to be filled up, signed, and forwarded to the secretary. It was understood that no money would be called for unless there was a deficit, and then only such portion as was necessary to liquidate all claims of the mission. This simple method proving effective, and its success will add immensely to the comfort and confidence of the work. During the week twelve meetings will be held, including a grand reception in the Exchange and Mayor's parlours, a children's service, and various special as well as the regular meetings. The guarantors are assured reserved seats at all these gatherings, and unless the receipts from collections, reserved seats, and special occasions (where all seats will be paid for), should prove inadequate to defray all the expenses, they will have these exceptional privileges for nothing. A spirit of twentieth century enterprise has marked all the arrangements, and a time of unusual blessing is earnestly looked for. Representatives of the various denominations will preside at the meetings and co-operate in the work.

It should be understood that the meetings are distinctly religious in character, the Gospel of Christ being regarded as the true antidote to the sinfulness as well as the social ruin of the drink curse, and the promoters realise that only by the strength of Christ can a drunkard keep the pledge.

To bring the great army of total abstainers to the front it is necessary that the forces should be marshalled. Special pledge books have been prepared for the use of the executive, in the hope that it may be possible to record the names and addresses of all genuine total abstainers, whether new or old. Each book will have space for about 3,000 names. If this plan be adopted throughout the country generally, the strength of total abstinence sentiment will be gauged in a way never before accomplished; and, as a result, pressure may be brought to bear upon any Government, Liberal or Conservative, so as to impress it with the fact that abstainers are no "rope of sand," or crowd of loose, ineffective atoms.

Preliminary announcements by poster, from the pulpit, and through the press, have been made, a handsome booklet giving pen pictures of prominent people connected with the Mission and a detailed programme of all the meetings, is being issued, and arrangements are being perfected to advertize with handbills among the employees at shops and factories. Such enterprise and devotion surely cannot fail of reward. "Where there's a will, there's a way." Nottingham is giving to the towns and cities of the United Kingdom a model illustration of a Twentieth Century Christian Temperance Campaign. Let others "go and do likewise."

Dr. Henry has just concluded a short visit to Glasgow, where, on Lord's Day morning, he preached at Rev. Dr. Stalker's church. Dr. Stalker writes:—"Dr. Henry preached for me with great power and acceptance, and I was glad that my people should have an opportunity of being interested in him and his work." In the evening Dr. Henry preached for Rev. Dr. Wells at Pollokshields.

After Nottingham (Jan. 24 to 30), Dr. Henry proceeds to Dublin, where a mission is arranged to commence on Feb. 1, in the Metropolitan Hall. Other fixtures will be announced in due course.

Obituary.

MR. WILLIAM DAY.

WE deeply regret to hear of the sudden home-call of Mr. William Day, evangelist. Leaving his home at Kingston on Saturday last, to attend the meeting at the Great Assembly Hall held by the boy preacher, in whose work in London Mr. Day had taken great interest, he was subsequently found drowned in the Thames, an occurrence as inexplicable as it is distressing.

Mr. Day's evangelistic career had been somewhat remarkable. In 1878 he was accepted by the Evangelization Society, and under the auspices of that organization he laboured until 1891. In many places his hearty, homely manner commended him to the masses who came to hear the Gospel from his lips; and in the Society's records there is abundant evidence of special blessing attending his efforts at many centres, including Charrington's Great Assembly Hall, the Maundrell Hall, Salisbury, Ipswich, St. Heliers, Dublin, Newcastle-on-Tyne, &c. He had a manner peculiarly his own, and some would think him slightly erratic. Nevertheless there was at times a great spiritual power and fervour in his addresses, and one felt that according to his light he was an acceptable and useful preacher. That he was widely known through this work, and subsequently in connection with the Open Air Mission and other agencies, there can be on doubt; and his solemn home-call will awaken in many hearts feelings of gratitude for the earnest efforts of this servant of God.

During the later years of his life, Mr. Day worked independently, and found a sphere of usefulness along somewhat eccentric lines; yet there were both method and reason in his action. He realized the undoubted fact that multitudes are outside the reach of ordinary evangelistic agencies; that they do not approach within earshot of any means of grace. He therefore appealed to the eye and presented to the public gaze striking texts of Scripture, which should bear their own message to the passers by. He was a familiar figure in the streets of London, with a band upon his hat bearing in gold letters the words, "Prepare to meet thy God." At fairs and racecourses he was to be seen with a banner similarly inscribed, or even an open umbrella was utilized for the same purpose.

All this was, of course, open to criticism, which was lavished upon him abundantly, but much of which was disarmed by resultant facts. Most exceptional opportunities were given to him for conversation with individuals whose attention had been attracted by this silent, striking figure standing on the kerbstone. Not long ago a gentleman, in evening dress, on the point of entering a West End music hall, started as if he had been shot as his eye caught the words upon the hat. He begged Mr. Day to enter a cab with him, and to tell him, as they drove along, how he might be saved. Other such instances could be given, in the face of which negative criticism may well stop its mouth. Mr. Day was willing, like Paul, to be regarded as a fool for Christ's sake, and he has gone to his reward, which will be adjudged by a higher than human wisdom.

REV. DR. W. D. KILLEN, BELFAST.

Dr. W. D. Killen, who passed away last Friday, was perhaps the most venerable figure in Irish Presbyterianism. Two years ago, on completing the seventieth year of his ministerial life, he was presented with a congratulatory address, which stated that his length of service was without parallel in the history of the church. Born in Ballymena in April, 1806, his father was a prosperous business man in the town and an elder of the Presbyterian Church. In November, 1829, he became minister of the Presbyterian Church at Raphoe, and first came prominently into public notice during what was called the Derry controversy, when he was one of the champions who defended Presbyterianism against Rev. Archibald Boyd, afterwards Dean of Exeter. He was appointed in 1841 Professor of Church History in the Belfast Presbyterian College; and in 1843 he attended the famous Disruption Assembly of the Church of Scotland, when he and his fellow delegates from Ireland followed Dr. Chalmers out of the hall, afterwards taking part in the Tanfield Hall meeting, where the Free Church was inaugurated. When he was appointed president of the college at Belfast in 1868 he had to face the difficulties caused by the loss of the Crown grants, and collected large sums for the re-endowment of the professorial chairs. Dr. Killen married in 1830 Miss Anne Young, and their married life lasted for fifty-six years. He leaves three sons and a daughter.

MR. H. S. RIDINGS.

Known to many as a warm friend of South America, Mr. H. S. Ridings was led to that country in connection with his profession as a civil engineer. He established a Gospel hall at Iquique in Chili. On his return home in 1897 he devoted a good deal of time to pleading the cause of the "neglected Continent," and was successful in raising considerable sums of money in aid of various missions there. He fell asleep in Jesus unexpectedly and suddenly on January 8, after a few days of apparently slight indisposition.

Haddon Hall, Bermondsey.

Three-days' meetings for believers were held at Haddon Hall, Bermondsey New Road, S.E., January 7-9.

The meetings were not advertised very widely, as they were intended specially for the benefit of the children of God engaged in work in connection with that place. At the same time 250 or 300 came together each evening. From commencement to close, each meeting was characterized by the manifest presence of God.

A quiet and subdued spirit over the audiences betokened an earnest desire for divine teaching and blessing. The speakers were Revs. W. Hackney, M.A., of the Pastors' College, R. Wright Hay (assistant to Pastor Frank White), and W. Fuller Gooch. These brethren without any consultation were led to take subjects which exactly fitted in with one another. It was as though they had previously decided upon the succession of themes. Mr. Hackney spoke upon the new nature in the believer being "begotten of God." Mr. Wright Hay's address was upon "being filled with the Spirit," the strength and equipment of the new nature, while Mr. Fuller Gooch took as his subject the practical outcome of the indwelling Spirit—wisdom, power, patience, and usefulness. We have to thank God for such messages.

This short report is sent in order that other congregations and churches may be encouraged to institute local conferences or meetings for God's people. The deeper truths of the Word become expounded to those in our churches who can never visit the larger united conferences of Christians. The outcome of such meetings must be the quickening of believers and the furtherance of work among the unconverted

Evangelistic.

Weaver Brothers in Shildon (Durham).

THESE preachers commenced a fourteen days' mission with the Nonconformist Council of Shildon on Jan. 5. From the first they attracted large congregations. All last week the Primitive Methodist church was crowded to the doors. On Sunday last they held their meetings in the Wesleyan church, which, with a seating capacity for 1,200, proved far too limited. A men's meeting was held in the afternoon for three o'clock. Half-an-hour before that time the church was filled. At night the church was crowded; hundreds of people were turned away. The work has from the beginning been evidently in the power of the Spirit. The hearts of the workers are gladdened by the joy of harvest.

Kelso U.F. Presbytery Simultaneous Mission.

One good thing about the Simultaneous Mission is that its energies are being distributed over all parts of the country, so that agricultural districts, as well as great industrial and residential centres, are being brought within the scope and sphere of its endeavours. Congested cities, with their insanitary slums and huddled-together denizens, present problems of a spiritual kind not easily solved, and no one questions the wisdom of giving attention to the spiritual need of such quarters; but it is not so readily admitted that rural sparsely-populated districts need the same regenerative power. Yet the heart of man is everywhere the same. Adam did not live in the slums, yet Adam lapsed, and by transgression fell.

A special mission under the auspices of the Jedburgh and Kelso Presbytery is presently in progress in Yetholm, a small township seven or eight miles from Kelso. There are less than a thousand people in the parish. The population of Yetholm is about 400, and at Kirk Yetholm, which is near by, and in which a number of the border gipsies have their home, the population is somewhat less. The missioner is Mr. Hugh Laughland, of the Evangelization Society; and the special services are being held, the one week in St. James' U.F. Church, and the week following in Border View U.F. Church. There are too many sinners everywhere content with a "border view" of the Kingdom of Grace, and the evangelist is doing his best with the blessing of God to persuade men to cross the line and enter in. As the meetings proceed numbers and interest and attention are growing, and there are prayerful expectations that the tide will rise to the very close.

J. C.

The Boy Preacher.

Describing the results of the recent mission of the Boy Preacher at Shoreditch Tabernacle, Rev. W. Cuff writes: "Just over 600 persons professed conversion. I have sorted them out, and sent names and addresses to the different churches which they belonged to or attended, with a letter asking the pastors to see after them. About 200 have resolved to join our church. I am meeting them once a week to instruct them 'in the way of God more perfectly.'

"It is beyond doubt that God used Jack Cooke in the conversion of souls. We sent over 500 letters to converts, and invited them to meet us. Over 500 came. It was, indeed, a pathetic meeting to me, as I knew the streets and homes in which so many of them live. How simple, anxious and earnest they were!

"This is not all. Our whole church is quickened, and our prayer-meetings are doubled since the mission. In all my experience I have never seen anything like it. I know that the Boy Preacher dearly loves the old Gospel. God has abundantly blessed him."

The services conducted by the Boy Preacher at the Great Assembly Hall, Mile End, E., continue to attract vast audiences. On the week nights thousands of people have come together to listen to Mr. Cooke's addresses, while on the Sunday evenings throngs have been unable to gain admission.

On Sunday evening last the deepest interest was manifested by the overflowing audience, and the solemn impression made by the address was shown in the after meeting, when there were so many hearers brought to decision that the smaller hall had to be utilized as an inquiry room.

A ten days' mission has been concluded in Dittisham Parish Church, South Devon, by Rev. Walter and Mrs. Bradbury. During the mission a large funeral took place, when the rector (Hon. and Rev. G. Colborne) requested Mrs. Bradbury to address the crowd at the grave.

Mr. William Grove has conducted a mission to men at the Victoria (No. 2) Home, Whitechapel Road, E. Much encouragement was met with, for there was a manifest willingness to hear on the part of the hundreds of men who dwell at this useful institution, and deep spiritual impressions were made.

Rev. John Jameson has just concluded a fruitful mission at Drighlington, Yorks. The sense of sin, of loss, of eternal defeat, was solemnly pressed home, while the claims of Divine love upon men was urged, and the story of the Cross told in loving terms. Many "have heard the glad sound, and have liberty found, through the blood of the Lamb."

At Providence Chapel, Pirbright, near Woking, Mr. Ralph Williams, of the Evangelization Society, has just concluded an eight days' mission. There were good audiences at each service, on several occasion the chapel being quite full. The addresses were clear and earnest. Many were convicted of their sinfulness, and God's own people were built up and blessed. Mr. Williams' visit will long be remembered at Pirbright.

R. Fifield.

Continuing his evangelistic labours among the theatrical women of the provinces, Mr. William Forbes has visited Manchester in connection with the "Manchester and Salford Ladies Guild." The first gathering of the present theatrical season was held in the Association Hall, Peter Street, on January 10, when there were over a hundred of the employees present, and addresses were delivered, after tea, by Mr. W. H. Newett, secretary of the Manchester Y.M.C.A. and Rev. W. J. Jack.

An eight days' mission, conducted by Mr. and Mrs. Howard Nicholson, was held recently in the Friends' Meeting House at Middlesbrough, and was a time of much blessing and spiritual power. The opening and closing meetings were well attended, but during the week the numbers present were not so large as had been hoped for. It is believed that many were convicted of sin, and believers in the Lord Jesus built up. Not the least part of the service rendered was the helpful visitation of the homes of members and attenders.

Notes & Comments

"Our Days of Transition." Rev. F. B. Meyer speaks wise words, especially in that portion of his article on Samuel bearing this sub-heading (see p. 14). These are, indeed, days of transition, and many an anxious heart may find rest by a thoughtful perusal of Mr. Meyer's timely counsel. Let the attention of such be directed thereto.

Notes on Daily Readings. With the present issue Mr. Meyer also begins another series of Notes on the Daily Readings of Holy Scripture. As in past years, his endeavour will be, in some degree, to sound the depths of the well of Revealed Truth. To many of our readers the Word of God is "daily bread" for the soul. To such, and to others also resident in many lands, may the weekly page prove a bond of union and prayerful sympathy in the Lord's work.

Mr. and Mrs. Booth-Clibborn. Our readers will have learned with much surprise that these well-known workers have severed their connection with the Salvation Army. Mr. Booth-Clibborn has already joined the Dowie movement, and in the nature of things it is expected that a similar step will in due course be taken by his wife. Mrs. Booth-Clibborn, it will be remembered, is the eldest daughter of General Booth, to whom this event comes as a grievous blow. In company with her husband she has been used of God to do a magnificent work in various parts of the Continent, and their exceptional gifts have been unsparingly devoted to the extension of Christ's Kingdom among men. For some time past Mr. Booth-Clibborn has been led in the direction of doctrines which go beyond what the Salvation Army, and Evangelical Christians generally, understand to be the teaching of Scripture, especially in regard to direct revelation from God apart from his written Word, the promulgation of which has necessarily led to the resignation of the position so long and so honourably held.

What is Involved. We have loved and esteemed these friends so highly for their works' sake, that we cannot but deeply deplore the prospect of their Christlike spirit of charity and self-denial being laid under tribute by a man in whose malignant speech and writings the spirit of courtesy and self-abnegation is so conspicuously absent. The paramount idea, that in "Dr." Dowie is personified an Elijah who is to usher in the Millennial Dawn, as claimed by himself and accepted by his followers, is, in our judgment, one of the most preposterous assumptions of modern times. The truths of Divine Healing have been sadly discredited by his extravagant vagaries; and the immense wealth accumulated at the expense of his devotees, over which no one exercises control but himself, is by no means the least serious ground for concern. We earnestly pray and hope that our friends will soon be led to see the dangerous path they are about to tread, which, at its best, is one of distraction and division among the people of God; and, at its worst, the subverting of uninstructed and unstable souls. There is so much to be done, "while the days are going by," for the evangelization of a dying world, and in the highway of holiness, that it will be nothing short of a calamity for such unique powers of service to be devoted to bypaths and cross-cuts, such as those into which the Dowie movement leads.

The World's Attitude to Temperance. A large and enthusiastic meeting on Temperance was held in the Queen's Hall, at which some thousands of persons were present, and hundreds of others failed to obtain admission. Next day, it was dismissed in the Press with less notice than a trivial case at the police courts; and one leading journal deemed it of so little importance that it gave no report at all, but in the same issue devoted two columns to "The Art of Eating Cheese!" Here is a pretty typical illustration of the world's attitude toward temperance reform, when the ruin of our nation, and the devastation of our homes, are deemed of no account as compared with the momentous question of eating cheese!

The True Plea for Abstinence. We do not judge those who, with a conscience void of offence toward God and toward men, take alcoholic drink as bona fide medicine, so long as they do not continue its use after their ailment (real or supposed) has disappeared. But many who follow the advice given to Timothy to "take a little wine for his stomach's sake" remember the wine, but forget the little, and indulge themselves, year in and year out, until for their "stomach's sake" they had far better leave it alone! The true temperance pledge excludes only the use of drink as a beverage—that is, for mere personal enjoyment; and the principal plea we urge is that of the Apostle, to abstain from even legitimate enjoyment "for the sake of others." This is the highest ground upon which to stand. At the same time, we cannot ignore the lower and not less important plea, especially with young people, that they abstain for their own sakes, in view of the terribly alluring power of the drinking habit.

Forces for Evil. The objectionable system under which large brewery and distillery companies widen the spheres of their degrading influence has just been illustrated by the purchase by a Liverpool company, for about a quarter of a million sterling, of the property of another one, with about thirty tied houses in that city, and a number in Chester, Birkenhead, and North Wales. This, of course, implies a large increase in the political power of the company in question, to be wielded to the detriment of the State. It also involves a deepening of the responsibility of those Christian shareholders who blind their consciences to the obvious fact that, as part proprietors of the "tied houses," they are directly interested in the success of drink shops. It is noteworthy, too, that Chester, strongly affected by this deal, is another painful example of a cathedral city reeking with drink, and suffering in a marked way from the inevitable demoralizing effects of the existence of a huge number of licensed houses.

Young People and Church History. An esteemed correspondent urges the importance of teaching Reformation truth to young people. She says:—

> If the children of the middle classes are to be allowed to grow up in entire ignorance of the great truths for which their forefathers suffered and died, what is to prevent them from being allured into the Roman Catholic Church? Is there not an urgent call to our Evangelical churches to bestir themselves, and see that the important story of the Reformation is fully taught in our Sunday-schools?

As helping in the direction indicated, we have great pleasure in calling attention to the excellent work of Mr. W. Stanley Martin, whose monthly magazine, Uncle Ben's Budget, and various books on the Reformation in England and on the Continent, deserve widespread circulation (Morgan & Scott).

How to Oust Bad Literature. Christian people complain, and rightly, of the kind of literature often disseminated through local booksellers and newsvendors. Sporting and sensational papers are glaringly displayed, and healthy, religious literature is conspicuous by its absence. Do they realize that the responsibility is partly their own? If the Christian public did its duty in encouraging local trade as they should, the demand for the right kind of reading matter would create the supply. Do not the churches, and those who promote special missions and efforts in their neighbourhood, almost invariably write up to publishers and wholesale agents for their literature, admittedly "to save the bookseller's profit;" and send their printing contract to some wholesale firm, when at a trifling sacrifice of cheapness (and not always that) they could get all they want through the local tradesmen. Such persons help to demoralise young people with one hand, while they evangelise them with the other. A little thought in this direction would often show how we may help and stimulate business enterprise in right directions, and encourage dealers to aim at a higher mark, and so be an influence for good in their locality.

Mixed Marriages. In his new book on "The Relationships of Life," Rev. Silvester Horne deals with the supremely important question of marriages between believers and unbelievers. In face of the indifference to the Apostolic injunction, "Be not unequally yoked together with unbelievers," it is refreshing to read Mr. Horne's sober and searching words:—

> If you find that you are strangers to one another in the things that matter most, and only one in the things that matter least, you are not lovers, but you have mistaken a sentiment or a passion for what cannot be less than the movement of two natures into a complete and perfect accord.

The pulpit has not always been sufficiently clear upon this important question. Young Christian people need instructing upon this point, and to be shown that a mixed marrage is a fruitful cause of back-sliding.

The Meaning of the Theatre. It was only to be expected that the crusade which is being carried on against "problem plays"—in which the most serious things of life are discussed with manifest bias towards an apotheosis of weakness and sin—should meet with determined opposition from those whose interest it is to cater for the vitiated taste of the neurotic public. One dramatic critic objects to the agitation on the ground that "the theatre is not a church," and that "when people want to hear about religion they go to church." In the face of such an admission what sense is there in Christians defending the stage as a school of morals? The critic insists, further, that "a play must be sensational, or it is useless." We hold that it is obviously wrong to treat sensationally matters upon which depends men's eternal weal or woe.

Infection or Conviction. An able writer in a luminous work on "Religious Doubt," gives us a sentence which ought to prove useful to all who are called upon to deal with doubters and sceptics. He says:

> The doubter whose doubts are only the result of infection and not of conviction, may not be able to stand firm amidst the onslaughts of temptation. . . . The second-hand doubter, the man who borrows his doubts, is more helpless than the original doubter.

The contrast drawn between infection and conviction is most suggestive; and the idea involved in it is worth expanding. Our own experience of religious doubters shows that a large proportion of those who claim to doubt have borrowed their objections from others. When people do not possess very deep convictions, they are always liable to infection from the intellectual or moral atmosphere which surrounds them. The way to resist this is to seek deep convictions based upon experience; just as the way to resist hostile microbes is to cultivate perfect physical health.

The Spiritual Faculty. In seeking to account for the defection of certain men from their profession of faith in Christ, and for the hostility of others towards it, earnest people have offered various reasons, which, undoubtedly, partly explain the phenomenon. But there is one fact which, if kept in mind, better explains the thing, and that is the reality of a spiritual faculty in man, which, like every other faculty, may be healthy or unhealthy, perfect or atrophied. This fundamental fact is very often lost sight of, but where it is comprehended, it will help to clear up many mysteries. Sensual things are perceived by the senses; intellectual things by the mind; and spiritual things by the spirit. The solemn words of the Saviour need reiterating, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." Many acute reasoners have never experienced that birth, hence the spiritual realm is meaningless to them. Their dictum about spiritual things is of no more value than a blind man's opinion about colour. And many others, neglecting the culture of the spiritual faculty which they possess, fall into doubt and difficulty. Spiritual things can only be vivid to the man whose spiritual faculty is sound and cultured.

Choosing or Chosen In some interesting "Backward Looks over an Eventful Life," which appear in The Christian Commonwealth, Dr. Parker gives a forcible reply to the question whether he has ever regretted "choosing the ministry" in preference to the Bar:—

> I was borne along by irresistible influences to take part in the ministry of the Gospel. I have never had any occasion to find fault with my calling and election. I cannot say that I have done anything for Christ—that is to say, I have never laid Christ under any obligation to my poor abilities and services. I have received everything and given back very little in return. Jesus Christ has crowned me beyond all my deserts and claims, and whatever I am in the ministry of his Gospel, I am by his grace and his continual sustaining energy. Once let a man get the notion that he is doing God a great honour by denying himself the delights and the profits of business, and is making a sacrifice in order to propagate the kingdom of heaven, that man's influence is gone for ever. Christ will have no man's patronage. The Gospel invites no man to bestow upon it the delight of his smile. The Gospel confers dignity; it receives none.

The Aim of a True Preacher. Dr. Parker also gives a clear definition of what modern preaching ought to be:

> We must always remember that an audience is a noun of multitude. In every Gospel discourse there should be something for everybody—something for the old and young, the intellectual and the untrained, something for the philosopher and the ignorant and unlearned man. The Apostle Paul asks this question: If an ignorant and unlearned man should come into your audience, what have you got for him? If an unbeliever should appear in your churches, what appeal have you to make to his mind? We have to take it for granted that the unbeliever and the ignorant may stray into our congregations, and we have so to conduct our services that he will not leave the congregation under a false impression as to what we are aiming at.

Map Knowledge. In last week's Methodist Times, Rev. Mark Guy Pearse has a poem entitled "The Local Preacher," which embodies a lesson deserving of a very wide recognition. The story is of a pious but ignorant miller, who was taken to task by the squire for daring to preach the Gospel, in view of his lack of education. The miller sees a map of the squire's estate on the table, and challenges his acquaintance with it. The squire knows every house, road, and footpath on the map. A few days before, however, he had been obliged to ask the miller's little daughter a short cut to the highway, which she knew well, because she walked it every day. So the miller responded, he had a very poor knowledge of the map of life, but he knew the way that God had shown him, and that he could and would teach others. This is the charter for every true preacher—not a "map knowledge" of the faith, but practical experience of the way of life. We cannot teach others effectually what we have not practically mastered ourselves, but what we have we can teach, and that may be the very thing others want most.

International Amenities. The passage of arms between the German Chancellor and our Colonial Secretary is an incident which it is to be hoped will not be repeated. International relationships are notoriously unstable; there is no passion in the world easier to rouse or more difficult to allay than racial animosity. For this reason the code of politeness governing the relations of governments and their representatives in other countries is of the most elaborate and punctilious kind; and it is of the utmost importance that it should be honoured to the last detail. The same law should govern all references to other peoples and their rulers in public utterances. A foolish remark may lead to European complications, and in this instance has gravely imperilled the friendship of two nearly allied nations. The peace of the world is too precious to be at the mercy of politicians on either side. The good sense of Germany and Britain will survive this incident, but it affords a lesson to statesmen that they would do well to lay to heart.

Public Business. When a responsible Cabinet Minister like Mr. A. J. Balfour expresses his strong desire for a thorough reform in the manner of conducting Parliamentary business, it is clear that a change is badly needed. At present the simplest measure proposed is exposed to the risk of being strangled by red tape, or starved through long waiting. We agree with Mr. Balfour that a controversial Bill cannot be rushed through Parliament, as certain business proposals pass a board of directors; but it is imperative that steps be taken to avoid the opposite extreme, in which measures embodying great and urgent reforms have to wait an indefinite time before any notice is taken of them.

Impoverished Clergy. The voluminous correspondence going on in the columns of The Standard upon "The Poorer Clergy," is exceedingly painful reading. With very many of the clergy life seems to be a struggle for existence. According to a correspondent who writes with authority, there are nearly 1,500 beneficed clergy whose incomes do not exceed the average of £67 a year. It is admitted by all the correspondents that there is something seriously wrong when a rich body like the Anglican Church permits this widespread indigence. One writer goes near the mark when he says: "We, as a Church, have far too long lived upon the benefactions of our ancestors, and not yet learned the lesson and privilege of giving."

A Lay Sermon. The Lancet often gives excellent advice to the clergy, and has just made an appeal to preachers of all denominations to make more regular and systematic reference to the blessings of cleanliness, fresh air, and light, and that in their visitations to the poor they might also enforce these points. Much of the great mortality of children in the concentration camps has been due to the ignorance and prejudice of Boer women as to the laws of sanitation, and there is still much that our own poor have to learn in this direction. The bad ventilation and lighting-up of many of our churches, moreover, comes in for strong remarks, and a suggestion is made for a commission to investigate this difficult and important question. If such a step led to a thorough reform in church architecture, it would be a boon to many a tired congregation and wearied preacher. At present the question is in a state of chaos, and the suffering caused by overheated and draughty buildings is incalculable.

"Barrack" Schools Again. The President of the Local Government Board has received a strong protest from Lord Crewe, as Chairman of the State Children's Association, against the continuation of the system of "barrack" schools for London workhouse children. Five years ago, in view of the representations then made, of the harm caused by this mechanical and soulless system, the Government promised that the large existing schools should not be added to, and that the system should be abandoned as soon as possible. Meanwhile, £48,000 have been spent on additions, and not one has been closed, and there are large building schemes on the way. A contrast is drawn between this attitude and that of the Camberwell Guardians, who have rented thirty houses in the parish and placed out 328 children in them, with the great advantage that these are brought up, not as a class apart, but mixing in school and play with other children. The stigma of pauperism is thus largely removed, and "State Children" are encouraged to acquire the self-respect which is one of the conditions of good citizenship and moral standing.

Practical Papers.

THE MORAL OF THE WINEPRESS.

"To him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin" (James iv. 17).

FEW things in life suit our fallen human nature better than to lay down laws for other people, especially if we can be exempt from obeying them ourselves. "What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander" is a very comforting maxim when the sauce is pleasant, but it loses its charm when the sauce is unpalatable, and we represent the gander. Then, let the goose have it all!

Teetotalism, for instance, is considered an excellent diet for those silly geese who cannot control their thirsty appetite; but for the superior gander, strutting through life with head erect, and an impressive cackle of "moderation," no such restriction must apply. Yet is his cackle only cackle after all! "Now ye rejoice in your boastings," says the Apostle, "all such rejoicing is evil." Then, sharp as a knife-edge, follows the charge: "Therefore, to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin."

It may not be right under normal conditions to throw a pail of water over our neighbour in the street, and drench him to the skin. But if his clothes are on fire, and to do so would save his life, it not only becomes lawful, but imperative. To refuse would be sin, because the conditions are abnormal. Further, it may be legitimate to leave open an unprotected window because we like fresh air, but if we know that our child will fall through it and break its neck, our legitimate act becomes sin.

We have to deal to-day with abnormal conditions; therefore, says St. Paul, "All things are lawful unto me, but all things are not expedient." "Take heed lest by any means this liberty of yours become a stumbling-block to them that are weak." "If meat cause my brother to stumble, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I cause my brother to stumble." These words are emphatic as a plea for temperance, putting as they do the whole case in a nutshell. Here we have a never-failing principle, in the light of which to read such passages of Scripture as sanction the use of strong drink under special or peculiar circumstances.

WHAT IS "DOING GOOD"?

"To him that knoweth to do good." What is doing good? We all agree in magnifying the lofty ideal set before us by our Lord, of feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, visiting those in prison, and giving shelter to the stranger; and whenever we act thus we love to apply to ourselves the echo of his commendation—"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto Me."

Again, we admire the bold philanthropy and common sense of St. James, when he says, "If a brother or sister be naked, and destitute of daily food, and one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body; what doth it profit?" (ii. 15, 16); or the scathing criticism of St. John—"Whoso hath this world's good and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" (1 John iii. 17).

But in our own land and time, at any rate, it would be comparatively hard to find these forlorn ones, were it not for the curse of drink, to so large an extent are poverty, hunger and sin traceable to it. This needs no argument beyond the testimony of judges, police, and the highest authorities upon social maladies and reforms, who are unanimous in their verdict in regard to it.

If, then, to "do good" is to mitigate the results of this monstrous evil, how much more is it so, to strike at its root, and abolish its cause! No sane person will deny that the best efforts of both Christianity and philanthropy are frustrated by the prevalence of drink. Therefore to rid ourselves, our families, our country of its tyranny would be in the most real and practical manner to "do good." "To him," then, "that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin."

INDIVIDUAL DUTY.

Charity begins at home. So does drink—that is to say, with the individual. The country is composed of individuals, and if the country is to be saved the individual must yield—the strong for the sake of the weak, and the weak for the sake of himself.

One of our popular writers denounces this as a fallacy. "By all means," he says, "let the weak drink themselves to death, and the sooner the better, that only the strong and the fittest may survive, for the benefit of the community!" Such a teacher is a worthy companion of an old schoolfellow of my own, who maintained that "drunkenness, so far from being a national vice, is a virtue that should in every way be fostered and encouraged!" But then his father was a brewer! What a sorry contrast to our Saviour's golden rule—"Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them."

For nearly three years the Death Angel has cast a veil of gloom and grief over many a British home, by the loss of gallant fathers, husbands, sons, and brothers in South Africa, and our deepest sympathy has been drawn out day by day on this account. But we mourn also for those who have been overpowered by an enemy nearer home; war has slain its thousands, drink its ten thousands. Well may we adopt the spirit of Jeremiah's lament: "Oh, that my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for the slain of the daughter of my people" (ix. 1). It is for the survivors of these we plead, as well as for that untold multitude, especially of young people, upon whom the fearsome fiend has not yet tightly laid his grip.

A REMARKABLE DREAM.

A modern writer of some repute describes a dream that came to her. She pictures a pilgrimage through the world, with God as her Guide, to investigate its sorrows and its woes. They entered a beautiful temple of marble, through which flowed a river of wine. At one end hung a curtain from under which the liquid flowed, but by which its source was hidden. Suddenly the dreamer detected a spasmodic movement behind this curtain, and asked her Guide the cause. "There," He said, "is a wine-press, in which men and women and little children are done to death." "What, then, is this wine?" she asked. "It is their blood," He replied. Just then there were evidences of a struggle, and two half-crazed creatures emerged and escaped from the building. "What had happened," asked the dreamer, "if they had not escaped?" The Guide replied, "They had been made wine!"

Turning with a shudder, the dreamer noticed that many persons were drinking deep and long from the river as it flowed. The weary were strengthened, and the sorrowful gladdened, thereby, for "wine maketh glad the heart of man." They knew naught of the terrible scenes enacted behind the silent curtain. But others who had seen and known could never drink the wine again.

This may be but a parable, but it illustrates a principle, which applies to drink and many a social wrong besides. It may be excusable for those who are in ignorance to indulge, and benefit by its use; but when once their eyes have seen and their ears have heard the miseries which it has caused, ignorance is turned into knowledge, and that a guilty knowledge; and "to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin."

BEHIND THE CURTAIN.

It ought not to be necessary to unfold the horrors of drink to enlightened Christians at this late period of the world's civilization. Many of us have had all too realistic glimpses behind the curtain. We have seen our fellows—and in many cases our dear ones—trampled in the press; we have heard their despairing cries for help. To some of us the sparkling wine would be as gall in the mouth and as bitterness to the taste were we ever to partake of it again. In this we follow the direction of the Apostle: "If meat (or drink) cause my brother to stumble, I will partake of it no more, lest I cause my brother to stumble."

This course has been taken by most active Christian workers among the outcast and the lost. But others who do not engage in such service do not see the need of abstinence; or, perchance, they fear to look behind the curtain lest their conscience should be disturbed thereby. We may not tell how many of our fellows, men and women, go down every year to a drunkard's grave; it is a multitude no man can number. Neither can we estimate the wrecked homes and lives traceable to this network of evil forces; the curtain hangs to shut them from our gaze. We sing—

> Only Jesus feels and knows
> All the weight of human woes.

But does not his eye, full of pity for his down-trodden creatures—many of them struggling to be free—flash with indignant fire, as He sees how some who profess and call themselves Christians shut their eyes and stop their ears to the scenes and cries of woe, unwilling to forego a little personal enjoyment for his sake?

Others, indeed, steel their hearts, and line their pockets with the price of their brother's blood—colossal monuments of selfishness and greed. God is their Judge. The day will declare their measure of responsibility; they walk in the twilight of their own desires; they see not because they do not want to see. But let those upon whom the light of God has shone walk in the light, as He is in the light, hating even the garment that is spotted by the flesh, and abstaining from fleshly lusts that war against the soul.

> There's no time for idle scorning,
> While the days are going by;
> Let your face be like the morning
> While the days are going by.
> Oh, the world is full of sighs—
> Full of sad and weeping eyes!
> Help your fallen brother rise
> While the days are going by.

"Oh, the good we all may do!" To cut adrift from drink yourself, that you may the better "help your fallen brother rise," is in the noblest sense to "do good"; and "to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin."

THE CHURCH AND THE CHILDREN.

SOME CONSIDERATIONS IN VIEW OF THE

SPECIAL MISSION TO THE YOUNG,

BEING ARRANGED BY THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL UNION.

Individual Effort.

By Rev. JAMES MURSELL, Clapton.

WORDSWORTH begins his sonnet to Haydon, the well-known artist, with the words, "High is our calling, friend." When I look into the face of a devoted Christian worker among boys and girls, I always feel inclined to quote the poet's words. The Sunday-school teacher has a high calling. It is his so to touch and influence the plastic life of youth that Christ shall be formed in them, and His indwelling presence shall mould their natures into the grace of His own purpose in their lives. That is a vocation the height of which it is almost impossible to exaggerate. It requires a delicacy of instinct, a clearness of insight, and a tenderness of tact that can only be learnt at Jesus' feet. To the difficult, beautiful work of winning his scholars for Christ, the teacher must bring a spirit that has been, and is being, taught of God.

HOW TO PROCEED.

How, then, can the work be done? Of course, a great deal depends on what takes place on Sundays in the class; but not a little also hinges on what takes place outside the school during the week. No teacher who has the highest interests of his scholars at heart can rest quite content with teaching them on Sunday. He will feel that his class is a ministry which cannot be fulfilled in any such hebdomadal fashion. To win the young for Christ, there must be personal influence; and personal influence is gained only by personal care and personal love, and these involve time and trouble beyond the limits of the hour for which the class is put into the teacher's charge on Sunday afternoon. What takes place then and there is vitally important; but that, again, depends on what takes place not then, not there. Obviously, therefore, when a teacher accepts a class in the Sunday school, he accepts a cure of souls as real and as responsible, though smaller in its scope, as the vicar in his parish, or the minister in his congregation.

In what ways, then, can the redeemed personality of the teacher be brought to bear upon the scholars who compose his class? Speaking broadly, the teacher's work outside his class may be described by the adjective "indirect." That principle undoubtedly has many exceptions, but as a general rule the teacher will be wise to employ direct methods in the class, and indirect methods out of it. The contact between him and them on Sundays is almost exclusively through the medium of speech; on other days the subtle and more intimate media of life and character and personality come into play; and the straight words and the earnest appeals on Sunday will gather force to carry them to the scholars' inmost souls from the love and admiration which are begotten of the touch of a true and noble Christian life on theirs.

The way is now open for the enumeration of some of the individual efforts which a teacher will do well to make to win his scholars for the Saviour out of school.

INTERCESSORY PRAYER.

First and foremost, he must pray for them. The prayers should be personal, persistent, and detailed. Each should be brought by name before the Throne of grace. If the class is large, the names should be divided among the days of the week. Individual characteristics, special circumstances, definite events, will naturally colour his intercessions. There will be times when one scholar will be mentioned specially day after day. If prayer is offered oftener for one than for another, it should be for the child toward whom the teacher feels the least attraction, and who gives most trouble and pays least attention. You cannot help loving the child for whom you pray.

Prayer fills the heart with the Saviour's own yearning for the lambs of the flock, and gives to human lips the tenderness of Him who carrieth the lambs in his bosom. Moreover, our Father answers such intercessions in ways beyond our ken. "It is impossible that the child of those tears should perish," said the wise Archbishop of Milan to Augustine's mother. And it is impossible that the most vicious boy or the most frivolous girl who is the child of a teacher's earnest intercessions, should perish. He may have to pray and weep longer than Monica did for Augustine; longer even than Mr. Müller did for a man of whom he said: "I have prayed for him daily for fifty-two years, and he is not converted yet; but he will be." Let teachers bear the burden of their scholars' salvation on their prayerful hearts, and there will come a day when He who hears their prayers will touch that sacred load with his finger and change it into their crown of rejoicing.

HUMAN SYMPATHY.

The next step toward winning scholars for Christ outside the class, is that of bringing what I may call the teacher's humanness to bear upon them. I have heard it said that we need converting, first from the natural to the spiritual, and then back again from the spiritual to the natural. That is especially true of Sunday-school teachers. They must be human, and take a living and affectionate interest in the games and school life of their scholars.

The Holy Spirit works mightily through the simple naturalness and the happy humanness of a fully surrendered man or woman. A knowledge of foreign stamps and the gift of a few "changers"; an interest in photography and a few lessons in the art; skill on the cricket and football fields, and in swimming, or with the Indian clubs, or at musical drill—all these and many other interests, that seem far removed from spiritual things, may be used to the glory of God in the winning of young lives for Christ. "Enter into the life of your scholars through every avenue God opens for you," is advice that every teacher ought to lay to heart. Be the big brother of your boys and the big sister of your girls, teachers. The time you spend with them during the week is time well used, although you never speak a word directly about Christ. You gave the time to them for his sake; you romped with them for his sake; you sacrificed your own cricket match and umpired for your boys for his sake; and not in vain. You gained an influence over them, and an insight into their characters, and even a supply of illustrations that you will ask the Holy Spirit to baptize with fire, and that will hold them breathless on your lips next Sunday afternoon. The Incarnation is a proof that humanness has a share in the redemption of mankind. We must have good men, and full of the Holy Spirit in our Sunday-schools, but we must have men and women. If you would win your class for Christ, be human.

VISIT AND INVITE.

Other individual efforts must be dealt with summarily. The teacher should visit his scholars in their homes. Knowledge of their home surroundings, and of the influence predominating there, is vital. Visiting should be systematic, and be carried on simply on the ground of his relation to his class. Absence and sickness offer special opportunities for visits, and for personal conversation upon spiritual themes. If flowers or fruit accompany the visit so much the better. A jelly sent to a sick boy may win him for Christ, where what he would call "preaching" repels. Birthdays are another opening for individual effort. Children love to be remembered on these anniversaries, and a letter—of course sent through the post—is keenly relished, and often treasured all through life.

Open your home to your scholars. If you have a pear tree in the garden, ask the boys to come and gather the fruit for you, and give them two or three to take away. Set apart an evening once a month and let them come and play a game or two, and finish up with cakes and hot milk, and family prayers.

WATCH AND WAIT.

But should I never speak to my scholars personally about decision for Christ? Certainly you should. But you must watch and wait and pray for the opportunity. You need to remember that in dealing with children you are dealing with very delicate flowers, and that it is perilous work to stir the depths of a child's religious life into emotion. Still, through the interstices of the happy comradeship, which is the teacher's main work with his scholars out of school, opportunities will gleam on eyes that are quick to see and hearts that are sensitive to understand the ways of God. Sorrow comes even into children's lives; now one of the class goes off to boarding school, and another's father is removing from the neighbourhood; sometimes a boy or girl is overtaken in a fault; at intervals special services are held. At such times faithful words may be spoken, and loving questions asked which prove the turning point of life; while best of all, perhaps, to teachers who by personal effort and persistent prayer wait on their teaching, days will come when a boy will speak to him of his own accord, and shyly say, "I do so want to be a Christian." Such experiences are never to be forgotten. And if they do not visit every teacher of the boys and girls, the good seed sown and the living influence exerted spring into life and fruitfulness after long dormancy.

Then is fulfilled the saying of the Teacher of teachers and the Saviour of the world: "He that soweth and he that reapeth rejoice together."

By Rev. W. H. GRIFFITH-THOMAS, B.D.

THESE are days when organized activity and corporate effort are very much to the fore, and we cannot have too much of them if wisely directed and expressed. But institutions do not reach living souls; only another living soul can do that. There is need, therefore, of continual emphasis on the personal factor and on individual effort amid all our organized forms of activity.

This is specially true of work among the young. Sunday-schools ought to have the best apparatus, the most effective plans, and the finest organization at the command of the Church. Yet, above all, behind all, before all, is the personal factor in living superintendents and teachers. The Sunday-school is often contrasted with the day-school to the great detriment of the former and in entire forgetfulness of the essential differences between them. There is a marked difference of opportunity. The Sunday-school teacher has less than an hour a week with his scholars, often under circumstances educationally inconvenient and difficult; with no real disciplinary powers, and probably after a whole week of adverse influences on the scholars' lives. What day-school teacher, however highly trained, would guarantee any real education under such conditions? There is also a marked difference of purpose. The aim of the day-school is primarily instruction and only secondarily influence. That of the Sunday-school is pre-eminently influence, and only secondarily instruction. The one lays stress on education, the other on character.

If, therefore, in the Sunday-school, the opportunity for information be so small, and if the direct purpose be personal influence, the main object of the Sunday-school teacher must be to keep in mind the necessity and power of personal effort.

I.—IN LESSON PREPARATION.

Every lesson should be prepared in clear view of the personal needs of the scholars, with the individual members ever in mind. The characters of our scholars should be ever before us as we are gathering and arranging our lesson material. This will give definiteness, incisiveness, point and power to our teaching on the Sunday.

This personal aim should also take another form. We should prepare and teach with a view to immediate results, and not merely to the future. Probably the leakage of our elder scholars may in some measure be accounted for by the fact that teachers do not teach so much in view of immediate impression as in hope that "some day" God's Word "shall not return to Him void." Assuredly it will not, but that is no reason why we should not aim at an immediate "return." Even if this be not granted, we have not been doing wrong or harm in aiming at it. And it would doubtless be granted oftener if we expected and worked for it more. Every lesson, then, should in some way aim at immediate application to present needs.

All this will, of course, mean work—hard work, earnest work, self-sacrificing work; but this is why we are here and allowed to remain. No Christian service is worthy of the name unless it costs. It will mean not only the careful and prayerful study of the lessons, but also the equally careful and prayerful study of our scholars, their natures, their temperaments, their tendencies, the element common to all, and the characteristics of each. Every true teacher will realize the necessity of this, and the blessed fact that it is well worth while.

II.—IN WEEK-DAY WORK.

As the time in class on Sunday is necessarily short, our purpose will hardly be realized unless we forge links to bind the Sunday hours together. There must be opportunities of personal contact between teacher and scholar during the week. What these are will depend mainly on local circumstances, and especially on the earnestness and sanctified ingenuity of the teacher. In other words, it is once more personal power that counts. Perhaps, however, one or two general suggestions may be offered.

(1) There certainly should be as full a knowledge as possible of the scholar's week-day life. What is his home like? A teacher's evening call on the parents will usually be as welcome to them as it certainly will be useful to him. No amount of visiting by the superintendent can take the place of an occasional call from the teacher. The superintendent represents the Sunday-school in the abstract; the teachers the child's class in the concrete. Then something of the child's school life should be known, if possible; or, if at work, some of the circumstances, conditions and character of the employment. It ought not to be impossible to discover something of the books he reads, the games he specially favours, and the companions he prefers. Anything and everything that we can learn of our scholars' week-day life will be of immense value in giving point to our lesson preparation as well as in guiding our personal efforts to win them for Christ.

(2) Birthday Letters. A record of our scholars' birthdays should be kept, and a letter sent (by post, please) to each, so as to arrive first thing on the morning of the day. The letter should be as bright and cheery as possible, and always contain a personal word of loving appeal for Christ, if the scholar has not yet decided, or an equally loving word of counsel, if Christ is already accepted as Saviour. It is impossible to exaggerate the value of birthday letters. They will be kept and valued for years.

(3) There should be, if at all possible, some opportunities of personal intercourse during the week from time to time. By this is meant individual intercourse, and not merely attendance at general meetings. It might be possible to have occasional meetings of the whole class at the teacher's home, which would be a purely informal and social gathering, with games and books, and yet never without a loving word of counsel and prayer before closing. If the circumstances of the teacher prevent this, as they so often do, could not there be secured some room in connection with their church which might be used in turn by teachers? A small room could be made very convenient and cosy without much expense. But what is still more important is an opportunity for intercourse with individual scholars. An invitation to a teacher's home or room, a Saturday afternoon ramble, a cycle ride, are a few among many ways whereby teacher and scholar may be brought together with blessed and permanent results. Then an occasional letter at an unexpected time might often lead to definite decision. Litera scripta manet, which, being interpreted, means that a word written (and sent by post!) to one, is worth many a word spoken to a whole class.

(4) Those scholars who have definitely yielded to Christ should, of course, be linked to the Church as soon as possible by means of the usual methods of Church membership. Thenceforward for each of them should be found something to do, something that can be regarded as their own work. They might help in some way at the Band of Hope, or Scripture Union, as monitors or registrars. Or the services of elder scholars could be utilized as tract or church magazine distributors. And if it be at all possible, a little prayer-meeting of the young believers in a school or class would soon prove of real service in their Christian growth. At this point the value of the Junior Christian Endeavour Society will be fully realized. The two essentials of all Christian life and growth are fellowship and service, and of young people they are pre-eminently true and necessary.

These are some of the methods of personal effort during the week, and they will prove as fruitful as they, or others like them, will be found essential. Again it may be said, all this will take time and trouble, and the reply is: Assuredly it will; and so does everything that is worth doing. And experience shows that, as a rule, they are the best Sunday-school teachers who have least spare time during the week. They know the blessed secret of using well the time they have; and, still more, they know the art, supposed to be so difficult and yet really so easy and delightful, of making time!

All the foregoing, however, presupposes one thing of primary importance and absolute necessity—namely, personal effort as the outcome of

III.—PERSONAL INFLUENCE.

(1) Our effort for others is always the expression of our own personality. "Truth through personality" is Phillips Brooks' definition of preaching. We never do more than we are. Our real work will be only the expression and revelation of our true character. St. Paul laid primary stress on "thyself" in urging Timothy to "take heed" (2 Tim. iv. 16), and so is it in all work for God.

> Thou must thyself be true
> If thou the truth wouldst teach; and as water never rises above its own level, so our personal effort for our scholars will be in exact proportion to our personal character.

The personality which invariably attracts and influences children and young life generally expresses itself in three ways; in personal interest, personal sympathy, and personal love.

Personal interest. We must show our scholars that we have an individual regard for them, and a personal interest in their life and ways. There must be a "point of contact," many points, if possible, between us and them, which we can utilize for the realization of our purpose.

Personal sympathy. Children are wonderfully responsive to sympathy. But it must be sympathy, not pity, feeling with, rather than feeling for them. Childhood is the period which is concerned with the concrete, not the abstract. Truth is apprehended through the medium of pictures, and this element is connected with the feelings and imagination. The emotional and imaginative faculties are highly developed in children, and the power that makes a rag doll into a princess is one to be utilized by every worker for God. Intellectual conceptions are important for adults, but in childhood the cultivation of the emotions and the use of the imagination should be remembered by teachers. All our appeals to the child-conscience should be made through the imagination, and we should seek to illustrate life from concrete examples, such as are found in the biographies of Scripture rather than from mere intellectual statements.

Personal love. How wonderfully responsive children are to love! How soon they recognise it in the teacher! How quick to notice its absence! Personal power means last of all the power of love, and if only the teacher has the power of love, the citadel of child-soul is won.

In a word, the children have a keen instinct for—

(1) Personal reality. Their logic is very direct, with nothing between premises and conclusion, and if only they become convinced of the genuineness of the teacher and the reality of his character, the rest is comparatively easy.

(2) This will mean that the teacher will make Christ living and real to his scholars, and that, not merely as the Christ of Galilee and Calvary (of course, that), but the Christ of to-day, an ever-present Friend. What is needed for children is to show the reality of Christ in our everyday life, his love, grace, power, and joy. Here, too, it is the present and the concrete, not the past and the historical. If only Christ is thus made real to them all, questions of conviction of sin and conversion to God will easily and quickly settle themselves.

There was an officer's wife who showed her baby a photograph of the father, who was away in far-off India. This was done day by day for three years. Every morning the photograph was shown; "That's father" was the lesson. One day, as the little one was playing, the door of the room was opened, and a fine manly form filled the doorway, when the child exclaimed, "Father!" In like manner, if we make Christ real, living, and present to our scholars, we shall go farthest in leading them into living contact with Him. If we would win some, we must be winsome with the joy of the Lord as our manifest power and charm.

(3) The twofold secret of this is a life of fellowship with God by the simple but sufficient means of daily prayer and Bible meditation. Christ becomes real in proportion as we "take time to be holy," and live in his presence. Prayer keeps the avenues of the soul open to God, and meditation keeps them full of grace and truth for appropriation and expression in the life. "There they dwelt with the King for his work," and so must it be always. Abiding in Him we bring forth fruit, much fruit, more fruit, fruit that remains, fruit unto holiness, fruit in other lives, fruit that blesses others and continually glorifies God.

Life in a Cathedral City.—Some twelve months ago an eminent writer, Mr. Hudson, gave a very painful account of Chichester in regard to the abnormal number of drink shops and the amount of intemperance. Now Mr. Rowntree, in a startling "Study of Town Life," gives a vivid picture of the condition of a large section of the working-class population of another cathedral city, York, in which also, it appears, there is a terrible amount of drinking, betting, and gambling, and as an inevitable consequence a vast substratum of poverty. Every one of the 11,000 families tabulated by Mr. Rowntree spend a sixth of their income in drink. That fact alone accounts for much of the distress; but at the same time it cannot be overlooked that wretched housing is a potent cause of drinking. What an evil effect all these things have upon the spiritual life, may to some extent be estimated from the small attendance at places of worship, that on Sunday mornings averaging only 7,315 out of a population of 78,000. When such revelations as these are made, much is said about our modern social conditions building barriers in the way of the Gospel, but is it not the duty of all Christian forces to combine to remove them out of the way?

Samuel and Saul.

The Vision of God.

(1 Sam. iii.)

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

IT is very touching to notice the various references to the child Samuel, as they recur during the progress of the narrative, especially those in which an evident contrast is intended between his gentle innocence and the wild licence of Eli's sons—it is like a peal of sweet bells ringing on amid the crash of a storm.

Hannah said, "... I will bring him, that he may appear before the Lord, and there abide for ever." "And she ... brought him unto the house of the Lord in Shiloh; and the child was young." "As long as he liveth he is lent to the Lord. And he worshipped the Lord there." "And the child did minister unto the Lord before Eli the Priest." "Now the sons of Eli were wicked men; they knew not the Lord ... and the sin of the young men was very great before the Lord, for men abhorred the offering of the Lord; but Samuel ministered before the Lord, being a child." "Now Eli was very old, and he heard all that his sons did unto all Israel.... Notwithstanding they hearkened not unto the voice of their father, because the Lord would slay them. And the child Samuel grew on, and was in favour with the Lord, and also with men." "And there came a man of God unto Eli, and said unto him ... Wherefore kick ye at my sacrifice and at mine offering? .. And the child Samuel ministered unto the Lord before Eli." "And the Lord said, Behold, I will do a thing in Israel, at which both the ears of every one that heareth it shall tingle. .. And Samuel grew, and the Lord was with him, and did let none of his words fall to the ground; and all Israel from Dan even to Beer-sheba knew that Samuel was established to be a prophet of the Lord." "The Lord revealed Himself to Samuel in Shiloh, by the word of the Lord, and the word of Samuel came to all Israel."

THE ST. JAMES OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

His life seems to have been one unbroken record of blameless purity, integrity, and righteousness. One purpose ran through all his years, threading them together in an unbroken series. There were no gaps nor breaks; no lapses into sensuality or selfishness; no lawless deeds in that wild, lawless age. Towards the end of a long life, he was able to appeal to the verdict of the people in memorable words, which attested his consciousness of unsullied rectitude: "I am old and gray-headed. ... and I have walked before you from my youth unto this day. Here I am; witness against me before the Lord and before his anointed: whose ox have I taken? or whose ass have I taken? or whom have I defrauded? whom have I oppressed? or of whose hand have I received any bribe?" And they said, "Thou hast not defrauded us, nor oppressed us, neither hast thou taken aught of any man's hand."

It was a beautiful life; strong in its faculty of administration, wise in steering the nation from the rule of the judges into royal state of the kings, unimpeachably just, but blamelessly pure, towering above his contemporaries like a peak of glistening chrysolite, on which the sunlight plays, while all the valleys beneath are wrapped in scudding clouds and sweeping rain.

Samuel was not a prophet in the sense of foretelling the long future, and was not possessed of Isaiah's genius and eloquence; his only contribution to his age was a saintly character, which reminds us of that of James, the brother of our Lord, whose pure white robe was emblematic of his spotless character. Samuel was the James of the Old Testament, and it was by the saintliness, the moral grandeur of his character that he arrested the ruin of his people.

OUR DAYS OF TRANSITION.

We, too, may be called to face an era of change; our eyes may have to witness the passing of the old and the coming of the new; it may be that in our time also the Lord will shake once more, not earth only, but heaven, that the things which cannot be shaken may remain; in our time also ancient landmarks may be removed, as familiar and sacred as the tabernacle of Shiloh, and the Ark of the Covenant to Israel; but there is one property within our reach which need never pass away, which shall remain unimpaired and radiant through the years, and that is an unblemished character, a soul stainlessly arrayed, and the holy life in which these shall be embodied. "Let thy work appear unto thy servants, and thy glory unto their children, and let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us, and establish Thou the work of our hands upon us; yea, the work of our hands, establish Thou it."

The noblest gift that any of us can make to our fatherland or age is an undefiled character and a stainless life. Let us live our best in the power of the Spirit of God, and prove that the God of Pentecost is living still.

For Samuel, however, a great change was necessary and imminent. Up to this moment he had lived largely in the energy and motive-power of his mother's intense, religious life. It was needful that he should EXCHANGE THE TRADITIONAL FOR THE EXPERIMENTAL. His faith must rest, not on the assertions of another's testimony, but because, for himself, he had seen, and tasted, and handled the Word of Life. Not at second-hand, but at first, the Word of the Lord must come to him, and be passed on to all Israel.

Probably this change comes to every one who desires and seeks after the best and richest life. You may be the child of a pious home, where from boyhood or girlhood you were trained in the traditions of Evangelical religion, you were expected to pray and to serve God, you have been borne along by a blessed momentum; but suppose for a minute that that momentum should fail you, have you come to apprehend Christ as a living Reality for yourself? It may be that God, out of mercy to you, will break up and destroy the traditions and forms on which you have been relying, that the eternal and divine may stand forth apparent to your spiritual apprehension, and be apprehended by yourself for yourself, as though they were meant for you alone. It is a great hour in the history of the soul when the traditional, to which it has become habituated by long wont and use, is suddenly exchanged for the open vision of God; when we say with Job, "I have heard of Thee with the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth Thee;" when we say with the Apostle, "Leaving the things that are behind, and reaching forth to those that are before, I press toward the mark." You may one day find you have to face the old circumstances from a higher standpoint, as the spiral staircase is always returning to the same view-point, though always at the elevation of some few additional feet.

The Vision.

(1) When God came near his young servant, it seemed as though He placed his seal upon his faithfulness. Hitherto but small services had been required of him. To close and open the doors of the Tabernacle, to light the seven-branched candlestick in the late afternoon, and supply it with pure olive oil every morning, to render little services to the aged priest, whether by day or night—such were the duties assigned to him and performed with punctilious care. It was meet that he who had shown himself faithful in a very little should have a larger and wider sphere assigned to him.

(2) The vision came as night was beginning to yield to dawn; but "the lamp had not yet gone out in the temple of the Lord, where the ark of God was." Thrice the boy was startled from his innocent slumbers on his little bed in the chamber he occupied adjacent to the sacred building. He heard his name called softly, tenderly, lovingly, and made sure that Eli needed him, and thrice sped across the intervening space to report himself.

When God approaches us to reveal his Son in us, the tendency is always to speed with all haste to some place, or some spiritual adviser where we suppose that the interpretation of the vision will be given. Young converts, for instance, are apt to say, "If only I could have my questions answered by such a man of God, I am sure I should get blessing." And thus they are kept in constant perturbation, running backwards and forwards, repeating Samuel's vain experience, running to Eli and saying, "Surely you called me, and can interpret for me the vision and the voice."

(3) Eli was very wise in his treatment of the lad. He might have posed as the sole depository of the Divine secrets, might have warned the lad against listening to vain delusions, might have given way to ungoverned jealousy and suspicion, might have stood on the dignity and pride of office. But instead of any of these, without the slightest trace of hurt pride, he took the boy's hand in his, and so to speak led him into the Divine Presence, knowing full well that the seals of sacred office, which had been taken from himself, were about to be laid on those youthful palms.

NO PRIESTLY INTERVENTION.

If Eli had inherited the traditions of the priesthood merely, he would stand between that young soul and God, hearing its confession, wielding over it a terrorizing influence, and directing it, as in the place of God. Instead of this, however, the old man said sweetly, "Go and lie down again, and it shall be when He shall call thee, that thou shall say, 'Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth.'"

It is not the business of the Christian minister to lord it over the eager and aroused disciple, to demand confession, or offer absolution, but to say in effect: "Thou needest more than we can give. God, and God only, can suffice thee. Go, and lie down again. Be quiet. Let thy soul be still before God. Wait, for He will assuredly come again. And it shall be, if He call thee, that thou shall say, 'Speak Lord, for thy servant heareth.'"

As Thomas à Kempis puts it, "'Speak Lord, for thy servant heareth.' Let not Moses speak unto me, nor any of the prophets, but rather do Thou speak, O Lord God, the Inspirer and Enlightener of all the prophets; for Thou alone without them canst perfectly instruct me, but they without Thee can profit nothing. Speak Thou unto me, to the comfort, however imperfect, of my soul, and to the amendment of my whole life, and to thy praise and glory and honour everlasting."

(4) The message entrusted to the lad was a very terrible one. We cannot wonder that he feared to show Eli the vision. With a beautiful modesty and reticence he set about the duties of the day, and opened, as usual, the doors of the house of the Lord. It was not for him to blurt out the full thunder which had burst on him. This was another lovely trait in the boy's character. But he had misread Eli's character, he did not realize that men like him will die but not murmur; will resign themselves without a word of expostulation or defence; determined to know the worst, and when they know it, meekly answering, "It is the Lord, let Him do what seemeth Him good."

(5) It is well to notice that the Lord revealed Himself to Samuel in Shiloh by the Word of the Lord. Let us not seek for revelations through dreams or visions, but by the Word of God. Nothing is more harmful than to contract the habit of listening for voices, and sleeping to dream. All manner of vagaries come in by that door. It is best to take in hand and read the Scriptures reverently, carefully, thoughtfully, crying, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth." And in response there will come one clear, defined, and repeated message, asseverated and accentuated with growing distinctness from every part of the inspired book: "This is the way, walk in it; this is my will, do it; this is my word, speak it." Let us hear what God the Lord shall speak

Islington Clerical Meeting.

THAT the interest in the annual Islington Clerical Meeting is fully maintained, was shown by the large gatherings at Mildmay Conference Hall on Tuesday of last week. Among other noticeable features was the continued growth in the attendance of younger men, which is taken as a hopeful augury for the spread of Evangelical principles throughout the Church of England. Much important and earnest teaching on different points was given by clergymen of recognised Protestant standing. The general subject set down for discussion was "The Duty of the Church of England to the Nation," and was treated from four points of view—(1) In Removing Hostility and Apathy, (2) In Effecting Conversions, (3) In Perfecting the Saints, (4) In Winning the Young. The following are brief extracts from the addresses:—

THE NEED FOR CONVERSION.

By Dean Barlow.

I pass to the need for definite conversion to God of those who hitherto have rejected or neglected the truth, but who now are brought to a better mind. Granted that the hostility has, for a season, been dropped out of their story, and that the apathetic have been aroused from their torpor, then what shall be aimed at and prayed for? Repentance of sin and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ must be fully enforced. There must be no light dealing with sin. It is a tremendous power in man; it brings with it terrible consequences; it lays upon man a load of guilt which he can never remove. Sorrow for sin, hatred of sin, renunciation of sin, resistance to sin—these must be put in the forefront. And then the blessed work of the crucified Saviour, who has brought peace by the blood of the everlasting covenant, will be unfolded to those thus repentant, with power Divine—i.e., by the power of the Holy Spirit. The work of conversion must be aimed at as much in the stately parish church as in the humblest mission hall.

HOSTILITY AND APATHY.

By Rev. Dr. Nickson, Liverpool.

I. The first problem before us is to search for the cause of opposition to truths which in themselves men are not indisposed to recognise, and, in the second place, to discover the methods best adapted for their presentation.

(1) In our zeal and earnestness of contention for "the faith which was once for all delivered unto the saints," there is need of intense sympathy. The sympathy that is Christlike is not the sympathy that surveys and weeps, but the sympathy that comes down and seeks. If the intellectual world to-day is living in a totally new atmosphere of thought, we must not isolate ourselves from it.

(2) The sympathy which sets itself to seek men in the new fields of thought into which they have wandered must be also the sympathy which is quick to discover in them all that is nearest to or tending towards Christ.

(3) The principle which animated the teaching of Christ must animate our presentation of his message.

(4) We at home might imitate with great advantage the best methods of our missionaries. They set themselves to learn accurately the language through which they are to proclaim the "unsearchable riches of Christ." They next study the methods of thought and the modes of its expression common around them, utilizing these for their message.

(5) We must work not merely by argument, but in the spirit of love; and zeal alone is not love.

II. The widespread apathy is only too painfully apparent.

(1) There must be a revival of the true idea of the pastorate. (2) There must be a reorganization of parochial machinery. (3) To a more effective pastorate there must be added a more efficient pulpit.

By Rev. J. E. Watts-Ditchfield.

I venture to ask whether the divisions of the Evangelical party—caused by what are, after all, non-essentials — have not lessened its power, weakened its influence, not merely in the counsels of the Church itself, but in the prosecution of Christ's work. Is there not some justification for the charge that we are disunited and disorganized? If the battle for God is to be won, we clergy must be united, we must be free from jealousy and self-seeking, in honour preferring one another. The hostility of men is not removed by the sight of an easy, comfortable, ministerial life; neither is the man of the world convinced of the sincerity of those who advocate from the pulpit a life of unselfishness, if he sees in the preacher evidences of self-seeking, or if he sees the Church on the one hand allowing an aged minister to lie as an incubus upon the parish long after his physical strength has departed, or witnesses a man who in the midst of his people has preached for twenty years the doctrine of sacrifice for God now clinging to an office the work of which he cannot do, rather than, relinquishing it, face personal or family inconvenience or semi-starvation. The Church ought not to permit parish after parish to be given up to hostility and apathy owing to its clergy being incapable—either physically, morally, or spiritually—to perform the proper duties of the ministerial office. The Church exists for the extension of the glory of God, and not for the sustenance of the ministry. Appointment for life to any office in the Church should be abolished, and some system devised by which men who from any cause are unable to grapple with the difficulties of their particular parishes removed.

By Rev. W. H. Stone.

Men are asking, to-day as ever, for miraculous attestations of the Divine mission of the Church. Thank God, miracles still exist, manifested in the metamorphoses of men's minds and in the transformations of their characters and conduct. The days of old-fashioned conversions are not over. The old Gospel of the vicarious sacrifice of Christ—justification by faith only in Christ alone, regeneration by the operation of the Holy Ghost—is as potent as ever among the labourers of our country villages, the artisans of our great towns, and the cultured inhabitants of West London. Moody used, word for word, the same addresses in the slums of Glasgow, the Agricultural Hall at Islington, and to the undergraduates of Cambridge, and the result was everywhere the same.

By Rev. A. B. G. Lillingston.

How can we best act in order that our preaching be effectual under God in the conversion of sinners? (1) Let this object regulate all our parochial arrangements. Let us organize nothing unless it may have some such vital effect.

(2) Let us be perfectly consistent in our efforts, in this way: If we plead that the Holy Spirit shall work with us on the Sunday, let us see to it that we work with Him in the week-day. The world has always been more successful in converting the Church than the Church has been in converting the world.

(3) Let us labour to adjust our way of expressing ourselves to the necessities of the time, for adaptation is an almost forgotten law of the Pentecost which converts men.

(4) Without being grossly dogmatic, let us stand on firm ground, and speak with no uncertain voice.

(5) Let us never forget what we are trying to do. It is not to apply a poultice, it is not to remove a film of blindness, but it is to assist men and women to come into an entirely new life.

(6) We must not be afraid of exercising a large amount of affectionate urgency in exhorting them to flee from hell.

(7) Above all, in it all, through it all, there must be the hand, the voice, the tone, the look of love and compassion.

THE PERFECTING OF THE SAINTS.

By Rev. Prebendary Webb-Peploe.

There is within the National Church an invisible body, known only to God in one sense, but I suppose generally known more or less to the men themselves who constitute it, and certainly far more known to their neighbours than many of them are apt to think. We speak specially of the members of it who are what are called sometimes "the congregation of the faithful." Of these we have to speak as the men who are to perfect the saints. But strange to say, they are the saints, and they are practically the only saints to be found in the Church of England, exactly as St. Paul speaks of the perfecting of the saints through the work of the ministry, whichever reading we take, and that these saints, therefore, are the very persons who perfect the saints; so that when we speak now of the perfecting of the saints as the duty of the Church, we recognise at once that we are speaking of ourselves so far as we are faithful members of the Church of Christ and that we are speaking only of those who constitute the true invisible and spiritual Church of the Lord Jesus, the Head, and that it is this Church which is to fulfil its duty to the nation by or through the perfecting of the saints, or in reference to the perfecting of the saints.

By Canon Roxby.

(1) We must endeavour by all means in our power to promote the deep and prayerful study of the Word.

(2) We must endeavour with equal earnestness to promote a deep and constant spirit of worship.

(3) We should endeavour to get our people to engage in Christian work.

(4) We must keep jealous watch over ourselves. Much must, humanly speaking, depend upon what manner of men we are. We must ourselves be growing, if we are to help our people to grow.

WINNING THE YOUNG.

By Rev. E. A. Stuart.

It has become increasingly rare to see what we used to see—the mother sitting at one end of the pew, the father at the other, and the children sitting between them. If you ask one of the reasons for this, I must confess that I think that it is in some measure due to the great crusade that has been carried on lately for "free churches." Perhaps a "free church" is necessary in some parts of the cities of our land—though, for my own part, I would rather that the working man should have a pew or a seat at even a nominal rent, so that he might call it his own, and that he should occupy it from time to time—but I am certain that in the West End of London the "free church" method has done an immense amount of harm. Formerly a man no more thought of taking a house without paying rent than of omitting to have a seat in church for himself, and probably also a seat for his servant.

By Rev. J. S. Tucker.

Strange, indeed, is it that the cause of Christ in our schools should be so ignored by those who, in their school-days, were won for Christ's service by the self-denying labours of others who loved the schoolboy for the sake of his Lord.

An entry into the great schools could, of course, be obtained only by men of considerable culture and intellectual power. No one is likely to succeed who does not practise much self-restraint and much intercessory prayer.

By Rev. H. H. Gibbon.

Just as in certain stages of the Church's history certain truths have been especially needful, and therefore these truths have been brought forward by the Holy Spirit, so in the different stages of man's life certain truths appeal to us more at one time of life than at another. Many of us can remember when that homely, unpretending American tradesman came to England in 1873 as a teacher of the Gospel. No building then was large enough to hold the crowds who came to hear him.

What was the burden of Mr. Moody's preaching? What was his principal message? It was this: the power of Christ to deliver from sin. This, I believe, is what we should try to teach young men: the Resurrection—not the fact only, but the power—and our teaching by God's grace will have a double effect.

It will be of interest to some readers to know that a verbatim report of the addresses is being published at The Record office, 1, Red Lion Court, Fleet Street, E.C. (price 3d.).

The Late Mr. C. A. Miner.

AMONG those who were privileged to know Mr. Miner, some few remain who are acquainted with his life-story in connection with service for Christ—a story which deeply impresses the often-forgotten truth that one man labours and another enters into his labours, and that for this reason surprises await the Lord's servants whose work shall be made manifest at his appearing. Another fact also strikingly presents itself—that what, humanly speaking, we call "accidents" and "coincidences," often far reaching in their influence and results, are, in reality, links in God's plan for the accomplishment of his own ends.

It will be a surprise to many who knew Mr. Miner only in the later years of his life to hear that, if not the originator of the Charity Organization Society, the Royal Normal College for the Blind, and Lockhart's Cocoa Rooms, London, he was most certainly the principal promoter of these schemes. That Mr. Miner's sphere of work lay in Great Britain rather than in his own country is due to what has been called an accidental meeting with two friends in Edinburgh. Mr. Miner was "an American of the Americans" by descent, and a "Puritan of the Puritans" by birth. His forefathers were among the earliest of the settlers who founded New England, each generation taking its full share in the strenuous life of that formative colony. They were originally a Cornish family.

From early youth till he had passed the allotted three score and ten years, Mr. Miner was called by the will of God to suffer much through weakness of body. Converted at the age of thirteen, he began, under the care, and with the fullest sympathy of his mother, to visit the poor in Philadelphia. At the age of twenty-one, on the death of his father, he was left free to carry out certain plans he had formed. If there was one trait in Mr. Miner's character more strongly developed than another, it was practical common-sense. As early as 1851 we find him with his mother in Palestine, where the need of skilled labour struck him, and led to his sending to America for trained farm labourers to instruct the Jews in agriculture. He also introduced the cultivation of Indian corn into Palestine. After the death of his mother, who was buried on a slope of Lebanon, Mr. Miner returned to Europe. It was at this time he first prayed what became his litany: "Give me just enough health to do something for Thee, and to be used by Thee for others."

On his return journey to America, he turned aside to visit Edinburgh. The condition of the poor in the modern Athens greatly interested him, and led to his drafting a scheme for consolidating the various charities, which scheme later on was set forth at a citizens' meeting convened and presided over by the Lord Provost. The scheme was formally adopted. Subsequently the plan was accepted by other cities, and is now embodied under the Charity Organization Society.

About this time a young American, Mr. Campbell, who had lost his sight in early youth, had been spending his holiday in Europe. On his way home to work for the blind, a casual invitation from a visitor at the same hotel led to his taking tea with the indigent blind, and to his meeting on this occasion his countryman, Mr. Miner. This second "incidental meeting" led to their collaboration for the improvement of the condition of the blind poor of Great Britain. The outcome of their united efforts is seen in the Normal College for the Blind at Upper Norwood.

We are still dealing with a time which, judged by the progress of events, seems remote. Thirty years ago there were few, if any, places where warehousemen, carriers, or working men could get a decent meal. In Liverpool Mr. Lockhart had successfully launched his Cocoa Rooms, and there Mr. Miner spent some time in order to study the work. Afterwards, his efforts being furthered by the late Duke of Westminster and others, he was enabled to start, under the personal supervision of Mr. Lockhart and himself, the first of the Cocoa Rooms in London. Of these excellent institutions there are, at the present time, seventy-five, which still carry out the founder's purpose to provide good food at cheap rates, and a place of shelter free from the temptation to drink.

So far we have dealt with the early life of our friend. Much remains, had we but space, to be said of his later life. The pathetic prayer was always made, and always met, "just enough health to do something for Thee." For the last fourteen years of his life he scarcely ever left his room, and then only when carried, but the service was unbroken. Many sought his counsel and his help, and none sought in vain. He felt the great responsibility of stewardship, and reduced his giving to a science, nor would he permit his right hand to know what his left gave. Through the columns of The Christian he gave largely, but under initials which he constantly changed, lest he might be discovered. We may not lift the veil he dropped, but may say that in the early work which originated the South Africa General Mission, he was a most generous helper, also during the first year of the present campaign in ministering to the needs of our soldiers. His help and sympathy knew neither place nor creed. India's burden was his, China's too, South America, the Congo; in a word, his desire was that the world might be won for Christ.

We are brought back to where we began. It will only be known "in that day" how far the influence of Mr. Miner extended. In pointing out some of the forms it took, our desire has been twofold—not to glorify man, but to encourage and stimulate workers in the great field who are bearing the heat and burden of to-day, and also to cheer the physically weak and suffering by showing forth to the praise of God how He condescended to answer the fainting cry:—

Just enough health to do something for Thee.

Havre Sailors' Home.—The workers at the Havre Sailors' Home and Rest have closed another year with a deep sense of thankfulness to God. There has been a slight increase in the number of boarders, 203 having passed through the Home during the past twelve months. Though the number of English vessels paying off their crews at this port continues to be very small, owing to altered conditions of the carrying trade, the stream of English and Scandinavian steamers constantly in and out has not diminished, bringing their contingent of men who, but for the Rest, would find no respectable place of recreation and helpful friendship. "We have been encouraged from time to time by coming in contact with Christian seamen, and our meetings for Bible reading and prayer have been well attended. Some months ago we formed a branch of the Scripture Reading Union, which several of our sailor friends have gladly joined. By this means we hope to keep in touch with those who have shown interest in spiritual things." Mrs. J. E. K. Studd, 67, Harley Street, W., will be glad to correspond with friends.

Lord's Day Rest Association.

THIS Association has issued a New Year's address, giving many statistics relating to the Day of Rest. The Middlesex County Council, by thirty-two votes against thirteen, refused to issue seven day music licences. The Archbishop of Canterbury, and many leading clergymen and ministers, have signed a protest against the abuse of the music licences sanctioned by the L.C.C. The action of Sir Mark Stewart, M.P., in Parliament has put a check to the increase of Sunday sorting in the post office. The Bishop of Oxford has said that "The observance of Sunday was vital to the happiness of the people, and the nation could not trifle with it without incurring great perils."

In many parts of the country the local authorities are suppressing Sunday trading. At Swansea the open shops on Sunday have been reduced from 288 to twenty-three. In Edinburgh the Town Council has, by large majorities, refused to sanction Sunday concerts, and in Glasgow the Corporation, by twenty-nine votes against ten, has declined to open the museums and galleries on Sundays; yet in the face of these expressions of public opinion Lord Balfour of Burleigh has used his official position to open the Edinburgh Museum on Sundays. Under the auspices of the Association 1,004 sermons have been preached, and 970 of the preachers have received 75,000 copies of the Association's publications. Copies of the address will be sent to applicants by Mr. Charles Hill, Secretary, 12, John Street, Bedford Row, London.

Prayer for Ireland.

THE friends of the Society for Irish Church Missions in many different places observed January 16 as a day of special prayer for Ireland. The central prayer meeting was held in the parlour of Exeter Hall, when there was a good attendance. Captain Tottenham presided, and an address on Gal. vi. 8 was given by Rev. F. W. Ainley, vicar of St. Andrew's, Barnsbury, and formerly I.C.M. superintendent in Cork. A number of topics for praise and prayer in connection with the Society's work were presented.

In response to an earnest request from friends in the county Kerry, the Council of the Irish Branch of the Evangelical Alliance have issued an appeal that special prayer be offered each Monday for a great outpouring of the Spirit of God. A series of meetings has been arranged by the Council each Monday afternoon in the Christian Union Buildings, commencing at 3.30 p.m. It is hoped that similar meetings will be arranged throughout the country wherever the Lord's servants can meet together in his Name.

A monthly meeting for prayer is held at the London offices of the Society for Irish Church Missions, 11, Buckingham Street, Strand, W.C., on the second Friday in each month at 3 p.m., when the presence of all who desire the evangelization of Irish Roman Catholics will be welcomed.

Question and Answer: A Bible Study.

GOD'S QUESTION AND MAN'S ANSWER.

1. Where art thou? (Gen. iii. 9).
   I was afraid (Gen. iii. 10).
   I am undone (Isa. vi. 5).
   I have sinned (Luke xv. 18).
   I am vile (Job xl. 4).

2. What is this that thou hast done? (Gen. iii. 13).
   I have been "disobedient" (1 Pet. ii. 7).
   Transgressed the law (Isa. xxiv. 5).
   Broken the covenant (Rom. v. 17, 19).

MAN'S QUESTION AND GOD'S ANSWER

1. Where is he? (Matt. ii. 2).
   In the Scriptures (John v. 39).
   He is nigh thee (Rom. x. 8).
   "Not far from every one of us" (Acts xvii. 27).

2. What has He done?
   Fulfilled the law (Matt. v. 17).
   Was obedient in all things (Heb. x. 7).
   He brought in a new covenant (Matt. xxvi. 28).
   Finished the work of redemption (John xix. 30).
   Glorified God on the earth (John xvii. 4).

Memorial of George Whitefield

SIERRA LEONE CONGREGATIONS.

REV. W. GROVES has been working in Sierra Leone as Superintendent of the Mission connected with the Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion, a work which has a most interesting history, though not generally known. Through the faithful preaching of George Whitefield, then chaplain to the Countess of Huntingdon, many negroes were converted in Georgia, which is now one of the United States of America, and churches were formed for them. These were known as churches of the Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion, and ministers were sent out by the Countess to take the oversight of the work. On peace being concluded after the War of Independence, many of the negroes who had taken part with the British troops were sent by the Government to Nova Scotia, and were there taught by ministers of the Countess of Huntingdon, Revs. Mr. Fomage, John Marrant, and others. The climate, however, proved too severe for all but the most robust; accordingly, about 1,100 of them were, in 1792, at their own request, taken to Sierra Leone, where a colony of liberated slaves had been founded.

On landing, the immigrants marched up from the shore, to what is now the centre of Freetown, headed by their native ministers, and singing:—

Awake and sing the song
Of Moses and the Lamb,
Wake every heart and every tongue
To praise the Saviour's Name.

At this point they were lost sight of by the Connexion at home. Political troubles, defective postal arrangements, together perhaps with the death of the Countess, were most likely the main causes. When they were next heard of, in 1824, there was one congregation only, but they had maintained their church life all through the thirty-two intervening years, and still claimed to belong to the Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion. They were engaged in re-building their church, making it larger and stronger. The native minister was a Mr. John Ellis, an old man, who worked during the week as a cooper, and seems to have been much respected in the colony.

In 1824, a negro woman arrived in London bearing a letter from Mr. Ellis, the native minister, but no regular communication was opened up between the coloured and the English brethren until 1838, when two young negroes attended the services in Zion Chapel, London. They had come to England on business, and had taken the opportunity of making the Church, of which they were members, known to the leaders in the Connexion at home. From that time it may be said that the congregations in England have shown an interest in the sister Church in Sierra Leone. In 1842 the Conference definitely assumed the oversight of the work, and, in a large measure, the responsibility for its success.

Throughout the greater part of its history the mission has been under native superintendence, which has been considered an advantage on account of the climate. The late Rev. S. T. Williams, who died in 1899, showed great enterprise in starting new stations, and in doing what he could for the work. There was, however, for some years a desire that the charge should be taken over by a European, a hope which has been realized in the appointment of Mr. Groves.

Brought to the Lord when he was about seventeen years of age, he was led to unite with the Wesleyan Methodists, who made him class leader and local preacher, thus giving him opportunity to work for God. He subsequently entered Dr. Grattan Guinness' College, and spent several very pleasant years at Harley House and Hulme Cliff. On leaving, Mr. Groves proceeded to the United States, where he spent some years in the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and undertook a further course of study, proceeding later as a missionary to South America.

It was while living and working in this country that Mr. Groves became more fully alive to the sad condition and great needs of the world out of Christ. "But," says he, "the iron was burned into my soul at Harley College." After much serious thought and prayer, he decided to enter Oxford University, where the call came to him quite distinctly to take up mission work in Sierra Leone.

When in Malvern, last September, Mr. Groves said he had been told that not much could be done for the natives in Sierra Leone; but, following the example of our Lord Jesus Christ, he felt he must go to them, and do what he could. He had since seen that, when the great change takes place in the heart, the simplicity of their faith and trust in God is often more marked than at home. They have a great love for their prayer and class meetings, and never show any hesitancy about taking part. A prayer meeting is held every day at 5 o'clock, a.m., all the year round, in connection with each of the churches, and the people flock to it before they have breakfast. Their times of "shouting" (as they are called) are a great source of enjoyment, which simply means singing chorus after chorus, as their leader gives them the opportunity; but this is not mere excitement—only an outlet for the worship of praise. The women are banded together under a leader, who is called mother, and again sub-divided into smaller bands, each led by a mother, and these little companies visit the outlying stations, singing as they go.

REV. W. GROVES.

From Photograph by Mr. Walton Adams, 29, Blagrave Street, Reading.

Mr. Groves returned to England last May, after an absence of eighteen months. Although there had been many discouragements before he went out, he had been kept unmoved, having no fear as to the future, and not deterred. With real thankfulness to his Heavenly Father, he was able to record that he had never had to forego a service through fever or ill-health, though the building he lived in was not suitable for a European.

Sierra Leone is twenty-one miles long by twelve miles broad. Mr. Groves lives at Waterloo, a large village of 2,000 inhabitants, consisting principally of mud-houses, with a few of stone and frame-work. The church at Carboo is under the charge of a native teacher, Mr. Turner, who is very earnest in his work. He is supported by the Malvern friends, and is hoping to erect a stone building at a cost of about £90, in place of the present one, which has only a bamboo roof. There are a great many Mohammedans in the colony, with two mosques in Freetown. At Cairo there is a college, with 10,000 students and 325 professors, which sends out 3,000 Mohammedan missionaries every year throughout Africa.

This shows the great need there is for a training school and industrial work, so that the young men may be thoroughly fitted and prepared for carrying the Gospel among Mohammedans and natives.

Great superstition still prevails, and prayer is earnestly asked that these darkened brothers and sisters may come into the light, and may know the blessed liberty wherewith Christ makes his people free, with his keeping power from all the power of the enemy.

The treasurer of the Mission is Mr. E. D. Shelton, Ely.

"Quartus, the Brother."

(Rom. xvi. 23, R.V.)

THAT is all we know about him.

The others whose names are written here are more or less famous.

"Phœbe our sister," was noted for her hospitality and for her kindness to the Apostle, and members of the church at Corinth.

Tertius wrote the Epistle.

Gaius was evidently a man of influence.

Erastus was the treasurer of the city, and the others were of more or less note, but Quartus was just a humble brother, known by his brotherliness, and because of that the Apostle mentions him in this letter to the Christians at Rome, as "Quartus the brother."

(1) A lesson here in brotherliness, contentment, humility. Brotherliness—finding joy in loving and serving others in any capacity, in whatever humble way we can. Contentment—"content to fill a little space" so that the name of our Master and Lord may be glorified. Humility: "In lowliness of mind let each esteem others better than himself" (Phil. ii. 3). "God . . . giveth grace to the humble" (1 Pet. v. 5).

(2) In the Apostle's reference to "Quartus the brother," we have an insight into the binding forces of the Gospel. All regenerate souls of every name throughout the world are members of the same great family, children of the same Heavenly Father, journeying towards the same eternal home.

(3) Let us seek to manifest more of the spirit of brotherly love to all. "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples" (John xiii. 35). "He that loveth his brother abideth in the light" (1 John ii. 10).

Rest of Heart.

REST, weary heart, in Christ, the resting place
Thy God prepared for thee;
Lean all thy weight on Him and be at peace,
His Word, thy guarantee.

In the beginning, when God's work was done,
Our Sabbath day was blest;
Yet when the great Redemption was complete,
More glorious the rest.

Won by Gethsemane and Calvary,
The peace of Christ in heaven—
The peace of God, all tremorless and sweet—
That peace to thee is given.

Sing, happy heart! Let Jesus breathe his peace
To heal your inmost sore;
And live in Him and rest, through life and death,
And heaven, for evermore.

Lantern Lectures for the Poor of Florence.—Mr. Arthur W. Higgs, 1, Via dei Pecori, Florence, writes:—"We are anxious here to commence some lantern lectures on the life of Christ for the poor children of the city, and should be glad to hear if any Christian friend has a good lantern and some old slides that would be given or sold for this sole purpose."

SUNDAY, January 26. Genesis i.

"IN the Beginning, God!" You inquire the date? Ah, no human chronology could supply the figures for that computation! You are really asking when Time began to be! That there was a moment when a Divine finger touched the pendulum of Time, and made it begin to swing majestically to and fro is certain. But when? The oldest elder before the throne will tell you that it was before him, and the oldest star will tell you that it was before its first twinkle.

But as we stand together on the margin of Time, and look over into the bottomless horizonless abyss, which we call Eternity, we find God, we find the Word (John i. 1), we find thoughts of love and sacrifice. Was not the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world? Let us remember always to make God first—the first as we wake, as we make some new plan, enter a new position, or form a new friendship. In the beginning, God.

Then comes the story of world-building, the origin of which probably preceded by long ages the narrative of Gen. i., and the earth may hide within her secret caverns the memorials of forms of life which existed before the earth became without form and void. Perhaps Satan dwelt here with his angels, when they were unfallen, and before they courted disaster at the hand of God. We have now to do with the reshaping and moulding of the formless earth.

Finally, we have the story of man's creation; and in so far as God's image has been restored in us, we may claim these five wonderful imperatives. Be fruitful; multiply ("the church was multiplied"); replenish (the depleted churches); subdue (or be yourself subdued); have dominion ("I will give to him to sit with Me on my throne"). May the risen Lord speak those imperatives to each of us, that henceforward they may be divinely operative.

MONDAY, January 27. Genesis ii.

The story of the Institution of the Rest-Day belongs to the previous chapter, as is indicated by the use of the same term for God throughout this whole passage. Another term is used in the following paragraph (v. 5, &c.). This difference arose from Moses interweaving, by the direction of the Divine Spirit, and so stamping with Divine authority, some ancient traditions of the beginnings of things which were probably communicated to Adam by the lips of God.

Man, as we know him, begins in a garden, exquisitely adapted to him—food before hunger, water before thirst, fragrance before smell, beauty before eyesight, love before a heart-beat. God always goes first to prepare an inheritance for us. We are no longer servants, but sons. We do not earn things, but receive them from the Divine Hand. We wake up to find that Divine skill and love have been exquisitely engaged in adapting our surroundings for us, and us for them. But the goodness of God is not meant to induce idleness. Eden would not have been Eden, if Adam had had no work to do. This was as needful for himself as for Eden. You may be placed in Eden, but it will become a perfect wilderness, if you say, "A little more sleep, a little more slumber." There is a tendency to revert to type, which must be resisted by perpetual effort.

That Adam was able to name the animals, indicates his original royalty (Psa. viii.); in so far as we abide in Christ, that supremacy is restored (Daniel iv.; Mark i.). But what was power without love, or a throne without a consort? Eve therefore was given to crown his bliss; taken from his side, as afterwards the Church from the opened side of her Lord.

TUESDAY, January 28. Genesis iii.

The history of temptation is always the same. There is first the world, which may be best rendered by the Hindoo Maya, vanity or illusion, the specious show and appearance which inevitably end in disappointment—"Ye shall be as God, knowing good and evil." Next is the flesh, the inquiry for and endeavour after what is good for food and desirable to make wise. Lastly, the devil, who hates man, as a rival, and whose ceaseless efforts have been directed to enslaving our race. In the words of our Lord, as true to-day as ever, Satan is a liar from the beginning, promising what he can never perform, and when his end is gained leaving us to pay the inevitable cost.

There is no hope for the soul except in the Redeemer, the second Adam, the Lord from heaven. In the first Adam we have the penalty accruing from a broken law, the bias or tendency of the fallen nature to go astray, and the absolute inability of the unaided soul to stand against the wiles of the devil. But when we exchange the first for the second Adam, how blessed the contrast. The penalty is for ever gone, put away by Him who bore our sins in his own body on the tree; the bias towards evil is counteracted by the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, so that we may not do the things that we would; and the grand discovery is made that he who abideth in the Son of God sinneth not—in the power of the risen Lord there is deliverance to the uttermost. All the other results of the Fall are also transformed. Pain becomes the mother of the noblest achievements. Hard work is redemptive in its reaction on man's moral life. Through death, also, we pass into the presence of God, and find it the gate of Paradise. By death Christ abolished death. He wore thorns as a crown, and made the fruit of the tree of life accessible to all. "Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound."

WEDNESDAY, January 29. Genesis iv.

The R.V. suggests that Eve thought that the promise was fulfilled as she clasped Cain to her heart, but weary centuries were destined to pass before the fulness of time arrived, and God sent forth his Son. The inner motive of Cain's ruthless deed is given by the beloved Apostle and Evangelist, when he says that Cain was of the wicked one, and slew his brother because his own works were evil and his brother's righteous (1 John iii. 12).

Do you inquire the cause of those righteous works, which culminated in the tragedy of his death? Again we learn from the New Testament that Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, because he lived by faith (Heb. xi. 4). How wonderful to realize this living link between ourselves and one of the grey fathers of our race. The amount of truth revealed to him and to us is as the contrast of the peep of dawn to perfect day, but his attitude to what he knew is the same as ours towards the risen living Saviour. Faith is the opened door and window to God, the reckoning on God, the surrender of the will.

His blood cried to God, and God vindicated and avenged him. And God avenges all such. Sooner or later, he answers the call of the saints from under the altar, "How long?" and his answer is a Pentecost, which leads the murderers to exclaim, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" How many souls carry with them the burden of their brother's murder, and hear his cry on the night wind! But for these even there is a sin-offering at the door, awaiting their penitent quest.

A numerous family sprang from the first parents, and as these intermarried, a population would begin to people the early seat of human life. It seems as though the evil spirit of the world followed the track of his descendants. Religion without faith or sacrifice was followed by abandonment to the arts and accomplishments that were bounded by earth and time. It is always thus.

THURSDAY, January 30. Genesis v.

In contrast to Cain's line of descendants in the previous chapter we have Seth's in this. There is a curious similarity in the names of the prominent men in each line, as though the worldly line of Cain were bent on professing as much religious life as those of the line of Seth, even though they lacked the power.

There always have been and will be these two families in the world—the children of this world and the children of light, the tares and the wheat, the goats and the sheep. We must come out, and be separate, and walk with God, else we shall be dragged down to the world's level. The strong, healthy days of the Church have always been those when she has dwelt in the holes and caves of the earth, and standing outside has brought her influence to bear on the world that is hurrying down the primrose path to its doom.

Enoch walked with God, that is, he went along the same path, doing violence to his own tastes and inclinations. It was as though the Lover of Men, whose delights are with the sons of men, selected him as his special companion. But there is no need to envy him, as though he possessed some special privilege, since the Master said, "I have not called you servants, but friends." May we live as such.

FRIDAY, January 31. Genesis vi.

It was an age of abounding wickedness, but just what it was, and how it happened, is not so easy to discern. Some think that the sons of God were fallen angels; others that the seed of Seth became joined in marriage to the daughters of Cain. But, in either case, the wickedness of man was great in the earth; and, as with ourselves, the salient feature of that wickedness lay in the unguarded state of the imagination of the thoughts of the heart. Nothing is more important than to guard the thoughts. Let the peace of God keep the heart and thought. As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he. Nothing but the blood, the water of the Word, and the indwelling of the Holy Spirit can avail to cleanse and keep the thoughts. God's Spirit cannot rule or abide in hearts like these (v. 3, R.V.); though if we will let Him, He will deliver us, and create the clean heart and the right spirit within us.

The story of Noah tells us how God is able to deliver the godly out of temptation, and to punish those who walk after the lust of defilement (2 Peter ii. 9). It would seem that a clear warning of 120 years was given (verse 3), during which Noah preached righteousness, and warned his generation to flee from the wrath to come (2 Peter ii. 5). What a testimony the rising fabric of the ark must have been!—the subject, no doubt, of many jests and gibes, but suggestive of deep and searching inquiry. Yes, our holy life, our disentanglement from the world, our eager looking for the Day of God, constitute more eloquent appeals than the most fervid utterances. "Through whose preaching were you converted?" was asked of a young man. He replied, "Through no minister's preaching, but by my Aunt Mary's living."

SATURDAY, February 1. Genesis vii.

Do not go into God's ark alone, beloved child of God. The invitation is not to thee alone, but to all thy house with thee. "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ," said the Apostle to the gaoler, "and thou shalt be saved, and thy house." God shall give thee life for those of thy loved ones that sin not unto death, and surely whatever that phrase may mean, thy children have not sinned that sin. As the earth was once destroyed by water, so, we are told, it shall be destroyed by fire (2 Peter iii. 5-7). Let us hide in the ark of God's salvation!

The sevens of the clean beasts indicate that even then sacrifice was largely practised, and the seventh would be reserved for that purpose. I do not think it is necessary to hold that the Deluge was universal on every part of the world's surface, because similar universal terms are used in Luke ii. 1-3, in the sense of the inhabited world; but evidently the whole of the earliest seats of human life were overwhelmed, and all mankind perished, except the inmates of the Ark. Therefore the tradition of the Flood is found in every country under heaven.

What a striking expression that is, which tells us that Jehovah shut the door upon Noah and his family. He shut out the scoffing, disobedient world, He shut in his chosen; and from that invitation, Come ye into the Ark, we may surely infer that their Almighty Friend was with them inside, their Guardian and Pilot.

Free from a world of death and sin,
With God eternally shut in.

The Y.M.C.A. of India.

WE had the satisfaction of being present at the sixth National Convention of the Y.M.C.A. of India, held at Allahabad, December, 26-30, 1901.

From the report of the Indian National Council, which was read by the general secretary, Mr. D. McConaughy, M.A. (Madras), we gathered that of the 150 associations on the roll, one is in Assam, two are in Bengal, two in Burmah, four in the Central Provinces, five in Bombay, nine in Punjab, fifteen in the N.W. Provinces and Oudh, and 103 in Madras Presidency.

The history of the Association movement divides itself into two principal epochs. The first commenced with the forming of the first association at Trevandrum, in S. Travancore, about 1870. The second opened with the arrival of the first general secretary sent out by the International Committee, who landed in Bombay December 29, 1889, and soon afterwards established the Madras Association, the headquarters of the National Union, from the time of the first Convention, held in Madras February 19-22, 1891, until now.

During the first period about a score of Y.M.C.A's, of various sorts, sprang up in different sections of the country, from Trevandrum in the extreme south to Simla in the Himalayas. The principal factors in bringing them into existence were:—

1. The efforts of representatives of the C.M.S. at Trevandrum in or about 1870. 2. The evangelistic tour in 1875 of Dr. A. N. Somerville, of Glasgow, who was chiefly instrumental in organizing the Association in Bombay and several places in North India. 3. The influence of Professor Frank Sanders, of Yale University, U.S.A., then a teacher in Jaffna College, Ceylon.

The period which opened with the establishment of the Madras Association was that of consolidation and development, of recognition and equipment, of extension and deepening, and also of a marked increase of property. With the growing prosperity, multiplying expressions of approval came from high authorities in both Church and State.

The Governors of Bengal, Bombay, Burmah, Madras, and Punjab, have presided at anniversaries or other public meetings of the Y.M.C.A.; as have likewise the Bishops of Calcutta, Bombay, Lahore, Lucknow, Madras, Rangoon, Tinnevelly, Travancore, and Cochin.

The membership of 119 Associations reporting to this Convention reaches 6,754, as compared with 5,265 of 101 Associations at the opening of last year.

THE STUDENTS' DEPARTMENT.

The report of the Students' Department was read by Mr. Robert P. Wilder. In 1899 there were twenty-seven Colleges and High School Associations in India, with a membership of 990; now there are forty-two associations with 2,052 members. If the student members in city associations be included, over 2,850 present and past students are in connection with the Y.M.C.A.'s of India. In Ceylon there are three College Associations with 130 members. Total for India and Ceylon, forty-five Associations. with 2,982 members.

The work done in the Bible circles and classes is more thorough than two years ago. Twenty-three Associations report 495 members as observing the Morning Watch. By this is understood the spending of at least half an hour of every day alone with God in personal devotional Bible study and prayer.

Bible study and missionary interest show a corresponding increase both as to quality and quantity.

The chief feature of the convention was a series of addresses by Mr. John R. Mott, who has recently been visiting China, Japan, and other lands. Of one of his searching exhortations we can only give a mere outline, which, however, it is hoped may give rise to thought and action in the readers. The first bore the suggestive title of "The World-wide Young Men's Movement." [The whole proceedings will be issued in a few weeks from the Y.M.C.A. in Calcutta.]

The second of these addresses was on "The Need of More of the Evangelistic Spirit in our Movement." There were many encouraging considerations; amongst others, the numerous conversions of young men in Japan incite us to go forward.

THE EVANGELISTIC SPIRIT.

We need more of the Evangelistic Spirit because of non-Christian efforts. What tireless activity, inventive ingenuity, skilful adaptation of means to ends, giving the young men no quarter! Then the subtle and insidious spirit of unbelief which is found even among the people of God. Some seem to desire a new Gospel, as if the world required a new Jesus Christ. Nothing is more wanted than certainty of the firm grasp with which Jesus holds us. We want a new demonstration that the Gospel is still the power of God—that the Holy Spirit is able to shake the world, as He did in the days of Peter, and John, and Paul—that our faith is the victory that overcomes the world. I took part (said the speaker) some six years ago in discussions as to the truth. Some few were brought in, but I am convinced that men are not, as a rule, converted by argument, but are broken down by the Spirit.

We need more of the Evangelistic Spirit because this is an intense age. India is an intense country—intense in its desire for pleasure, for university degrees, for political preferment, for money and the power which money brings. We must have more of the power which animated the early Church if we are to arrest the forces antagonistic to Christianity.

Because the work of winning souls is incomparably the most important, the most imperative, the most enduring, of any we can have to do. Because of the inevitable fulfilment of God's laws. For example, the law that whatever we sow we shall reap. Where has there been so much sowing of the Gospel, by voice, by pen, by the printed page, as in India. There must be a reaping. The law of self-sacrifice. "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die it beareth much fruit." "I have just come from N. China, where 350 native leaders told me that of 15,000 native Christians massacred, not 2 per cent. recanted. I counted it a joy when I stood in tears by the graves of those who had followed the Lord in life and in death, to know that they must bear much fruit." The law of the certainty of answered prayer. More prayer has been made for India than for any other non-Christian country.

We rely upon the operation of the spiritual laws which are steadily lifting up this land.

DIVINE CERTAINTIES.

How is the Evangelistic Spirit to be developed?

1. Let the delegates on their return call their constituencies together, and put the plain facts before them. We must have conviction in order to definite and intelligent prayer. Take time to consider the evil and the remedy. We are so accustomed to the forces of evil that they do not affect us as they should. Missionaries have told me that heathenism does not move them as once it did. But as sure as God is in heaven there is going to be a new Allahabad, a new Calcutta, a new Bombay, a new India. Make sacred use of the imagination, to picture what may be. With anointed eyes of faith and hope, look upward to the ascended Lord.

2. Let the work of God begin with the most consecrated Christians. How? By heart-searching, by giving up self-indulgences, by giving more time each day to meditation in the Word of God, by deep humiliation in the sense of past indifference, by confession of our need of more of the Spirit of Christ.

(3) Let us give ourselves to prayer. Awakening must be the result of prayer. Weakness with men arises from weakness with God. The greatest revival that Yale University has known, began with a party of students who got up early and prayed. In Japan the principal of a college said, "There is going to be a revival," because he knew that fervent and prevailing prayer was being made. Let prayer be united. They wanted a revival, not criticism. Let it be persevering. In another university some masters and men prayed through the autumn session; but no answer came. The masters got discouraged, and gave up; but a little band held on, and God honoured their perseverance and revived his work.

(4) Remember that the Great Worker is the Holy Spirit. Men cannot convert men; even the truth cannot. It is the Holy Ghost who brings conviction of sin, and emboldens the man, when convinced, to confess Christ.

A solemn responsibility rests on every member of Christ, especially on the leaders, the pastors, &c. Think of the awful consequences if we fail to carry out the Lord's command to "go and preach the Gospel to every creature." The final condemnation is based on the charge, "Ye did it not to Me." Oh, the sinfulness of sins of omission. In view of the constraining memories of the Cross of Christ, let us deny ourselves and give ourselves unreservedly to this supremely important work.

Mr. Mott's other addresses were on "Personal Work," "To Men Only," and his closing utterance of the Convention on Sunday night was a solemn and intense appeal for prayer, full of recollections of God's faithfulness from the Bible records, from his wide reading of Christian history, and from his personal observation and experience during fifteen years of travel in the world-wide interests of young men of all nations, that through them and all other Christians the world may be evangelized in this generation.

Mr. McConaughy's exposition of the Morning Watch, and the Prayer Circle were also very valuable utterances, illustrated by personal experience. To the great regret of all, he is about to leave India and return to the United States, on account of the serious condition of Mrs. McConaughy, who met with a severe carriage accident two years ago.

It was pleasant to meet here with Dr. Henry Montgomery, of Belfast, whose address on "The Use of the Bible on the Spiritual Growth of the Individual," was much appreciated. He has come for a few months' tour for health's sake, but wherever he has gone he has found calls to such work as he loves at home, whither he returns (D.V.) in January.

The tone of the whole Convention was distinctly and deeply spiritual and devotional. The secretaries of the Y.M.C.A. in India are a splendid body of young men, representing a type not only of sanctified and devout, but of vigorous and aggressive, Christianity. They were supported on this occasion by leading clergymen and ministers of all denominations, as well as by influential Christian men, native and European. On the first evening the Bishop of Lucknow presided, and his opening words were followed by an Address of Welcome by the Hon. Mr. Justice Knox, C.S. R. C. M.

Baptist Zenana Mission.

A MEETING to take leave of five lady missionaries was held at the Baptist Mission House, on Tuesday evening last week. All of these workers had been out in China previously, but were compelled to leave the country at the time of the Boxer rising. The Committee, having been assured that it is now safe for ladies to return, have arranged for their departure for their old field of labour. They are being accompanied by the wives of several of the missionaries who are already at work.

Dr. A. PEARCE GOULD presided, and the departing missionaries addressed the meeting in turn, each expressing her eagerness to return to her work. Rev. J. S. WHITEWRIGHT, who has himself spent twenty years in China, gave a striking address upon woman's life in that great empire. Women were not treated with chivalry nor courtesy, and were taught to despise themselves. "I'm only a woman," was an exclamation frequently heard. They were in a condition of profound ignorance and darkness, and were in every way under the domination of man. He felt it to be the greatest honour in the world to have a part in the founding of Christ's Church in China. Rev. W. Brock, of Hampstead, offered the valedictory prayer. Three other applications from volunteers for work in China are before the Committee.

Missions in South Africa.

ONE of the saddest results of the struggle in South Africa has been its disastrous effect on Christian missions. In addition to labourers from this country several continental societies had strongly established themselves before the war, and were prosecuting their work with conspicuous success, flourishing especially in the two Republics. All have suffered alike, and during recent months several German missionary magazines have published articles and letters showing how completely these efforts have been paralysed.

An outstanding instance was the Hermannsburg Mission, which was especially strong in the Transvaal, having made a beginning as early as 1857, and numbering twenty-six stations on its list. The Berlin Society had in the same country twenty-seven stations, and it is believed that these two societies had gathered round them Christian communities numbering over 50,000 persons.

Month after month the missionaries remained at their posts while the clouds were thickening overhead, and the practical difficulties of the situation were baffling their endeavours. The spirit in which all this suffering has been endured has been worthy of the Gospel which the workers went to spread; and a magnificent object-lesson has been given to soldiers, civilians, and natives alike. Each of the Kaffir Wars of the nineteenth century, as well as the Boer Wars, desolated mission-stations on every hand; but in the good providence of God, Christian workers were enabled to build ever on broader lines than before. So those whose hearts are almost broken at the present state of affairs find their hope and confidence for the future in God, and have faith that out of the ruins will be built up a great and strong native and colonial church.

Interesting Meetings at Budapest.

RESPONDING to the invitation of the Evangelical Alliance, and following the Alliance programme, we have observed the Week of Prayer, and have had a refreshing season. Our meetings were arranged in union with the German Reformed Congregation, with which our Scottish Mission is closely associated, and were held on two evenings in our large mission hall, and on the other evenings in the church. The attendance was good from beginning to close. Fifteen brethren took part in addressing the people, and in leading in prayer. Many quickening words were spoken, and much earnest prayer was offered. The work among the Jews was specially remembered on Saturday evening, several members of our Mission taking part in the meeting.

On the Monday afternoon, before the opening of our prayer-meetings, we had an organ-recital in the Hungarian Reformed Church on Calvin Square, on behalf of our Schwabenberg Church Building Fund, the free proceeds of which, with donations, amounted to 1,126 crowns—about £45. I trust that we may see "The Church on the Hill" built ere long.

Persecution in Russia.—The correspondent of the Evangelical Alliance Quarterly says in a recent communication:—"The present condition of religious freedom in Russia is shown, among other ways, by the fact that, in the government of Kieff, during the present year, eleven trials concerning cases of religion have taken place, during which 144 persons have been brought before the Courts. The accused in two cases—together fifteen persons—were condemned to be fined or go to prison. At the remaining nine trials the accused were defended by a poor evangelical believer, who, during religious persecution, has obtained some practical juridical insight. In four of these cases the verdicts were in favour of the accused, and twenty-three persons were thus set free. In the five remaining cases 106 evangelicals were condemned to pay fines or to imprisonment, but through ——'s intervention their cases have been referred to higher Courts, some of them even to the Senate. There are also seventy persons accused whose cases have not yet been before the Court, but who will be brought forward in three separate trials."

Our Troops and Continental Opinion.

To the Editor of The Christian.

DEAR SIR,—There are at the present moment several Continental petitions dealing with charges against our soldiers, knocking at certain doors, but so far knocking in vain. The Evangelical Alliance, for instance, have had to refuse one such petition, but if they are all returned unanswered our fellow-Christians on the Continent may conclude that there is no answer, and the charges will go down to posterity as proven by default.

Some will point out that Lord Roberts has given an official denial. We regret to say that, outside official circles, this reply is not accepted on the Continent, but there are many who ask for a report from the Christian stand-point, and the time has come for Christian England to speak through its representative men and women.

Such questions as the origin of the war; whether it could have been avoided; concentration camps, &c.; are for the historian, and must wait. The subject before us is one of urgency, already it is causing trouble, the cleavage between fellow-Christians abroad and ourselves has begun. We venture, therefore, to call upon all who, as Christians, recognise their responsibility in the matter to communicate with us at once, with the object of forming an interdenominational Council of Christians to investigate these charges, and to report the result to those who rightly or wrongly petition some united action on the part of Christians in England.

In order that divergent opinions and sympathies may not hinder Christian fellowship, the following conditions should govern the provisional meeting we purpose calling if we receive a mandate.

(1) Every question except the personal conduct of our troops shall be ruled out. (2) Seeing that the Imperial Army is on its trial, no officer, non-commissioned officer, or soldier, shall be allowed a seat on the Council or a vote on the question at issue. Their evidence would be acceptable. (3) The proposed Council shall be authorized to collect evidence from British, Boer, or Continental sources, but only on the matter before it—the personal conduct of the troops in the field. (4) The acceptance of the invitation shall be understood to pledge the recipient not to pass outside the subject at issue.

As there will be some initial expenses, we have, to meet these, set aside a certain sum of money.—We are, yours very truly,

Soldiers and Sailors at Gibraltar.

THE Soldiers' and Sailors' Institute at Gibraltar is in needs of funds to carry out the enlargement necessary to provide more sleeping accommodation for the seamen of our Mediterranean and Channel fleets when they go ashore on leave, and to give more space generally to the refreshment and recreation rooms.

Gibraltar is becoming increasingly a naval station. The old dockyard is being enlarged to make three dry docks; when the works are completed, the port will be the chief pivot of our sea forces in the Mediterranean. The number of seamen arriving at Gibraltar is much greater than formerly. When all the ships of the Channel Fleet are in port, with about 10,000 men serving in them, the number of men given leave to sleep ashore varies between 500 and 2,000, for whom the available accommodation is wholly insufficient.

The former institution, which was founded in 1876, has done good work, but being too small for present requirements has been recently sold for £3,000, and a freehold site, well situated, purchased for £4,100. It is estimated that the new building will cost £6,000, towards which the sum of £2,000 has been received or promised. Field-Marshal Earl Roberts has approved of the scheme; and an appeal for funds has been issued by General Sir George White, Governor of Gibraltar, and other military authorities. The hon. treasurer is Colonel H. S. Clarke, Essendene, Wimbledon.

Evangelization of the Jews.

A CONFERENCE on Missions to the Jews was held in the Lower Exeter Hall, on Wednesday, last week. It was arranged by the London Society for Promoting Christianity amongst the Jews, with a view to increasing interest in the Jewish cause, and to obtain additional support for mission work among God's ancient people. Interesting addresses were given, and there was a good attendance of the Society's friends and supporters. The general subject for discussion was, "The Evangelization of the Jews in the Twentieth Century," and this was dealt with under several heads.

At the morning meeting, Rev. E. P. Cachemaille read a paper on "How best to encourage and promote the study by the clergy of our duty to the Jew." Describing his own personal experience, he said that the study of prophecy had urged and encouraged him, as a clergyman, to study the Jewish subject. Systematic study of the prophetic Scriptures, especially those of Daniel, Ezekiel, and St. John, had kindled in him a deep and abiding interest in the Jews, their past history, and their glorious future; and had enabled him to realize a definite programme of the succession of events in reference to the future of Israel as a nation.

Canon McCormick followed with a paper on "The relations of Old Testament Judaism to Christianity." He pointed out that one name for a Judaizing Christianity was sacerdotalism, which, in certain aspects, claimed to have its authority from Judaism. Hence, although it had no place in the New Testament, and had been discarded at the Reformation and eliminated from the Prayer Book, it had asserted itself again in the Church of England. In doctrine the whole system of justification by works was pure Judaism, and was a lapse from justification by grace. A right view of Old Testament Judaism is of supreme moment. It had in it "weak and beggarly elements." It was temporary, imperfect, unsatisfying; and it is more than folly to revive it in any form. It was a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, but once we are with Christ we have no need of the schoolmaster.

The second branch of the subject discussed was, "How educated English Jews regard Christianity." Bishop Ingham read a paper dealing with the best means of getting into touch with Jews, and meeting their difficulties. After dealing somewhat in detail with the present religious attitude of the Jews, he put forward some suggestions as to what should be the attitude of Christians to their Jewish brethren. He thought, first of all, they should at once and without delay recognise that an altogether new and unparalleled opportunity presents itself for influencing that people whose existence, in spite of themselves and their own view of matters, was the most astounding miracle of our time. They should also endeavour to make the acquaintance of educated Jews more than they did, to show them a little hospitality, and then gradually get some of them to consent to unconventional conferences in small circles on the subject of their ancient Scriptures.

At the afternoon gathering the chair was taken by the Dean of Peterborough, who, in a brief, opening address, referred to the great importance of specially training those who wished to engage in missionary work among the Jews. The first subject discussed was, "The supply of missionaries (Gentile and Hebrew Christian) from Universities or elsewhere." The opening speaker was Rev. Dr. Dalman, the well-known professor at Leipzig University, who, in the course of an exceedingly able paper, dealt effectively with the training of Jewish missionaries in controversy. A paper prepared by Rev. A. Lukyn Williams, vicar of Guilden Morden, on their training in practical work, was read in his absence by Rev. W. T. Gidney.

The last subject dealt with was, "The Spiritual Care of Converts," the selected speakers being Rev. E. J. Turckheim, vicar of Hale Magna, Lincolnshire, who spoke of converts at home; and Rev. A. Bernstein, B.D., who dealt with those in foreign countries.

THE COLPORTEUR IN ITALY.

I AM much interested in Gospel work in Italy. How it came about I need not tell you. The other day I met with an account of a recent "forward movement" in Italy for circulating the Bible, which gladdened me greatly. The moment I read it, I thought "that is just what the people of Italy want—God's own Word. They want to have the Bible in their own hands; to read it for themselves; to study it whenever they have a mind to do so."

At present, you know, hundreds of people in Italy have no Bible to read. Boys and girls like you cannot linger over the thrilling stories of Moses in the bulrushes, Samuel in the Temple, David the ruddy shepherd lad slaying the lion and the bear, or Jesus in the Temple reasoning with the doctors. They never had a Bible of their own. You cannot help pitying such, I am sure.

Well, to this state of things the "forward movement" intends to put an end. A leading missionary society has set about circulating the Scriptures in a much more energetic way than formerly, and with marked success.

They do it by means of a "colporteur." I wonder whether you all know exactly what that word means? It really signifies a man who carries something on his neck; and since the man who originally spent his time in circulating the Scriptures carried them in a kind of knapsack over his shoulder, he was given the name, "colporteur." You can find out very easily the two French words from which it comes.

A short time ago, then, two colporteurs, with an evangelist, a military gentleman, and a minister, started out from Rome with about 400 New Testaments, 1,000 Gospels, and 1,500 Gospel tracts. Their object was to make a tour of the towns from Frascati to Valletri, and from Valletri down the Via Appia to Terracina. Two or three days before they started bills were sent on to the places they were about to visit giving notice that a caravan of gentlemen would shortly pass through the town and sell religious books at very low prices.

At Frascati the colporteurs went straight to the market place and opened a large box of books. One of them was able to play a cornet which he had taken with him. This attracted a great crowd. Many tracts were given away, but only a few Bibles were sold.

It was then thought best to divide forces, and visit every street, entering into all the shops. Strange to say, they met with no opposition. The shops they visited were soon filled with people. In this way groups of from fifteen to twenty-five heard the Gospel preached and received the tracts, while some of them bought the Scriptures. The novelty called forth curiosity and interest.

Some hours later the whole party met together again and, on comparing notes, found that fifty four New Testaments and fifty-seven portions had been sold. Heavy rain, however, prevented more work that day. Two of the number returned to Rome, and the colporteurs continued the tour, being joined again by their friends at Marino.

From Marino they went through several other towns, and finally reached Valletri. On their way no fewer than ninety-nine more copies of the New Testament were sold, and many tracts given away. To hundreds also the Gospel was preached.

On the evening of the day they arrived at Valletri a service was held in the Mission Hall there, and the minister preached to people who seemed to drink in the Word of Life. The whole town was visited, and forty-one more New Testaments were sold.

The party then broke up, some of them returning to Rome by train. The colporteurs, however, made their way back on foot, calling at the towns they had passed through before. That which gave them much cheer was the fact that in revisiting the same people they were gladly received. All seemed pleased to hear the joyful tidings of salvation through the cross of the Lord Jesus, and again seventy-four New Testaments were sold.

It is not at all difficult, is it, to picture these scenes? Cannot you also follow the people to their homes, and imagine their joy at having a copy of the Scriptures all to themselves?

I think it is the intention of the Society of which I have spoken, to carry on this method of putting the people in possession of a copy of God's Word.

One thing you can do to further this forward movement. You can pray to God to bless the reading of the Bible by those who have so lately come to possess one. And you may be quite certain God will hear and answer the prayer.

What Jesus Wills.

A CHILDREN'S HYMN.

JESUS wills that I should pray
Every hour of every day,
Fix my heart on things above,
Live a life of peaceful love.

Jesus wills that I should praise
God my Father all my days,
Singing songs of heavenly joy,
Heedless what my hands employ.

Jesus wills that I should walk
In the Narrow Way, and talk
With my heart to Him who hears
All my sobs, and hopes, and fears.

Jesus wills that I should shine
Like a ray of light divine,
Leading men to glorify
God their Father in the sky.

Jesus wills that I should bear
Yoke, and cross, and daily care.
Looking up to Him for strength
Till all toils shall end at length.

Jesus wills that I should fight
Sin and Satan, day and night,
Wear his armour, wield his sword,
Trust, and conquer by his Word.

Jesus wills that I should win
Crown of life, and never sin,
Walk with Him arrayed in white,
In his city filled with light.

Jesus! let thy will be done,
While I live beneath the sun,
When I pass from earth away,
Then, "Thy will be done," I'll pray.

THIS WEEK'S BIBLE SEARCHER (No. 314).

WORD PICTURES.

1. This picture represents a great and wonderful workman dissatisfied with his handiwork, and surveying it with deep sorrow. He determines to destroy it, and does so in a very strange manner. (a) Who was the workman? (b) What was his work? (c) How did he destroy it?

2. This picture is a very sad one. A man high in office incurs the displeasure of his brother and sister for a certain action. They speak against him jealously, and God rebukes them, severely punishing the sister, who is the chief offender. The man pleads earnestly for his sister, and after a time God forgives her. (a) Who was the man? (b) Who were the brother and sister? (c) Why were they angry with him? (d) How was the sister punished? (e) How long did her punishment last?

3. What a strange picture this one is! We can trace dimly through the darkness of the night, the forms of a number of men who are creeping towards the camp of the enemy. All is silent, for all in the camp are fast asleep; when suddenly a great noise is heard, and a blaze of light is seen, which utterly confuses the enemy. (a) Who was the leader? (b) Who was the enemy? (c) What caused the sudden light? (d) What was the result of the expedition?

4. A man has being preaching, and being tired, departs from that place to another, hoping no one would know. But a poor woman finds him, and comes pleading with him to help her. He puts her off, but she is persistent, and at last he grants her request. (a) Who was the man? (b) Who was the woman? (c) For what did she ask? (d) How was her request granted?

Christ for the World (Psa. lxxii.).

THIS Psalm appears to have been one of fond hope and anticipation for the reign of Solomon. It was composed by his father David, and sketches the high hopes and anticipations that the aged King entertained for the young man who was entering upon so wide and important a sphere. What could David wish better for his son than that God would give him his judgments and his righteousness? (v 1). It has been said that there is no government so beneficent for men as a good autocracy. The reign of the Oriental Kings is always autocratic; but how much depends on the character of the monarch who is entrusted with unlimited sovereignty! Those Eastern lands, from the earliest times, have been cursed by the passion, tyranny, and ruthless cruelty of despots, who, without pity or thought for the misery of their subjects, have extorted everything they could lay their hands on for their own emolument. From lands fair as the hand of God could make them, one long cry of anguish has gone up to the heavens as a protest, on the part of the poor and needy, against such merciless tyrants.

In contrast to this, David sketches a reign which should endeavour to do its best for the poor, the needy, and the down-trodden; the gates of whose judgment hall should always stand open for the suitor; the sceptre of whose power should always be extended to strike down the oppressor; the might of whose throne should be used for the repairing of the wrongs and ills of men. This is surely the true ideal of the use of any power or influence with which we are entrusted. These must not be made use of for our own advantage and enjoyment, but that we may the better be able to alleviate the miseries of those around us.

It may be that you to whom these words are addressed will some day be put into positions of great trust and power. I entreat you, therefore, deeply to ponder the ideal of the true King of men here depicted, and resolve that whatever influence God may give in coming days shall be used to wipe away tears, to judge the poor, to save the children of the needy, and to break in pieces the oppressor.

Uprising from these considerations of the ideal Hebrew monarch, and the possible outcome to our own lives, let us find a true portraiture of the living Saviour, the true King of men, who from his cross has ascended the throne of universal dominion. Let it never be forgotten that the cry which prevails most with Him is that of need; that the plea which touches Him most quickly is that of the broken-hearted; that his help is extended most readily to those who have no helper. It is the touch of the hem of his garment which thrills Him, and causes virtue to go forth. A sigh, a sob, a tear, appeals eloquently to his heart. In the home, it is the tiniest and most helpless babe that gets most care; and in God's world, the greatest need prevails best with Him.

Notice the gentleness of our Saviour's reign—like a summer shower; like the light of sun and moon, that falls in gentle wavelets on the earth; like the coming of the seasons over the cornfield and the vineyard (v. 16). He does not strive nor cry, but comes to us with words of peace and love. It sometimes tries our faith to find that the Advent of our Lord is so imperceptible; but remember that in Nature the most silent forces are the strongest, as of gravitation, electricity, and heat.

Notice also the widespread power of Christ. The furthest extent of the Hebrew kingdom is used as an emblem of his (v. 8). The wild Arab of the desert; the kings of Western Tarshish, the distant islands in which Great Britain may be included (v. 10); the kings of Seba and Sheba in the distant East, may be taken as representing men of every nation, kindred, people and tribe, who shall own our Lord because they love Him, and owe to Him their salvation. It is encouraging to realize the adaptation of our Saviour's kingdom, which includes within its limits all sinful, needy souls of every race and nation, proving surely that He is God's King, the gift of divine love to the heart of man. International S.S. Lesson.

Subject: The First Persecution (Acts iv. 1-22). Golden Text: Acts iv. 12.

PLACE AND EVENTS. Solomon's Porch. A large congregation of Jewish worshippers. Peter and John preaching repentance towards God, and faith in a risen Saviour. The healed man bearing witness, by his newly-given faculties, to the power of the name of Jesus. The Temple Guard suddenly force their way through the crowd and arrest the two Apostles. (Note, Peter had been preaching God's distinguishing grace towards Israel at the very time the rulers and priests had been planning his arrest.) Peter and John were put into prison for the night. The crowd would disperse, carrying with them the truths they had received. The healed man (Mark v. 19). How was that night spent in the upper room? (Matt. xiv. 12.) Prisoners and free men could still meet at the Throne of Grace (Heb. iv. 14, 15, 16). Results prove answer to prayer (vv. 8 and 13).

(a) Who were the first persecutors of the early Church, and what their grievances?

The so-called religious leaders of the time, jealous, intolerant, and conscience-smitten. The priests considered themselves alone qualified to teach religion to the people, and felt their rights invaded by men who had received no Rabbinic training (laymen). The Sadducees opposed the doctrine of the resurrection which the Apostles preached, but which they denied. Both rebelled against the personal thrust dealt them by Peter (verses 10, 11, 12). Those from whom we expect encouragement and help are sometimes our hinderers or persecutors.

(b) Are we taught to expect persecution, and how are we to receive it?

2 Tim. iii. 12; Matt. v. 11, 12, and 44; John xv. 20, remembering "live godly" and "My sake and the Gospel's." God does not give grace for fancy crosses or Divine strength for self-wrought persecutions.

(c) What is the inevitable result of persecution towards preachers of the Gospel?

The seeds of truth are scattered over a wider area (Acts xi. 19), and bear more fruit (Bishop Ridley).

(d) What special promise was fulfilled to Peter that day, and may we expect the same experience?

Matt. x. 19. When we find ourselves in the same circumstances we may count on the same grace. But this promise does not provide against neglect of preparation for lessons or address.

2 Tim. iii. 11, "out of them all"; also ch. iv. 17; 2 Cor. i. 10.

(e) From this chapter do we get any insight into the feelings of the seventy-one members of the Sanhedrim and the Apostles when they faced each other on the morning of the great council?

On the part of the accusers, great weakness (v. 16). 1. They had no real charge to bring (21) (only the Apostles had not been to their school), asked a question instead (Matt. xii. 22, 30). 2. They could not deny the miracle. 3. They were in fear of the people (21). They were at a loss what to do, so they feebly threatened the Apostles. Policy to exclusion of equity.

They felt there was a power among them stronger than theirs (v. 13), Dan. iii. 25.

On the part of the persecuted ones. A calm confidence ("bold as a lion"), not a trace of fear even in Peter (Matt. xxvi. 69—71). They knew they stood before the chief men of the nation who were full of hatred and hostility to the name they fearlessly proclaimed, who also were writhing under an accusation they knew was true (v. 10).

The Apostles were conscious of divine power (v. 8), divine courage and wisdom (James i. 5). "Boldness," not boastful defiance, but words to the point courteously spoken. Plain speaking, faithful witness-bearing, loyalty to God, marked Peter's reply. Holy disobedience because against unholy command. Divine before human. "God first." "Cannot but speak." They had to obey the orders of their Captain. Heroes by the power of Christ.

THE NAME.

The Name that is above every name (Phil. ii. 9).
The Name of Jesus means "Saviour" (Matt. i. 21).
Salvation is by that Name alone (Acts iv. 12).
The Name of Him who loved us unto death (John xiii. 1, and xv. 9).
For that Name's sake God hears and answers prayer (John xiv. 13).
God honours it above all names (Eph. i. 21; Acts v. 31).
Men who know Him honour it above all.
Pharisees trusted in name of Abraham.
Millions trust in name of Mahomet.
We will trust in Jesus!

His Name is full of power on earth to-day. If the weakest child desires to "stand up for Jesus," and witness for Him now, the same power the Apostles had shall be his or hers for the asking in that Name.

Waifs at Play.

THE annual festival of the Young Helpers League of the National Waifs Association ("Dr. Barnardo's") is one of the most noteworthy functions of the year in connection with home missionary effort, and invariably attracts a deeply interested audience. The great gathering which was held in the Albert Hall on Saturday afternoon last was no whit behind its predecessors in brightness, in variety, or in usefulness as an object lesson in the reclamation of British waifs.

HER MAJESTY'S HOSPITAL.

The great hall readily lends itself to effects of the spectacular order, and some remarkable scenes have been witnessed therein, but seldom has it presented a sight at once so beautiful and so pathetic as when, at a cornet signal from the platform, the red coverings were drawn aside from some sixteen large and mysterious bundles in the arena, and there stood revealed sixteen cots, containing as many representatives of suffering children in a ward of Her Majesty's Hospital for Sick Waifs, in connection with the Homes. Dr. Barnardo is a past master of skilful direction and rapid change in these matters, and, after Father Christmas had made a tour of the cots, distributing gifts with open-handed generosity, a battalion of muscular lads quickly cleared the arena, and prepared the way for a bevy of little maidens in Japanese costume, who went through their musical drills and action songs with a delightful simplicity and modesty that spoke volumes for the soundness of their training in the Village Homes at Ilford.

A very effective display of physical accomplishments by a troop of lads was followed by one of those powerful recitations from Rev. Canon Fleming (who presided), which have come to be a feature of these Albert Hall festivals.

STEPNEY CAUSEWAY AT THE ALBERT HALL.

Next came an apt illustration of life in the institutions. "We have practically transported one of our homes," said Dr. Barnardo, "into the Albert Hall. Please look on and see how a day is spent." So, a troop of lads marched, or, rather, ran forward, bearing school desks, beds and bedding, plates and cutlery, and manifold other departmental appurtenances of a "Barnardo" Home. Twenty boys "fast asleep" leaped out of bed at the awakening notes of the cornet, performed their ablutions, ate their breakfasts, played games, and went to school with a business-like devotion which called forth the cordial approval of the large number of school boys in the audience.

THE PROCESSION OF TRADES.

Where all was so good it is difficult to particularize from the long series of interesting features which followed; but reference may well be made to the "procession of trades," in which each of the well-marshalled contingent carried implements or manufactured articles emblematic of the industry in which he is receiving training. A long procession of bakers, wheelwrights, tinsmiths, printers, harness-makers, tailors, and many other sturdy young toilers marched slowly round the arena, affording a striking testimony to the useful character of the instruction that is given in the labour rooms at Stepney. Finally, after further drills and well-rendered part-pieces from the assembly of charmingly-attired choir children, there came a series of views illustrative of the miseries of life in the slums, and of the progress of boys and girls from conditions of want and suffering to happy and prosperous careers in Canada. The entire proceedings gave delight to a great audience, and clearly served not merely to entertain, but to remind one and all of Christian responsibility and duty towards the waifs of our great cities.

SOME REMARKABLE FIGURES.

The latest particulars of the work show that the Association has under its care about 5,450 young people, forming, as we know, "the largest family of rescued waif children in the world."

Fresh admissions are taking place at the rate of sixty every week. From the small beginnings of the work in 1866 up to December 31, 1901, no fewer than 44,354 "unwanted" children have been saved from destitution, vice, and crime. During 1901 Dr. Barnardo dealt with 13,975 children, of whom no fewer than 2,690 were absolutely destitute and homeless. Of these, 292 were infants under five years of age; sixty-five were deaf and dumb, blind, incurable, or crippled; 115 were homeless and friendless youths, who found shelter within the walls of the labour house, and 161 were young girls in their teens, "saved so as by fire" from the black army of the city streets.

In addition, through eleven "ever-open doors" in as many provincial towns and cities, and through three lodging houses in the deeps of London slumdom, the Homes supplied 50,080 nights' lodgings, and 91,979 free meals in the year. During 1901 they also emigrated to Canada and the colonies 1,013 trained boys and girls (the largest number ever sent out in any one year), bringing up the total number of emigrants from the Homes to 12,604, of whom over 98 per cent. have proved satisfactory. Throughout last year, as has been the case ever since the foundation of the Homes, not one destitute child has been refused free and immediate admission.

Moravian Missions.

SOME of the reports lately received from stations of the Moravian Missions are of an encouraging nature, although in other fields special difficulties are being encountered.

The new mission ship in connection with the work in Labrador has safely returned from her first voyage, and has fully justified high expectations as to her suitability. The medical work of Mr. Hettasch has made good progress. The patients from among the many Newfoundland fishermen visiting the coast were very thankful for the help they received, and quite a number of those treated the year before came purposely to the missionary to express their gratitude for the medicines, &c., that had been given them. In many cases the results of the treatment could not be easily traced, since the patients were in most instances seen once and then never again, because of their departure from the station. So, too, it was with the spiritual seed sown, in season and out of season, while dealing with the patients—the watering and maturing of it has to be left to the Divine influences of the Holy Spirit.

On the Moskito Coast a change for the better has taken place in the action of the Nicaraguan authorities towards the missions. A new governor has been appointed in Bluefields, who is much more friendly than the former one.

There is still sad news from far-off Alaska. The mortality amongst the natives is almost as great as it was last year, when influenza carried off whole families of Esquimaux. This year the epidemic proves, upon investigation, to be measles. At least one-third of the population of certain districts have fallen victims.

More cheering news has come to hand from South Africa. The information sent by the German Consul in Cape Town to his Government in Berlin, and by the latter to Herrnhut, that the Mission station at Mamre had been destroyed by the Boers, proves to be incorrect. The Boers had only looted the station, but even this may put the missionaries and their people to considerable straits.

On the East African Coast a new station has been founded at Igumila, the capital of the Umyanwezi country, and the official residence of the Sultana of Msawila. Of the first service held, Mr. Stern writes: "The Queen occupied a chair next to mine on my left hand. The Bible pictures I had with me were a great help, as I was able to illustrate the deeds of the Saviour by means of them. Both chiefs and people were most attentive. A solemn silence pervaded the assembly." Mr. Stern was also able to pay visits to other districts and tribes.

The secretary of the London Association in Aid of Moravian Missions is Rev. W. Wetton Cox, 7, New Court, Lincoln's Inn, W.C.

The Rescue Society.

THE oldest organization of its kind, the Rescue Society maintains its operations with faith and energy that bear abundant fruit as the years go by. For nearly half a century the Society has pursued its useful course, and through its instrumentality thousands of women have been rescued either from careers of flagrant sin or from circumstances fraught with moral danger.

In the seven Homes, which shelter over 180 persons, a wise process of selection obtains. They are placed in separate classes, or sections, and, apart from those who evince a desire to lead a better life, those who have been "more sinned against than sinning," deceived and lured astray under specious promises, are dealt with in one institution; preventive cases are in another; girls who are specially wayward receive earnest attention by themselves; while for those who have to endure physical suffering as one outcome of wrong-doing there is a hospital where medical skill and careful nursing have worked wonders in many striking instances.

Many pathetic histories are to be found in the annals of the Society. Of these a brief selection may be given from recent records.

DRINK AND DEGRADATION.

J. was a girl with a good character for work, honest, truthful, and bright. A fellow-servant gave her strong drink, to which she was unaccustomed, and then ruined her. He disappeared, and she had to bear her burden alone. In due time she went to service, and when last heard of was doing well.

RESTORED TO FRIENDS.

B. was a girl nineteen years of age, the daughter of a small farmer. She was induced by an attractive advertisement to leave her home in the West of England and take a situation in London. There, a fellow-servant induced her to run away and, together, go to a life of sin. Happily she was soon met by a lady missionary, who took her to the Rescue Society. Her widowed mother was communicated with, and ultimately the erring girl was restored to her home.

A PERSISTENT PILFERER.

R. was the eldest of five children. Their mother was dead, and this girl, at the age of sixteen, had tired out the relatives with whom she stayed, having robbed them all. Twice she ran away from home, and was in grave danger, chiefly through her own self-will, vanity and naughtiness. She was a girl of attractive appearance, and possessed strongly marked characteristics. She gave no trouble in the Home, but, after some months stay, ran away. However, after going to an aunt, who wisely refused to have anything to do with her, she returned, and in due season was placed in a situation. There she has been over two years, and expects soon to be married to a respectable young man.

IN DOMESTIC SERVICE.

Most of those who are sheltered are, after a thorough course of training, sent out to domestic service, and many testimonies are received from ladies, who cordially recognise the earnest spirit of the women. One which is typical of many reads:—"I can never be thankful enough for the way in which —— has been cared for and trained in your Home. It has brought out all that is good in the girl, and saved her when she was on the brink of ruin. I saw her myself some weeks ago, and was most delighted with her appearance and the good character she had earned. Her letters to me have always been sensible and satisfactory, and I feel she is on the right path to an honoured womanhood."

THE POWER OF CHRISTIAN INFLUENCE.

The work, of course, is conducted on Christian principles. Many are influenced by the daily meetings for worship, and the personal advice and instruction in spiritual matters given by the matrons. A once wayward but it is believed now truly Christian girl wrote: "I am one of your girls, whom you kindly took in when she was ashamed to go to her own home, but I hope you will forgive me, as I did not behave myself as I ought to have done. I can say the past has all been washed away through the blood of Jesus Christ, and I can say with a clear heart that He has redeemed me." The earnings of the inmates of the Homes continue to show a steady increase, but the remaining balance of expenditure in connection with so extensive a work is necessarily large, and the total receipts for the past year show a considerable falling-off. The secretary is Mr. C. Stuart Thorpe, 79, Finsbury Pavement, E.C.

East London Tabernacle.

AS recently announced, Rev. Edwin H. Ellis, of Adelaide, South Australia, has settled as minister of the East London Tabernacle Church. On Thursday last he was formally "recognised" by a series of meetings. In the afternoon Pastor A. G. Brown, founder of the work, preached; after tea there was a public meeting. The attendance throughout the day was large; it must have delighted both pastor and people to witness such a rally of present and former members.

Pastor Thomas Spurgeon presided over the evening meeting, at which warm testimony was borne to the character and past work of Mr. Ellis. Letters of congratulation and goodwill were read from Revs. Dr. Maclaren, F. B. Meyer, Wm. Williams, and others, also a telegram from the late minister, Rev. Sydney J. Jones. On behalf of the diaconate, Mr. Pinney described incidents that led to the settlement. Addresses on various types of ministers and congregations were delivered by the Chairman and Dr. John Robertson; words of hearty appreciation of the new pastor were spoken by Rev. J. J. Ellis (his brother), and Rev. G. P. McKay, of Devonshire Square Church, Stoke Newington (where Pastor Ellis laboured for ten years before taking up work at Adelaide).

After a timely speech by Rev. W. J. Mayers, a brief address was delivered by the newly settled Pastor. It was a great pleasure to listen to a speaker whose voice so easily filled the large hall. Mr. Ellis said the sphere had attracted him by reason of its need and the great difficulty of the work. He liked fishing where there are plenty of fish; and for the information of members of the church and friends in the ministry, he announced his intention to stand by the old position and preach the old doctrines. These assurances were received with loud cheers; and the meeting was regarded by many as an auspicious point of departure in what it is hoped will prove a very fruitful ministry.

Aged Christian Blind.

A FEW days ago a number of friends visited the Homes for Aged Christian Blind Men and Women at Crouch Hill, and the inmates had their annual dinner of roast turkey and plum pudding. Among those present were—Revs. J. R. Wood, president-elect of the Baptist Union, Charles Brown, and J. F. Osborne, M.A. Mr. and Mrs. Bright, founders of the Home, and honorary superintendents for twenty-one years, catered well for the large party, and each of the ministers named gave an address. Since the commencement, 100 aged persons have died in the Homes, and quite recently two have passed away whose united ages amounted to 186 years. Mr. Bright said that the institution was not in debt; there had been no failure of the supplies, although less had been received in the past few days than during any Christmas since the Homes had been founded. It seems that, in addition to payments for board, or partial board and lodging, a sum of £1,200 is needed annually. The completion of twenty-one years of service is being celebrated by an endeavour to raise £800, so as to increase the sustentation fund to £3,000, the proceeds to be devoted to the meeting of extraordinary expenses.

Hope for the Erring.

A PLEASANT meeting was held on Saturday afternoon to open a new Probational Home of the London Female Guardian Society, 191, High Street, Stoke Newington. Founded in 1807, the Society has carried on an extensive and blessed work for the rescue, reclamation, and protection of betrayed and fallen young women, pointing the contrite to the Fountain opened for sin and uncleanness, teaching idle hands to labour, and restoring the penitent to society, no longer rejected and contemned, but blessed and a blessing.

Over 10,000 young women and girls have entered and benefited by the Homes of the Society, a third of the number being orphans, and many mere children. The new building consists of an enlarged industrial department and probational home, and provides additional accommodation of 800 superficial feet, with the advantage of better light, ventilation, and oversight. The total cost of the extension, including erection, furniture, and fittings, amounts to £2,250, towards which the committee have in hand £1,600. This entails the raising of £650, for which the committee rely upon the generosity of the Christian public.

Mr. F. A. Bevan, treasurer of the Society, occupied the chair. In his brief statement, Mr. D. Marshall Lang said that in the new and old buildings there is accommodation for ninety inmates. About £70 had been received that morning towards the fund, one of the London magistrates sending a cheque for five guineas.

The Bishop of Stepney said he had for many years taken special interest in that branch of Christian effort. This meeting was the opening of a new chapter of a very old story, dating from the time of Christ, when Divine compassion opened up channels of hope to our fallen sisters. It was a primary duty in such institutions as this, to see that the means of employment are as healthy, happy, and bright as possible. "We are saved by hope" should be written over this institution.

Other speakers were Prebendary Shelford, rector of Stoke Newington; Rev. R. Catterall, vicar of St. Augustine's, Highbury; and Rev. Dr. Gregory, Principal of the Children's Home.

Female Preventive Institution.

THE New Year's prayer meeting was held a few days ago in the Council Chamber, Exeter Hall, under the presidency of Mr. J. J. Drysdale, a member of the committee. There was a goodly muster of workers connected with the institution. In the course of the meeting it was stated that, although all liabilities in respect of last year had been fully met, the beautiful new laundry erected at the home at 5, Parson's Green, had not yet been paid for, and there was still a large sum owing to the bankers with regard to that work.

Mr. William J. Taylor (secretary) spoke of the abundant blessing that had rested on the work of the Society during the past twelve months, and of the marvellous way in which, at different crises, the wherewithal had been sent with which to meet pressing financial needs.

Pastor W. Fuller Gooch gave a helpful and encouraging address, in which he urged that the special work in which the Society is engaged is one which demands far more attention and sympathy and co-operation from the Church of Christ than at present it seems to receive.

Evangelical Alliance.—The current issue of the Evangelical Alliance Quarterly contains a full report of the conference held recently at Bournemouth. Readers will find the strength of the Evangelical and orthodox positions regarding Christian truth well and helpfully expressed in addresses by Revs. F. B. Meyer, Dr. Elder Cumming, Dr. Barrett, F. S. Webster, and others. There are many passages of permanent value, and the issue is well worthy of a wide circulation throughout our churches and congregations. (1d. 7, Adam Street, Strand, W.C.)

About Books.

Rev. F. B. Meyer on Moses.

THE fifth volume of Rev. F. B. Meyer's series of Scripture Biographies, which has just been published in a new and attractive form, deals with Moses, the Servant of God. (2s. 6d. Morgan & Scott.) Taking as the keynote the New Testament summing up, "By faith, Moses . . ." it is shown how truly the faith of Moses made him all that he was; while, at the same time, the steps are pointed out by which that faith was developed, and the great hope is held out to all of following in his steps. A vivid picture of "the man of God" will grow up before the mind of the reader as he passes from chapter to chapter. Penetrating under the surface, the time of fellowship at Sinai is shown to have been a period of growth in holiness. A deeply pathetic interest must ever gather round the day "when it went ill with Moses" at Meribah, and in connection with it Mr. Meyer gives us an example of searching analysis of the human heart. The true nature of sin becomes clearer as we see in the one act (1) disobedience, (2) unbelief, and (3) the spoiling of the type—"for that rock was Christ." This is a book for the heart, written in a style which the simplest can follow, and which will commend itself specially to young people.

The Bible Union Handbook and Christian Workers' Companion for 1902 contains a number of useful Bible readings, also articles on Bible study, the Deepening of Spiritual Life, and aggressive Christian work. (6d. nett. Partridge.)

Don Miguel Longas, the Spanish Reformer, is a remarkable pamphlet. (6d. Banks & Son.) The author has come ont of the Church of Rome, and he here presents his profession of faith. Translated from the Spanish by Mr. W. Greene, the pages are a timely exposure of Papal error and superstition.

The Rosa Nouchette Carey Birthday Book is a very attractive publication. It has been compiled by Helen Marion Burnside, who supplies introductory verses for every month. There is a portrait of Miss Carey, and the general get-up of the book is tasteful. (3s. 6d. Bousfield & Co., Norfolk Street, Strand.)

The Light that Lighteth Every Man. By C. J. Westlake. (1s. Partridge.) As the title suggests, this is a book about Christ—as Saviour, Teacher, King, and much besides. In eighteen chapters Mrs. Westlake presents the most glorious truths of Divine revelation, and those who read will be put in mind regarding the sublimest doctrines of the Christian faith.

A vigorous defence of prohibition as the true solution of the drink question is given in The Master Method, by Guy Hayler (6d. Temperance Institute, Rutherford Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne), who recounts his experiences during a tour of personal inquiry into the liquor problem in America. It should be read in conjunction with Messrs. Rowntree and Sherwell's advocacy of other methods of dealing with the evil.

The description of the characteristics which go to make up Royal Manhood (3s. 6d. A. Melrose) by Rev. James J. Vance, D.D., will make the book profitable reading for any thoughtful youth or young man. The graces and virtues which even the world can appreciate are shown to culminate in "a manly religion," which is much more than "a contrivance to get into heaven." In the culmination Jesus Christ is pointed to as the full embodiment of royal manhood.

The forty-seventh volume of The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit contains the weekly issues of Mr. Spurgeon's sermons published in 1901, of which the closing one is No. 2,759. The discourses were mainly preached in 1879-80, but a few are interspersed dating from the New Park Street Chapel days of 1858-59. It is needless to add, in view especially of these dates, that the sermons are full of the old fire, and the volume will be a most welcome one in many a family circle where such "books of the heart" are estimated at their true value.

Addressing himself to the needs of children, Rev. R. C. Gillie has added to the numerous sketches of the earthly life of our Lord, one with distinctive claims to attention. The Story of Stories (6s. Adam & Charles Black) is written in a direct simple style, which will appeal to youthful readers. The illustrations are mainly from mediæval sources, and the aureola and kindred features are, perhaps, more prominent than is customary in Evangelical books of the class to which this belongs.

Twenty-five special discourses, preached over a period of two years, have been brought together by Rev. W. Y. Fullerton (Leicester) in Melbourne Hall Sermons (6s. Passmore & Alabaster), of which only 100 copies have been printed. The congregation to which they were preached has been provided regularly with sound, helpful exposition of the Word of God. Again and again, too, there comes out that note of encouragement of which we have been hearing as noticeably absent in present-day preaching.

Rev. R. Menzies Fergusson, M.A., minister of Logie, has edited a very attractive devotional booklet: The Practice of Sanctification, by Alexander Hume, B.A., minister of Logie 1597—1609. (Alex. Gardner.) The sayings and precepts are richly suggestive, and tersely expressed. Similar passages from the "Imitatio Christi" are given as footnotes. It is peculiarly interesting to note, as Mr. Fergusson points out, that Bridge of Allan, the scene of an annual convention for the promotion of practical holiness, is in the parish in which Hume laboured.

It is an affectionate filial tribute that is paid by Professor Thomas C. Hall in John Hall, Pastor and Preacher (7s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton), and the work is well done. The book is a vindication of a large-hearted brave man, who was the victim of so much misunderstanding that in the end his heart broke. In two great controversies Dr. John Hall's honesty and keen sense of justice compelled him to take the unpopular side. The cases of Professor Charles A. Briggs and Hermann Warszawiak no longer occupy the public attention, but those who are personally interested will find the two stories set down here. The biographer has much else to record of a life nobly lived for and abundantly owned of God in Ireland and America; but the interest of the whole is pathetic, and the dominant note is one of sadness.

A valuable addition has been made to the Self and Sex Series—What a Young Wife Ought to Know. (4s. nett. Vir Publishing Company, 7, Imperial Arcade, Ludgate Circus, E.C.) It is from the pen of Mrs. Emma F. Angell Drake, M.D., formerly physician and principal of Mr. Moody's school at Northfield, Mass., and gained its author a thousand-dollar prize. It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of the subject. The treatment is such as a sense of delicacy and a desire for popular instruction would desiderate. Dr. Angell Drake has, in fact, produced a volume of great worth. The manner and the matter are alike good, and we heartily commend the work. To place such a book in the hands of those whom it addresses is to perform an act of kindness, which may be attended with blessing and comfort to a generation yet unborn.

A work that aims to help the cause of foreign missions by assisting those who would advocate it in public utterance is—The Missionary Speaker's Manual: A Handbook for Deputations and Workers, prepared by Rev. A. R. Buckland, morning preacher at the Foundling Hospital, and Rev. J. D. Mullins, assistant editorial secretary of the Church Missionary Society. (6s. Nisbet.) The contents are varied and conveniently classified; there is also a full index. There are hints for chairmen, preachers, and speakers; outlines of sermons and addresses; facts, figures, illustrative anecdotes, and independent testimonies. In each case the sources are indicated with precision. The concluding sections give a Missionary Kalendar associating important missionary events with the days of the month; there is also a chronology of leading events, a list of martyrs in modern days, and a conspectus of British organizations. We trust this useful work will reach the hands of many who, in the pulpit or on the platform, seek to advance the great cause of world-wide evangelization.

It is the story of a beautiful life that is given to us in Pattie C. Ekins: Her Life and Letters, by her sister. (3s. 6d. Marshall Bros.) Converted when at school, her journal and letters from that day forward were filled with the most eloquent witness to aspirations after holiness. Miss Ekins was so diligent and untiring a student of Scripture, that we are told her Persian kitten and constant companion hated both the sight of the Book and the attitude of prayer. A selection of books on holy living was always at hand, Miss Ekins considering it "her 'mission' to keep a stock of this literature wherewith to minister to friends who might not otherwise have seen it." The letters to relatives, friends, and members of her classes, all run over with evidences of her simple faith and earnestness. For her there was no possibility of mistaking the proportions of spiritual and temporal things, and out of the fulness of the heart the fingers wrote. As in every godly life growing holiness was accompanied by a quickened sensitiveness to sin, which showed itself in the oft-repeated longing after likeness to Christ. The marks of a loving hand abound throughout the book, which will be a treasure to any young Christian who is yearning after the fulness of blessing in a quiet, uneventful life. Something of the fragrance of the life has been communicated to the unpretentious volume, and we are assured that it, too, has a "mission" to not a few.

Evangelistic.

Gipsy Smith at York.

THE visit of Gipsy Smith to York had been anticipated with pleasure and confidence, and profitable services were conducted at Centenary Chapel from January 5 to 12. The chapel was filled every night, and upwards of 200 people passed into the inquiry-rooms. A good staff of workers was in attendance night by night, and the secretaries rendered ungrudging service. The preaching laid deep hold of the people, and the doctrinal statements were much appreciated. On the Saturday a "Praise and Prayer Meeting" was held, and the old chapel rang with song and testimony for nearly two hours.

Rev. James Lyall in New Zealand.

The mission conducted by Rev. James Lyall, in the course of his New Zealand tour, at St. Paul's Presbyterian Church, Christchurch, was a season of rich blessing. During the three weeks' services over 150 went into the inquiry room, and the great majority of these manifested hopeful decision for Christ. This number was largely made up of young men and women from the congregation and of senior scholars from the Sunday schools. A few, of course, came from other churches, whose ministers were duly informed. Christian people were much revived and refreshed by Mr. Lyall's ministrations, especially by the Bible readings.

Euston Theatre, N.W.

The Euston Theatre, a commodious building in Euston Road, N.W., has again been opened for evangelistic services on Sunday evenings, at 8 p.m., by Pastor D. H. Moore, of Vernon Chapel, and his helpers. The first of this new series of gatherings was held on Sunday week. A crowd had assembled before the doors were opened, and an audience of about 1,600 people assembled. The Vernon male choir and others sang from 7.30 till 8, when the service was conducted by Rev. F. H. King, of Stroud Green Baptist Chapel. Mr. Leonard Weaver gave a solemn and searching address on "Eternity," and Mr. Spencer Johnson sang appropriate solos. At the close of the meeting there were several seekers after salvation.

Mr. J. R. D. McAusland in Oban.

A series of Gospel meetings is being held in Oban in connection with the United Free Churches there, with the co-operation of most of the other ministers. The mission began in the Dunollie Road U.F. Church, and was successfully and fruitfully carried on by Rev. Wm. McAlpine, of Pollokshaws. These meetings are being continued in the Argyll Square Church. The addresses during the first week were given by some of the town ministers, when Rev. Robert Hamilton, of Grangemouth, took up the work. Widespread interest has been aroused by the singing of Mr. J. R. D. McAusland. All the churches will be refreshed by Mr. McAusland's visit. J. H.

Mr. R. S. Bradbrook at Burringham.

The friends at Doncaster Wesleyan Church, Burringham, have been experiencing a blessed season of grace during the past two weeks. The missioner, Mr. R. S. Bradbrook, has night by night both preached and sung the Gospel to well-sustained and attentive congregations. Quite a number of those for whom much prayer had been made were brought to the Lord, including a gentleman and his wife, both over seventy years of age. There were also young men and women brought to the Lord during the mission. The afternoon Bible readings were instructive, and proved a means of grace, while the patience and tact with which the evangelist dealt with the anxious and conscience-stricken showed him to be wise in winning of souls. F. S.

The Weaver Brothers at Shildon.

A united mission has been conducted at Shildon, Durham, by the Brothers Bewley and Frank Weaver. Large congregations were attracted. During the dinner hour on the Thursday a service was held in the large mess-room of the North-Eastern Railway Works, when the room was filled to overflowing. On the Saturday night all the public-houses were visited by workers, who distributed tickets for the mens' meeting on Lord's Day afternoon, the result being that the large Wesleyan Chapel was filled by some 1,200 men, who listened intently to the character sketch of "Bendigo," the converted prize-fighter. The singing of Mr. Frank Weaver, and the song services of the choir, were a strong attraction. On Saturday night last the "roll call" of inquirers was held, and despite the fact that many were engaged at business, and that the missioners had left, many answered personally, while others sent word by friends, declaring their intention to join one of the churches. This is the first united mission effort of the Free Churches, and God has wonderfully blessed it. Joseph Richardson, Secretary, Cowcaddens U.F. Church, Glasgow.

The Cowcaddens district of Glasgow may be described as a well-fished pond, as for the last eighteen years a great deal of earnest work has been carried on in it. But the streaks of the millennial dawn have not yet appeared. Public-houses, theatres, and other and unnameable factories of vice all unite in ministering to the degradation of the district, and on every hand the brands of sin are evident.

To help in saving the lost a special mission is this month being carried on in Cowcaddens United Free Church. The evangelist is Mr. William Hill, lately returned from South Africa Precious souls have been saved at the meetings, and some who had gone far astray, after having made a very public profession, have returned in penitence to the Shepherd and Bishop of their souls. A great number of temperance pledges have been taken, but the evangelist has been very emphatic on the point that "none but Jesus can do helpless sinners good."

Besides conducting open-air meetings and preaching in the church nightly, Mr. Hill has conducted a series of afternoon Bible-readings in the hall of the church, and these have proved to some of the workers a source of great refreshing. J. C.

In the Orkney Islands.

A few years ago the Christian Endeavour Societies and the Young Men's and Young Women's Guilds of Kirkwall formed themselves into a union, one of the objects of which is to arrange evangelistic campaigns every winter season. At first there was some effort at opposition, but the meetings have been greatly blessed, and large numbers added to the church.

Mr. Alexander Y. McGregor, from Edinburgh, has just finished his third visit to Orkney, holding meetings at Deerness, Longhope, Flotta, Sandwick, South Ronaldshay and Kirkwall. In the island of Flotta, quite a revival took place. Here the parish minister played the organ at all the meetings and otherwise assisted the evangelist. The meetings at Kirkwall had to be prolonged, as the attendance increased towards the end of the mission, and there were many seekers each night. The following letter from the U.F. Church minister of Sandwick (Rev. George S. Soutar) will be read with interest: "The evangelistic meetings in the South Public School have been brought to a close. They have been very fruitful. Even when the weather was unpropitious, the school was filled, and sometimes crowded. After the first week there were anxious inquirers. I have been present at a considerable number of the meetings, and I have enjoyed them very much. Mr. McGregor has delivered his message in a very effective manner. The addresses have included a pleasing variety of subjects, and they have been delivered in a pointed and fervid style. At the last meeting we took the opportunity for expressing our gratitude for the work, and also to the Orkney Christian Fellowship Union for sending the evangelist to us. It has been a time of refreshing to us, and it is our prayer that the Divine blessing may rest upon the work of the Union in other places, with all who are engaged in similar work elsewhere, and that there may be a great revival this winter."

In connection with the Central Mission Hall, Grimsby, evangelistic meetings are proving fruitful. Some hearers have been won for the Lord Jesus Christ.

Mr. Albert Harrison has conducted a mission at Williamson Street Primitive Methodist church, Hull, with encouraging results. The building was filled, and there were many inquirers.

Mr. William Forbes' recent meeting at Liverpool for theatrical women was well attended by dancers from several places of amusement. After tea hymns were sung, and Archdeacon Madden gave an earnest address, which was attentively received.

Mr. W. R. Lane commenced at Llandrindod on Lord's Day, January 12, a mission which by the time these lines appear will have been concluded. The opening service at the Victoria Hall was attended by such a large congregation that the succeeding meetings were arranged to be held at the Albert Hall. The mission had the hearty sympathy and co-operation of the local ministers.

Rev. Jesse Mayo has concluded a fruitful fortnight's mission in Skelmanthorpe, a large manufacturing village in the West Riding of Yorkshire. The services have been well attended, and some notorious characters of the village decided for Christ. A band of Christian young men heralded the mission by street processions, singing well-known hymns and exhorting the people to attend.

Rev. F. C. Spurr has concluded a series of encouraging mission services in connection with the Lincholm and Lydgate Baptist churches, Todmorden. The meetings were largely attended throughout. Two addresses were delivered to men only; a children's service was conducted, and Bible readings were given on two afternoons. A deepening of spiritual life has been experienced, and several of the unconverted accepted the Saviour.

A New Year's mission has been held in connection with the Baptist Church at Lewes. The attendance throughout was encouraging, and the interest well sustained. The mission has been under the direction of the Pastor (Rev. J. P. Morris), who conducted the first two meetings, the others being led by members of the church and Christian friends. The series of meetings closed with an earnest appeal to young men by the pastor from Prov. i. 10.

An eight-days' mission was held at the Bethel, 19, Old Gravel Lane, E., by Mr. J. H. Thompson January 5-12. Night by night the interest was maintained. Many who came to the opening of the mission were with us the whole of the time. We rejoiced in seeing some decide for Jesus. Believers were blessed, the Bible readings being well enjoyed. The meetings were much helped by the hearty co-operation of the "Christian Lifebuoy" Band, who assisted in the singing. E. L. Collins.

A ten-days' mission has been conducted at the Baptist Church, Amersham, Bucks, by Mr. G. Hunter. Very encouraging results have followed. A special feature was a men's meeting on the Sunday afternoon, which was well attended, and on the last evening a limelight lecture was given on "The Holy Land," when the building quite filled. The congregations were larger than they have been for many years, and the earnest spiritual appeals have borne fruit in awakening sinners to anxiety of soul. To Christians the mission has also been blessed in causing them to unite to forward the work.

Requests for Prayer.

For an evangelistic mission at Blaenavon, commencing January 26.

For services at Roos, Hull, on January 26, and at Keyingham on February 2 and 9.

For blessing on a mission to lads at St. James' Memorial Hall, Bath, beginning on January 26.

For blessing on meetings at the Soldiers' Home Winchester, January 26-February 5, by Mr. T. M. Wintle.

For the Victoria Homes for Men (Commercial Street and Whitechapel Road, E.) that the large numbers of poor men who find a home there may be spiritually impressed. Friends are also asked to join in praise for the blessing which has rested upon the work hitherto.

Personalia.

The venerable Rev. Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler has attained his eightieth birthday. Since his retirement from active pastoral work, Dr. Cuyler's activity has been, if anything, greater than before. Whatever slight diminution there has been in his preaching, has been more than compensated by an increased activity in writing for the religious press.

General Booth's daughter, Mrs. Booth-Tucker, who, with her husband, is in charge of the American section of the Salvation Army, has been lying dangerously ill in New York. Later reports are of a more encouraging character, but the esteemed lady remains very weak. Mrs. Booth-Tucker will be remembered by a wide circle of friends in this country as Miss Emma Booth, formerly in charge of the women's side of the International Training Homes at Clapton.

Dr. Henry and the Jubilee Singers.

THE earnest discourses delivered on Lord's Day last by Rev. Dr. J. Q. A. Henry, at Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road, S.E. (Rev. F. B. Meyer's), could not fail to revive the deep interest created in October last by the large and enthusiastic meetings at the Metropolitan Tabernacle.

Large congregations came together at Christ Church both afternoon and evening, and heard Dr. Henry's forceful and telling words with much profit. In the afternoon Dr. Henry preached on Two Personal Aspects of the Temperance Problem, based on the words, "That putteth thy bottle to his lips"—the welfare of the individual demanding total abstinence, and his example being required for the good of others. In the evening the text was Gal. vi. 9, 10, "Let us not be weary in well-doing, for in due season we shall reap if we faint not. As we have, therefore, opportunity, let us do good unto all men." The subject was Opportunity and Importunity, with reference to the solution of the temperance problem.

OPPORTUNITY, SERVICE, SACRIFICE.

The point of the evening's address was that no such opportunity for fighting the monstrous drink curse ever existed as confronts the people to-day. The resources exist with which to repress and suppress the evil. It remains to be seen whether the spirit of sacrifice and self-denial, in the interests of others and for the Master's sake, will be forthcoming to complete the right angle triangle of a great social and spiritual victory. Opportunity—the base line; service—the perpendicular; sacrifice—the long line (or hypothenuse) of God's triangular truth, by which He would solve this problem of strong drink.

After noting the three great laws of life, Dr. Henry considered them in relation to the evangelization of the world; the redemption of the city; and the solution of the drink problem. So far as (1) the missionary problem was concerned, it was observed that the doors are all open, that there are multitudes of workers ready to go, but that the spirit of self-sacrifice in providing means for the promotion of world-wide evangelism is lamentably wanting. For (2) the redemption of the city we are also face to face with a magnificent opportunity as well as an imperious obligation; the Christian citizens have it in their power to save the cities and thereby the people, but it remains to be seen whether they possess the courage and the consecration to make the most of this splendid privilege. As regards (3) strong drink—what are we, as Christian people, doing with this opportunity? Are we making the most of it? What are we, as individual members of the body of Christ, doing? What have we done? Do we abstain? Have we systematically and with our money helped forward the work? Have we cheered those who are standing on the firing line and bearing the burden and heat of the day? What have we done for the sake of Christ and humanity, in order that the opportunity may be seized and employed for the salvation of men and the enthronement of Christ?

In the course of some cordial remarks, Mr. Meyer spoke of Dr. Henry as a man sent of God to arouse the Christian conscience to the evils of the liquor traffic, and to lead forward the movement for the solution of the problem involved.

FUTURE ARRANGEMENTS.

The Nottingham campaign of Dr. Henry and the Fisk Jubilee Singers commences to-morrow (Friday) with a reception in the Exchange Hall, for which invitations have been issued by those tried supporters of Gospel Temperance work, Alderman and Mrs. Mellors. The Nottingham programme is a varied one, and the meetings will be continued until January 30. Subsequent fixtures are Dublin (Metropolitan Hall), February 1-9; St. Albans, 18-20; Chelmsford, 24, 25; Ipswich, 26, 27; Leicester, March 14-21. Negotiations are in progress concerning May.

The Churches.

Church of England.

As a memorial of the late Rev. Alfred Peache, a fund is to be raised to provide means by which a larger number of candidates for Holy Orders may be trained at St. John's Hall, Highbury, N. The council appeals for £30,000. It will be remembered that St. John's Hall was founded in 1864 by Mr. Peache and his sister, Miss Kezia Peache.

The Bishop of Liverpool during his recent visit to the Midlands addressed a large congregation of Sunday-school teachers and other Church workers at St. Nicholas's, Worcester. Dr. Chavasse said he believed that people as a whole were never more willing to listen, never more willing to be impressed than they are at present; but an easy-going church, an easy-going worker, will never impress them.

The total receipts of the Bishop of London's Fund in 1901 amounted to £28,795 16s. 1d., as against £26,744 9s. 7d. in the previous year, being an increase of £2,051 6s. 6d., although there was in 1900 one munificent contribution of £7,000 for a special object. There was an increase of £1,179 under the head of subscriptions, donations, and church collections, and of £4,836 on account of legacies. There was also legacy of £3,000 specially for increase of endowments.

Congregational.

Mr. Charles Messent, of Hitchen, has undertaken the lay pastorate of the church at Baldock, near Hitchin. For several months past he has conducted special services for the people in the Town Hall, which have been attended with crowded congregations. The erection of a new church in place of the present one, which is in a dilapidated condition, is contemplated.

The attendances at the Wednesday dinner-hour services at Bishopsgate Chapel, E.C., has been so encouraging that a Tuesday service is also to be held for the future. Dr. Clifford, who conducted four midday services in the chapel during the Simultaneous Mission, was so impressed with the possibilities of such services that he is generously giving his help for the four Tuesdays in February.

A scheme for a South-East London United Congregational Mission has been promulgated, and is under consideration. The proposal is that seven churches be invited to federate, and that a minister be appointed for each centre at a minimum salary of £200 a year, one of whom shall be superintendent of the mission. Each centre is to provide its own incidental expenses, and to return three deacons to the Governing Council.

Rev. William Howell accepted, in November, 1900, the pastorate of St. John's Wood Church for twelve months without any guaranteed stipend, and the arrangement held good up to the close of last year. At the last Church meeting Mr. Howell was heartily thanked for his past services, and cordially invited to accept the pastorate permanently, the church promising to endeavour to increase the income. During the year the church and lecture-hall have been renovated, while progress has marked every branch of the work.

Writing from the "Parker Social Betterment centre," Newcastle-on-Tyne, Rev. G. Trotter Carr says:—"As pastor and deaconness, while for ten years in Canada and the United States, my wife and I assisted in "Social Betterment Service." I resigned my church in Stratford, Ontario, and returned to England expressly to engage in similiar social service. With this in view we have come back to Newcastle. To this form of service for the Master and the masses we can specially devote ourselves, as I am not seeking a regular pastorate."

Baptist.

The total amount received by Rev. J. H. Shakespeare, M.A., for the Twentieth Century Fund, up to January 11, was £140,719 9s. 4d.

Pastor Charles Spurgeon, of Greenwich, has been confined to his bed with a severe attack of influenza, but he is now, it is hoped, on the road to recovery.

In connection with Union Chapel, Crockenhill, Swanley, Kent, efforts are being put forth in the interests of young men. A coffee-house where a young men's club was held having been closed, Rev. J. H. Marshall, in order to supply a counter attraction to the public-house, took the responsibility of securing an iron room. The erection is put up on land belonging to the church, and will become church property at the end of about seven years. The work is making good progress. The new room, with furnishing expenses, will cost about £80.

Methodist.

The sum of £21,053 has been promised towards the £25,000 which it is proposed to raise in connection with the Bible Christian body, as a Twentieth Century Thanksgiving Fund.

Canon Henson is to address the Wesleyan Ministers' Meeting for London at Wesley's Chapel on Monday, the 27th inst. The subject of the address will be "Reunion by Intercommunion." Rev. F. W. Macdonald is to respond.

Presbyterian.

The need for establishing an industrial home in connection with the Jewish Mission at Whitechapel, where converts could be received and trained, was brought before the Presbytery of London North on January 14, by Rev. H. Falconer, of Notting Hill. He also spoke of the success which is attending the work of the mission. There is, he said, a remarkable religious movement amongst East London Jews at the present time.

At Cheltenham the session of St. Andrews have been conducting a three days' mission in connection with the village church at Gotherington, which is under their charge. The services have been directed by Rev. W. Harvey-Jellie, and there has been much blessing and quickening at the outset of the New Year's work in the village. The whole work is being reorganized, and several new organizations are in hand to aid spiritual life among the villagers.

In connection with the Calvinistic Protestant Union, a lecture was delivered on January 10, by Mr. H. M. Barnett, at the Gospel Room, 108, High Road, South Tottenham, upon "Christian Teachings of the Roman Catacombs." The lime-light views invested the important evidential subject with special interest. There was a good attendance, and deep attention was paid. The address of the Union is 74, Strand, W.C.

Fallen Asleep.

The death of Rev. J. F. Parrish, of Keighley (Primitive Methodist), is announced. He travelled forty-two years, chiefly in the Leeds and Bradford Districts, and was superannuated in 1900. His ministry was remarkably owned of God in the conversion of sinners.—At Tunbridge Wells, Rev. E. M. Barry, for thirty-nine years vicar of Scothorne, Lincoln, aged eighty-two.—At Harrogate, Rev. J. M. Pollock, LL.D., late vicar of Cundall with Norton-le-Clay, Borough Bridge, Yorkshire, aged seventy-six years.—On January 12, at Fobbing, Essex, Rev. W. S. Thomson, rector of the parish, aged eighty-four.—Mr. H. Stevenson, for twenty-one years singing master at Stockwell Orphanage.—The West London Mission has suffered a great loss by the death, at Highgate, of Sister Edith (Miss Edith Mary Gresham, of Hull, a niece of the late Dr. Punshon). For many years she was a valued worker in the slums of West London, and commenced the "workhouse teas" for the old folks from St. Pancras Workhouse. She was also a Guardian of the Poor.

Welsh Notes.

THE annual meeting of the Cardiff Evangelistic Society was held on Thursday, January 16. The chairman in his opening address was able to report progress. A building fund has been started to provide for a new mission building. The financial position of the Society, according to the report of the treasurer, is a favourable one.

The Pembrokeshire monthly meeting of Calvinistic Methodists has taken action in connection with the adoption of unfermented wine for Holy Communion. A letter has been sent to the churches of the county strongly urging the use of non-intoxicating wine in the Lord's Supper. In the letter the statement is made that many would never have known the taste of alcoholic drink "were it not for the wine they take at the Lord's Table."

Mr. Howard Evans, of the Liberation Society, has just completed his annual statistics of Welsh Nonconformity. These figures have reference to Wales only, and do not include Welsh churches in England. The Welsh Congregationalists head the list with a membership of 147,753. They are followed by the Calvinistic Methodists who number 141,799. The membership of the Welsh Baptists is 109,149; that of the Wesleyans 43,733. Other denominations add a total of 10,047. Thus the various Welsh Nonconformist bodies have between them a membership of 457,481, an increase of over 7,000.

Irish Notes.

AT a meeting of Methodists held in Donegall Square Church, Belfast, last week, a resolution was unanimously carried, protesting against the establishment of a denominational university in Ireland, and urging the continuance and improvement of the Royal University upon a non-sectarian basis as being the best adapted to the circumstances of the country.

A meeting of representatives of the Methodist New Connexion and of the Irish Methodist Church has been held in the Methodist College, Belfast, for the purpose of discussing the question of the Irish Methodist Conference taking over the work of the Methodist New Connexion in this country. The proceedings were private, but it is understood the matter was fully and freely considered, and that each body of representatives will report on the subject to their respective Conferences. There are only about half-a-dozen congregations of New Connexion Methodists in Ireland.

Young Women in London.—Accommodation for twenty-three young women is provided in the home recently opened at Princess House, 4, Egerton Mansions, Brompton Road, S.W. Miss Du Cane, the lady superintendent, will welcome correspondence with girls who may be coming from the country to business in London, and who may be anxious to know of a cheap and comfortable home conducted on Christian lines. Prebendary Webb-Peploe takes a deep personal interest in the Home, and warmly commends it.

The Christian.

☞ To avoid delay it is requested that all letters relating to business matters should be addressed to the firm, Messrs. Morgan and Scott, and not to its individual members. Letters of a personal nature should in every case be so marked.

Communications for THE CHRISTIAN should be addressed to the Editor, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C. All Advertisements should be sent to Messrs. John Haddon and Co., Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

☞ The Publishers request that all orders for THE CHRISTIAN by post, and remittances for same, be addressed to "THE CHRISTIAN" POSTAL DEPARTMENT, BOUVERIE HOUSE, SALISBURY SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

Cheques and Post Orders to be made payable to Messrs. John Haddon and Co. at that address. (For Subscription rates, see Page 1 of Cover.) Postcard or stamped envelope should be enclosed if receipt is desired.

Notes & Comments

"The Church and the Children." In answer to inquiries from many of our readers, we are pleased to announce that the very helpful series of articles on this subject which are appearing in our pages will shortly be issued in pamphlet form. (Price 2d.; in quantities for distribution, 12s. 6d. per 100, Morgan & Scott.) We hope our readers will give generous aid in circulating these excellent articles among Sunday-school teachers and all who labour for the salvation of the young.

The Decline of Church Attendance. Our readers will be glad to know that in our next issue will commence a series of articles upon this important subject from the pen of Dr. Guinness Rogers. Probably no living writer is better qualified than Dr. Rogers to deal with it, and we confidently bespeak the prayerful and earnest consideration of our readers for his lucid treatment of a pressing and timely topic.

Our Donation List. We regret to learn that an impression has got abroad that commission is charged by Messrs. Morgan & Scott upon the amounts entrusted to them on behalf of Christian and philanthropic institutions. For the information of our readers and all concerned, we take occasion to say that this is an entire mistake. Messrs. Morgan & Scott have, on the contrary, esteemed it a privilege to be allowed to transmit the large donations committed to their care every week for the last thirty years and more, they themselves bearing all expenses attached thereto, so that every Mission receives the full amount sent by the donor without any deduction whatever.

A New Plan for Bible Study. Those who recall the instructive and helpful meetings for Bible study held by Professor W. W. White a year or two back, will read with interest his account of a new departure, given on page 16. For Christians thus to open their homes for the spiritual help of others can only redound in blessing to themselves. We hope that many of our readers will try it, and we shall be pleased to report results from time to time.

A Strong Indictment. Rev. and Hon. W. E. Bowen has compiled a remarkable volume in regard to the Ritualist movement, and has sent a copy to each member of the Houses of Parliament. Unfortunately, however, it is stated that the book is not intended for sale, which is to be deplored, as it summarises in a very striking manner the evidence, up to quite a recent date, supporting a twelve-count indictment against Ritualism, all taken from manuals of devotion purchased this year, or based upon services held since last August. The unmistakable Romish tendency of the movement is only too apparent from the startling quotations and statements, and it is to be hoped that the book may not be without its effect in educating the political mind.

Domestic Legislation. It was a great disappointment to find that the King's Speech contained no reference to the pressing question of the housing of the working classes. It was a foregone conclusion that the amendment to the speech, in which the question of housing was brought forward as a challenge to the Government, would be rejected. Parliamentary procedure means this, since an amendment is regarded as an opposition attack upon the Government. It is a great pity that such a burning question should be mixed up with party politics, and so shelved. We trust that the other movement, so ably headed by Dr. Macnamara, on behalf of the child toilers of the kingdom, will receive the attention of the entire House. The facts recently collected by certain London papers are such as to demand immediate legislation for the protection of child toilers.

Pity the Poor Publican! The promise of temperance legislation, given in the King's Speech upon the reopening of Parliament, may be taken for just what it is worth at the hands of an Administration which appears to be in strong sympathy with the drink interest. Parliament, however, is exactly what the electors choose to make it; and as public opinion all over the country is rapidly concentrating upon the pressing need there is for prompt and drastic Bills dealing with the terrible national evils flowing from the drink trade, the Government can be forced into an attitude less subservient to the brewer and his satellite the retailer.

Grocers' Licences. A well-informed and sane article appeared recently in the Daily News concerning the vexed question of Grocers' Licences. The Minority Report of Lord Peel's Commission made certain recommendations which are entitled to grave consideration, but the column in the Daily News marshals its facts so well that ordinary people cannot fail to be impressed with the need for a change in the law. There ought to be no two opinions as to the justice of putting the granting of grocers' licences into the hands of the licensing magistrates. Misconduct in the use of the licence should also subject it to forfeiture. In this respect no difference ought to be made between purveyors of drink in public-houses or in grocers' shops. This is simple justice all round. In particular we heartily endorse the sentence in which the writer says:—

> Any shopkeeper guilty of misdescribing the goods he sells—serving a customer with drink and calling it tea, or biscuits, or jam in the bill—should be deemed to be acting in a manner which would preclude his being considered a respectable tradesman to whom it is safe to grant a licence.

All the world knows to what a frightful extent this maldescription of goods has been carried, in order to hoodwink husbands and friends.

Drink's Death Rate. In a very remarkable pamphlet on National Intemperance as illustrated by the National Records, Dr. Wm. Carter, of Liverpool, bases upon a sketch of the history of preventive medicine in England some unanswerable arguments in regard to grave omissions from the legislation bearing upon the drink traffic. Dealing with the last three decades of the nineteenth century, Dr. Carter shows how, until 1872, the death-rate for the whole country remained at about 22·5 per 1000, but no sooner had the country been divided into districts under the supervision of a qualified person to inquire into causes of preventible disease, and to attack and destroy them, than a change commenced, with the result that the average death-rate has fallen to 17·2 per 1000, in nine out of the ten groups of diseases; in the tenth, however, there has been an increase; but it is due to the fact that deaths from intemperance are included in it. Although the majority report of the Royal Commission commences with the astounding statement that "actual drunkenness has materially diminished in all classes of society during the last twenty-five or thirty years," it is the fact that the death-rate directly caused by intemperance has exactly doubled during the last quarter of a century. Looking at the beneficial results that have followed legislation in regard to infectious and other diseases, and to prevent premature death, Dr. Carter sweeps on one side the assertion that one cannot make people sober by Act of Parliament. Unhappily, it is only too evident that people can be made drunkards by it.

A Strong Measure. We are glad to see that the London County Council has taken a firm and decisive step in the direction of suppressing the street betting nuisance. The Home Secretary has approved of the new bye-law, under whose provisions persons offering for sale in the streets any papers giving information as to the probable result of any race are liable to a fine of £5. It is a sharp measure; but it is absolutely necessary. We are quite aware, as one paper informs us, that people cannot be made good by Act of Parliament; but the authorities have the right and the duty to minimize all facilities for doing wrong. If the authorities of other large centres of population would follow the example of the L.C.C., a great benefit would be gained on behalf of public morality.

Debauching the Chinese. "Poppy cultivation is driving out wheat growing round Foochow, China. Opium producing pays very much better." Such is the bald statement made in the daily Press, but alas, how much it leaves unsaid! It means the ruin of the bodies and souls of men; it means that the producer becomes rich at the expense, perhaps, of a multitude of his fellows; it means that it "pays" to debauch the people, regardless of the debt incurred thereby to the God of the downtrodden and the oppressed.

The Deliverance of Africa. It is remarkable that the continent of Africa, nearest of all dark continents to civilized lands, has been broken up so rapidly during a comparatively short period. It seems but yesterday that the African map was sparsely covered with the names of cities; to-day the chart is black with the names of discovered places. Many of the old abominations have been swept away; highways have been opened, railways built, commerce established, and the Gospel is preached. The account of the recent expedition against the Aros—in West Africa—reveals, however, how terrible is the degradation of many of the natives, and how great is the need still both for civilization and evangelization. If it is really true that the "long Ju-ju" has been captured by our troops, there is great cause for thankfulness, for this filthy abomination has terrorized native tribes for hundreds of miles around. There should be a fine opening now for the Gospel in that part of the Dark Continent.

A Channel for Wealth. American millionaires are certainly offering an excellent example of generosity in the matter of providing education for the United States' citizens. During the last three years—ending with 1901—no less a sum than thirty-three millions of pounds sterling has been contributed by wealthy people for the founding and endowment of universities and colleges. It is a remarkable sum of money, to which the attention of our own wealthy people may well be drawn by way of example. With our present system of higher education, it is next to impossible for the majority of sharp boys belonging to the lower middle classes to equip themselves fully—the University expenses being entirely beyond them. If some of our own rich people would—for their country's sake—make it possible for really capable boys to perfect their powers, especially along Christian lines, as at Mr. Moody's Northfield and Mount Hermon Schools, they would do enormous good. The country needs increasingly, in every department, men capable both in brain and heart. Wherever such are found, they should be developed and used.

The Triumph of Archæology. We have often expressed our conviction that the evidence furnished by archæology to the truth of the earlier portions of the Bible is destined to outweigh and triumph over literary criticism. The latter is always uncertain, and as much can be said against it as for it. But the evidence of ancient inscriptions and monuments is conclusive. When we find upon Egyptian bricks and papyrus the very name of Potiphar, the mention of a seven-years' famine, and numberless other striking things which absolutely confirm the Bible narrative, we have good ground for repelling the mere opinion that the early portion of the Bible is not historic.

Dangerous Indifference. Dr. Gow, in his presidential address to the Headmasters' Conference, touched on a feature of English life which seriously complicates the educational situation :—

> The people of this country are notoriously not docile; but that is of little importance. The Scotch are even more indocile; but they love learning, and teach themselves. The English, on the other hand, or a great part of them, and especially those who set the fashion, do not love learning at all, and will neither learn nor teach themselves. It is impossible to make such a people intelligent and industrious by Act of Parliament. What is lacking is a general pleasure in the exercise of mental energy, a desire to learn, and an interest in processes of learning.

In view of this observation it is no use to lay the blame of the backwardness of the nation in educational matters at the door of our legislators. Unless the people are in love with knowledge, good laws will not make them intelligent and learned. Good schools ultimately depend on good scholars as much as on good teachers. Parents in shaping their children's ideals have more to do with the result than is generally acknowledged.

The Platform and the Study. The President of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference lays great stress upon the need in the present day of cultivating the contemplative life. Not only is it necessary to strengthen the intellectual side, but prayer and thought also should be given a due place in the daily round. Dr. Davison urges that—

> A Church which aspires to lead and teach the world cannot hope to succeed simply by reason of the possession of a warm heart, a ready tongue, and active business habits. Brain, hands, and heart must combine—

if there has to be success in an age which is both thoughtful and active. The advice certainly is timely in view of the growing tendency to expend the energies in one direction only. There may be hurry even in religious work, and it is sometimes overlooked that in one of his most comforting assurances God promises not only his presence, but also the Divine gift of rest. Christ's equalization of the faculties omitted nothing (Mark xii. 30, 31).

The Influence of the Zeitgeist. The presence of that influence which Germans call the Zeitgeist, or Time-spirit, is a call to all earnest people to put on the whole armour of God. There are few things more subtle, more insinuating, more fatal to the spiritual life, than this Zeitgeist. An openly-avowed and vulgar attack upon Faith has little chance of success with the majority of Christians. It is known to be an enemy's challenge, and it is treated accordingly. But the doubting and materialistic spirit of our age is around us like the deadly miasma on the Campagna of Rome. Nothing is seen, no challenge is offered—and yet the soul is silently enwrapped by an influence which, wherever it penetrates, means death. It is so easy to be caught in its deadly embrace. The only effectual remedy against its inroads is for the soul to be possessed by the Spirit that is above the time-spirit—i.e., the Holy Spirit of God. As the Spirit of Eternity possesses us, we have in the inner citadel of our being a force against which the fickle time-spirit beats in vain. "We look, not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal."

Guarding the Deposit. A learned writer extols the training in the German Theological Seminaries, partly on the ground that greater breadth is gained among German students than amongst our own :—

> The student can become acquainted at first hand with all possible theological tendencies. . . He may feel the stimulus of the meeting of different views—Ritschlians and Traditionalists, Biblicists and Moderates. This gives a breadth of outlook and a freedom from prejudice as well as an earnest striving to "test all things, and hold fast that which is good."

Later in the article, the same writer expresses his desire to "save our colleges from the irreligious taint which spoils German theological schools." Theological students need a broad foundation, and they must be made aware of what men are saying concerning their faith. But to hurry students from school to school where contradictions are heard, and then to imagine that young men will emerge with a definite faith, is to misunderstand the human mind. The Apostle's advice to Timothy is better, "Guard the deposit." The Gospel is a precious deposit secured in every way, to the mind and the heart. It is not teaching crystallized out of the floating nebulæ of various schools.

The Colonist and the Native.

SOME weeks ago we quoted from the Rhodesian Herald to show the burning desire of a certain class of colonist to place his heel on the neck of the native—and to keep it there, or else to wipe him out. The writer therein openly defended the murder of black by white. Here are some more of his instructive views :—

> Influences seem at work undermining the status of the colonist in this and other countries of South Africa. Exeter Hall—that monument of modern humbug—seems to be gaining some secret hold on the Imperial Government.
> For weeks past, the columns of the great Ministerial papers have been open to the abuse of the Boer treatment of the native. No revilings have been too bad, so long as they pointed the moral of Dutch iniquity. We are now paying for these excesses. "If the old Transvaal and Free State were brutal to blacks, we must be kind in contrast." If, however, they were no more than wise and just, our contrast is likely to be something foolish.
> Being made of "sterner stuff," the majority of South Africans will decline to be guided by theorists and canting visionaries. Kaffir indolence and insult will goad the settler to action, and in his effort to be free he can hardly be trusted to select the most gentle way, if, indeed, he will be in the mood to consult any but his own feelings.

The Central African Times (Blantyre) dissents mildly from "the bald statement as given in the above article" (from which it quotes), but goes on to say :—

> The main contention of the Rhodesian Herald is one with which we are entirely in accord, and that is, that mere theorizing on the part of stay-at-home people can never solve the labour problem
> However much we may feel for the natives, we cannot set aside the fact that the methods of treatment can only be arrived at by those who are in immediate contact with them, and not by cranks at home who have not had an opportunity of seeing real Africans outside the limits of Earl's Court shows, &c.

Here is the "bald statement" referred to, as reproduced in our issue of December 12 :—

> We regret that men should be hanged anywhere for shooting natives, whether in cold blood or not. There will rarely be shooting without extenuating circumstances, and, striking an average, we are bold enough to maintain that the Mosaic exchange of a life for a life is a one-sided affair where white pays for black.

It is for combating such an atrocious sentiment as this that Christians at home are called cranks, canting visionaries, and Exeter Hall humbugs. Clearly there is hard work to be done in checkmating the obvious intention of certain colonists to enforce slavery at the mouth of the revolver. Let Christian members of Parliament note especially the admission that "the settler cannot be trusted," &c.

We are fully alive to the difficulties with which the Native question bristles. Missionaries, as well as settlers, bear witness to the absence of moral instinct in many tribes; but the missionaries also note what many colonists conveniently ignore—that all natives are not to be classed in the same category. There are tribes in which the moral and intellectual senses are far more highly developed than in multitudes of unhappy, ill-conditioned whites at home. It is obviously unjust to class them all together as mere tons of black humanity.

The way to remedy their deficiency is not to "shoot them in cold blood," but to exercise the grace of patience in teaching them the more excellent way, and this is why Christian missions should be ever in the van of advancing civilization.

The natives need to be taught the restrictions of the Gospel, as well as its liberties. Freedom from the terrors of fetishism must lead, not to licence, but to obedience to the laws of God. And Britishers in the Colonies must set the example of obedience to those laws, if the native is ever to be made an effective and trusty aid to the white man's progress.

Practical Papers.

On "SOUR GRAPES."

THERE is an old fable, familiar to us all, about the "Fox and the Grapes." A fox one day found himself beneath a vine, in which sat an old crow, surrounded by the luscious fruit. Hot and weary, he appealed to the bird to bring him down some grapes to slake his thirst; but the crow knew well that his own neck would be in danger, and declined. Wherefore the fox declared, "The grapes are not worth having; they are bitter, they are sour." But the sourness was in his temper, and the bitterness in his own soul. There was no fault in the grapes, which were pleasant to the eye and refreshing to the taste; the fault lay in himself. Here, then, is a creature of God reviling a useful and pleasant fruit, for the only reason that he could not partake of it.

But there are men all around us who charge the Almighty with injustice, who complain of his providence, who reject his offers of mercy, not because they cannot, but because they will not, share them. As in the times of Israel, so now, men blame God for all that goes amiss; and when the blessings of Christianity are placed before them they deliberately refuse to enjoy them. Then they pronounce Christianity a failure, Christ an impostor, and God a myth, arguing to-day that "there is no God," and, with curious inconsistency, to-morrow maintaining that He is the responsible Author of all the ills that flesh is heir to.

The crow is generally considered a dull and unattractive bird, gloomy of colour, and unmelodious of voice. The fox, on the other hand, is rather a good-looking fellow, an emblem of what is shrewd and clever—not to say, occasionally unscrupulous. Yet in our fable the crow was not so foolish as he looked; at any rate, he had the sense to withstand the subtle suggestion of the tempter, and saved his life thereby.

When travelling by coach in Algeria some years ago, our driver suddenly remarked, "Here come three crows!" and pointed to three men, whom by their long black robes we recognised as priests of the Romish Church, their nickname being derived from their sombre attire. The driver seemed rather pleased with his little joke, and while some lowly peasants saluted the priests, he whipped up his horses, and passed them with a jeering laugh.

So has it always been. In the Prophet Hosea's time, men said: "The prophet is a fool, the spiritual man is mad" (ix. 7). "Marvel not that the world hate you," was our Lord's word of comfort to his people, "It hated Me before it hated you." "We are fools for Christ's sake!" was the experience of the Apostle Paul. Not much better do the representatives of religion fare in our own land to-day. The Christian is derided, and dubbed "a fool;" the worldling is exalted as a man of wisdom, and a "jolly good fellow" to boot.

Yet let the scoffer beware, lest one day the simplicity of the crow be accounted of higher worth than the vaunted cleverness of the fox. "Sour Grapes!" he may cry at Christianity, but, except he repent, his blatant unbelief will one day be rebuked, and his pitiless mockery be put to shame. His mouth will be silent and his tongue dumb; the pallor of death will cover his face; his fellow-men will draw back the white sheet, and say, "He is dead." Where then will be his ready wit, that facile speech, when he stands before his Maker and his Judge? How will he answer in that day? In the presence of just men made perfect, whom he has reviled on earth, he will be condemned to the blackness of darkness for ever.

"Sour grapes!" Who tasted their bitterness—Lazarus, the beggar at the rich man's gate, or the rich man whose dogs came and licked his sores? God identifies Himself with the cause of his servants. "Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm." The unbeliever is fighting not only against them, but against Him. What chance has he in such a hopeless war? "Despisest thou the riches of his goodness and forbearance and long-suffering, not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance?" (Rom. ii. 4). Be warned in time, O shrewd and clever fox, lest the simple and unpretentious crow, whom you despise, enjoy the eternal feast that you may never share; else you will find there are "sour grapes," but not where you thought they were!

"Christianity a failure!" Of course it is, to those who will not come within its blessed influence. Bread is a failure to the man who refuses it, and starves. Money is a failure to him who, with a balance at the bank, will not draw upon it, to provide himself with the necessaries of life. God is a failure to the rebel who will not submit to his world-loving rule. The Gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth—not to the scoffer, while still rejoicing in his unbelief.

Yet none of the critics of Christianity would care to live in any town or city from which it was excluded. Christianity a failure! The governor of a large gaol once said to the writer, "Things are bad enough, but they might be worse. If you were to stop all Christian effort in this city, you would have to give me a thousand more cells!" Christianity a failure! What else holds in leash the hounds of hell that are ramping around us to destroy the souls of men? What but Christianity quells the evil passions that lurk within the human heart?

Christian, dost thou see them
On the holy ground,
How the powers of darkness
Compass thee around?

Christian, dost thou feel them
How they work within,
Striving, tempting, luring,
Goading into sin?

Christian, dost thou hear them,
How they speak thee fair?—
"Always fast and vigil?
Always watch and prayer?"

Christian, never tremble
Never be downcast;
Peace shall follow battle,
Night shall end at last.

Shall we yield, craven-hearted, to this parrot-cry of the unbeliever? Nay, verily. Christianity is by no means limited to ancient MSS. for its credentials, nor are its miracles confined to 2000 years ago; they triumph in our midst to-day—living epistles, read and known of all men. As in the days of the Baptist, the lame walk, the blind receive their sight; and those that sat in darkness and in the shadow of death, upon them hath the Light shined. Christianity is attested by its modern miracles—of drunkards reformed, the fallen reclaimed, the vicious made holy, and the evil-minded, pure. Well may we glory in the trophies of grace won by Christ, through the Blood of his Cross.

The false religions of earth appeal to the respectable, but they provide no Atonement, nor do they lift the beggar from the dunghill. Socialism says, "All thine is mine!" Christianity teaches, "All mine is thine!" Anarchism cries, "Down with everyone that is up!" Christianity replies, "Uplift everyone that is down!" Christianity alone, of all the religions of the world, has a message of hope to the sinner, raising him out of the horrible pit, and setting his feet upon the Eternal Rock.

Emphatically Christianity is not a failure to such as yield to its beneficent sway. Take heart, discouraged child of the King. "Be thou faithful unto death." "The crowning day is coming by-and-by." G.

How Rome keeps Men down.

IT is a matter of history and of observation that nations and individuals professing Roman Catholicism lie far behind those professing Protestantism. Padre Curci, the Jesuit, was once travelling with a Protestant through Switzerland, when the latter drew his attention to the prosperity of the Protestant Cantons through which they were passing, and to the stagnation and misery of those that were Roman Catholic.

None knew better than Padre Curci the contrasting conditions of these Cantons and of their inhabitants, nor did anyone know better the cause of this. But he said nothing for some time in reply. At last he said, "What you have observed regarding the misery and wretchedness of the Roman Catholic Cantons and the brightness and prosperity of the Protestant ones is quite true; but do you want to know the cause of this?"

His companion was all ears to hear it. "It is for this reason," said Padre Curci, ironically. "You Protestants have your heaven here, we Roman Catholics have ours above; here you receive your good things, and we our evil things; but hereafter the order will be reversed."

It was a bold answer. I remember how Mr. Spurgeon said on the death of a Cardinal in London: "I do not know where he has gone to, but he seems to have gone to a place where he is ill at ease, for we are all asked to pray for the repose of his soul!" And as with the Cardinal's soul, so with those of all Roman Catholics.

But to return to the proposition. We want to illustrate that "Roman Catholicism keeps a man down"; and of this a German paper has just given some striking statistics. In the Provinces of the Rhine there are 500,000 Roman Catholic workmen, and but 200,000 Protestant. Of these there are some 16,216 of the former persuasion in positions of trust, while, in spite of the smallness of the number of Protestants, there are nearly as many of them who occupy such positions, the number being 16,093.

That is to say, 100 per cent. Protestant workmen to 40 per cent. Roman Catholics rise in the industrial world. In Bavaria, the Roman Catholic workmen number 336,000, and the Protestants about a half—186,000. But here again the Protestant workmen who rise to positions of responsibility and trust are nearly equal to the Roman Catholic, the number of the former being 10,000, and of the latter 12,000. In Baden, the workmen who are Roman Catholics are double the number of those who are Protestants, yet the Protestants in responsible positions outnumber the Roman Catholics, their number being 4,819, against 4,274.

The newspaper goes on to find reasons for this. One of these is the dread the Roman Catholics have of an education that might deliver those receiving it from the bondage of the priest. Ignorance and superstition are necessary for his domination, and these he seeks to retain. Hence in all these States, the proportion of young Protestants who go on from the elementary to the secondary schools, and to the higher class schools, is out of all proportion to the Roman Catholics.

The paper concludes by saying, "All the qualities necessary for success in the battle of industrial life are handicapped by Roman Catholicism. Statistics condemn Roman Catholicism as a creed, as behindhand from an industrial point of view." If we take other points of view, we may predicate the same theory. It is treating the Roman Catholic faults very mildly to say that, for the individual and for the nation, the system is a material, an intellectual, and a moral and spiritual drag, keeping men and nations down. THE CHURCH AND THE CHILDREN.

SPECIAL MISSION TO THE YOUNG,

BEING ARRANGED BY THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL UNION.

Mission Effort.

By Rev. THOMAS CHAMPNESS, Rochdale.

A LARGE number of Christian workers are looking out for the best way to secure the future English man and woman, and efforts are about to be made in that direction.

First of all, let us consider what it is we wish to accomplish. It is not enough to persuade our flocks to follow one another into an inquiry-room. This is an easy thing for some men to do. We must aim at more than this. In some way or other, we must let the young folks see their need of Jesus Christ, and his desire to be their Saviour. While we do not lose sight of the impressions which have been made on their minds already, we must focus our efforts in this direction, and, by prayer for ourselves as well as for them, seek to make them feel that the time has come for personal decision.

We ourselves must be quickened. We ought to lose no time in making ourselves better fitted for the task. Let us not forget that God the Holy Ghost is behind all these plans of ours. We should not care for this work if it were not for Him. This being so, we may be sure that He is waiting to help. Shall we not, then, come into personal touch with Him? Let us pray to Him. He is prepared to help us, but not if we ignore Him. "Power belongeth unto God," and specially to the Blessed Spirit, and to work without Him is to put the boiler fires out and then expect the machinery to act. Let us not quench the Holy Spirit!

PREPARATION.

Let each teacher begin next Sunday in his or her class with a view to prepare those who are committed to our care for the Mission. Not by talking of it. Perhaps the less said about it the better, but the sin and folly of indecision may be placed before them; the fact, also, that the longer they remain undecided, the more difficult it will become. We do not speak often enough of the power of habit, and how refusing to accept Christ now makes it easier to do so further on. We shall do well to point out that Jesus did not linger when the time had come for Him to die. He tarried not, but hasted to the Cross. We do not speak often or strongly enough about the guiltiness of those who keep Him waiting outside their hearts' door.

Those in charge of the opening and closing of the school can help us by the choice of hymns which look in the direction we have indicated. Some of us can never forget our feelings when, as children, we sang hymns like those by Jane Taylor and Ann Gilbert. They are old-fashioned, but are powerful to-day, and we are sure they may be used to help in the preparation of heart so much desired.

Much, of course, will depend on the missioner, but more on the preparation. In teaching young preachers how to be effective, the writer tells them to be more anxious about melting the wax than skilful at handling the seal. It is easy to make an impression if the wax is soft. This is why we are taking so much time to dwell on preparation. Are there not in many schools young persons who are decided? These should be got together and taken into our counsels. If there are only two or three of them, they can help us more, perhaps, than anyone else can. They know their fellows as we cannot, and give us hints which will be very valuable. Perhaps this suggestion is worth more than will appear at first sight.

THE MISSIONER.

There is the question of the Missioner to be considered, and here we are in front of a great difficulty. There are so few who have the kind of special fitness for the task, but we have the Spirit of the living God on our side. We must not rely too exclusively on ministers, though if the pastor of the church is beloved by the young people, he is the right man, and in most cases will succeed better than anyone else. It is very much a question of instinct. If a minister is called of God to be useful among children, he will have shewn it before this. This is a gift which cannot be hid, and let the man who has it be invited to use the talent. Let it not be hidden by the napkin of some flaming placard announcing a stranger. Advertisements are not needed, but ability.

It may be that we have in our churches numbers of men hitherto unknown, but fitted for the task, and needing only the anointing from above. We may find them out as Samuel did David, if we hear the voice of God telling us that He will choose for us. Here again comes the value of prayer. We have more faith in earnest and prolonged intercession than in anything else. If God sees that we desire a great work among the young, He knows that we shall in secret cry unto Him, and He will try our fitness more by the quality of our prayers than anything else.

If the churches can but see the greatness of the enterprise—how much blessing is in store for them as the result of this effort, how much sin may be prevented, how much holy living prompted and encouraged, and what God must think of their effort—then they will rise to the occasion, and unite in ceaseless prayer and earnest exertion to win the young people for God before Satan can raise a harvest of sin by them. There is no kind of evil seed that can injure us so much now as unbelief in the value of souls early redeemed from sin, to a life of holy endeavour in the service of Jesus Christ.

By Mr. NEWTON JONES, S.S. Union Evangelist.

WHEN speaking of an evangelistic mission, we have farthest from our mind the idea of a forcing-ground for producing plants of an exotic growth. Rather we are contemplating the making known of an Evangel by one who has the message at heart, and "believing it, therefore speaks." Such testimony will produce life in dead souls, if accompanied by the power of the Holy Spirit. The questions, then, that will be well to answer are:—1. What is to be the Evangel? 2. Who is to be the Evangelist? 3. What can be done by way of preparation?

THE EVANGEL.

To answer this is to have the Scriptural idea of Sin, Salvation, Service. Let there be no hesitation in dealing with sin and its deceitfulness, and according to the child's mental capacity present the glorious truth of the Atonement, enforcing with this the need of outward confession of Christ by life as well as lip, which of itself will be grand service. Mrs. Alexander has expressed this in the simplest of language in the familiar lines:—

O dearly, dearly, has He loved,
And we must love Him too;
And trust in his redeeming blood,
And try his works to do.

There is much vagueness in dealing with these points by many who would undertake to speak at such meetings. The missioner must be a man with a message, believing that the only antidote to sin, whether it be in its root or fruit, is found alone in the Gospel of God's grace.

THE EVANGELIST.

In so great an undertaking, it would be impossible (if it were needful) to find one entirely set apart for the work. There are really good men and true who are willing to render this service; but the fields are many, compared with such labourers. Yet are there not thousands whose hearts the Lord has touched; whose testimony may, during these coming months, be wonderfully owned? It may be a teacher, superintendent, pastor, friend, whose gifts all lie in this direction, some reaching with peculiar aptitude those under fifteen, others those over; some in a public way, others in a private, and perhaps thousands by correspondence. Thus can there be many evangelists. Would that every teacher could prove to be the soul-winner! In some districts the work may flag for the want of a leader to the young. Yet it may be possible to find one who will bring together an assembly of teachers, and with them do a work that shall tell through them to the scholars. To reach one teacher thus will be to influence ten or more scholars.

The NEED of the movement must stand uppermost in our thoughts. The channels of blessing will prove to be legion, and the methods, so varied, will fall upon right lines, if the Holy Spirit's leading be sought.

PRACTICAL HINTS.

In addition to much prayer, it will be well to

1. Enlist the sympathy of parents, teachers, and pastors from the very first.

2. Avoid class distinction. The rich and well-to-do are as much in need of Christ as the hooligans of our cities.

3. If you seek to reach those outside our schools, do not overlook those within.

4. The grand work of character-forming must be done by men and women of character. "To be" must be considered greater than "to do." It is when those we have to teach admire us first for what we are that our words will have weight. Godly men and women alone can expect to rear a godly race. If there be sympathy with Christ in his teaching there will be the seeking to save. To reach the teacher on these lines, as a preparation for the Mission, is absolutely imperative. Not only are gifts required for the work, but also the graces of the Divine Spirit. Then there will be exhibited the tenderness and tact that will do the right thing in the right way, without crushing a child's sensitive and best feelings, not appealing only to emotions, but to the intelligence, that the work may abide.

The preparation, to my knowledge, is already bringing untold blessing to many, and if wisely controlled, will lift teachers and taught, church and school, home and nation, into a closer relationship to God.

THE SUPREME AIM.

The aim of this Mission is to be nothing short of bringing the youngest as well as the oldest of our scholars into touch with Christ—for only by so doing will they prove to have a life, a power, a force to comprehend the teaching and training given Sabbath by Sabbath.

Some workers have no eyes for buds, but they discourage many who would not come in their way and at their time. No work can I imagine to be so Christlike, so refreshing to the soul, so uplifting to the Church of Christ, as seeking to win the young to be servants of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The word decision must be stamped upon every worker and teacher's heart for the following reasons:—

1. It is only as we get our scholars into touch with Christ that the true spirit of reverence to God and to parents (now at such a discount) will again pervade home, school, and church.

2. It is only as we do this that legitimate amusement, pleasure, sports, will play the subordinate part.

3. It is only as this is done, that talents will be consecrated to God and his Church.

4. It is only then that the young will see the real motive for attending the sanctuary.

5. Not till then will God's Word be rightly read and diligently studied, and in due time the family altar (now almost extinct) be set up.

6. By so doing we shall prevent our present scholars filling in future the ranks of the non-church-going population.

Does not the foregoing speak to us of the need of some definite movement, with a definite message for a definite end, namely, to be the present salvation of our scholars, be they juniors or seniors?

By Mr. W. MONRO COLLINGS, Gosport.

WITH regard to the whole question of the children and their religious upbringing and teaching, there are three things which should be taken to heart, and pondered well in the presence of God.

THE CHILDREN NEED CHRIST.

First, the children need Christ. It has, I know, become fashionable in some quarters to doubt this. Many would lead us to believe that children, and specially those of Christian parents, are not in a lost condition spiritually, that all they need is to be trained in the truths of religion; and that conversion and regeneration are foreign words, unintelligible to the children, and never to be mentioned in the school. But to the young the Gospel is wonderful, and it is always the same. Its message is the same, its remedy is the same, and to such there is one way of salvation for the boy as for the man, for the scholar as for the teacher.

As wise master-builders, therefore, we must insist that there is but the one Foundation, which is Jesus Christ; and that the Stone which is set at nought by the builders is the Head of the corner. "Neither is there salvation in any other, for there is none other Name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved."

CHRIST WANTS THE CHILDREN.

Then, secondly, Christ wants the children. The Lord who loved them and gave Himself for them, wants them, and wants them now. The stream of his love and grace flows out to them while they are still young. He desires to bless both the lads and the lasses in all the Sunday-schools and meetings for young people throughout the land. And not only so, but all over the world. He would have them taught that He has died, the Just for the unjust, to bring them to God. They are precious in his sight. Who can estimate their value? We cannot, you and I, for we do not know the uttermost worth of a soul. But He Himself has told us that one man is worth more than the commercial value of the world, and in the sight of God they are equally precious. Oh, how one wishes that once more the Church could hear Him saying, "Suffer little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

THE CHURCH MUST CAPTURE THE CHILDREN.

Thirdly, the Church must capture the children for Christ. Why, she is here on earth for this purpose. She is to be a missionary Church, and here is missionary work at her very doors. We have not to cross the seas to find them, they are all about us; and every one saved now is one more saved from the world, and one less to count when you take a census presently of the unreached masses. The best authors, men and women with real literary ability, do not think it beneath their dignity to write books of fiction for children; and is it not time that the Church condescended to inaugurate a new era of high endeavour and holy activity in this wide field of the young life of our land?

Not for a moment do I undervalue the work of the Sunday-schools, and I do not wish anyone to misunderstand me, but it would be folly, with the facts before us, to say that they have reached the high water mark of usefulness. And why? Mainly, I believe, because the Church has not been fully awake to the fact that the children can be saved while they are children; and in the past, moreover, has failed to see that every agency having this end in view, should have hearty sympathy and support. From an evangelistic standpoint, the children are the hope of the Church, and God Himself can do his chosen and covenant people no greater kindness than to pour out his Spirit upon the children, and call a great company into the kingdom. But the blessing to the children will come through an awakened and revived Church, for when the saints are sanctified, God will do wonders among them.

Let not your hands be slack therefore. With your Bible in your hands, and your Saviour in your hearts go forth into the fields, already white unto harvest, and gather precious sheaves, Remember your responsibility, and, with your eyes on the judgment seat of Christ, seek by all legitimate means to bring the children under your care to an early and immediate decision for Christ. Not only show them that conversion and justification precede sanctification, but go on to exhort them to submit themselves at once to the righteousness of God; for now is the accepted time and now is the day of salvation.

Speaking as one who has prayed and toiled in harvest work for both grown ups and young people, it has for a long time been my supreme and solemn conviction that the Sunday-schools ought to be the most successful and fruitful harvest field of the Church; and so they will be, when we give definite mission work its proper place, and seek with all our mind and heart and strength to get the children converted to God.

*An Uncompleted Sacrifice.

By Rev. KENNETH MOODY-STUART, M.A.

ON Mount Moriah, as we behold Abraham standing with uplifted knife over Isaac—the son of his old age—we are taught that we must be willing to sacrifice to God whatever He claims from us, be it ever so dear. If the Most High calls for your health, your goods, your child, your spouse, your life, surrender these to Him freely, and it becomes a sacrifice well-pleasing to God. The voluntariness of the surrender turns what would else be an inevitable loss into an acceptable offering. But this first sacrifice on Moriah, the most wonderful on record, was an uncompleted sacrifice, and was never intended by God to be completed. Indeed, none of the sacrifices ever offered on Mount Moriah were complete. But this offering, though uncompleted, was not incomplete; for God regarded it as complete: "Because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son" (Gen. xxii. 16).

It is the Lord's wont to take the will for the deed. Persons are sometimes prevented from carrying out their purpose of service or sacrifice by some providential barrier, by a closing of the door, by a voice from heaven, by God clearly declining the offer. This was the case again in regard to David's desire to build the Temple on this very site long after. Twice over, on Mount Moriah, we hear the voice from heaven saying, "Thou didst well that it was in thine heart."

The next lesson taught us by Moriah is, that "The Lord will provide." The patriarch Abraham considered this to be the main lesson which the memorable occurrence was destined to teach, for he named the spot Jehovah-jireh, "The Lord will provide"; and the name "Moriah" given to the hill, evidently after this incident, hss the same significance. In the course of the narrative the promise is thrice repeated. It is a promise which is full of comfort to God's people in all seasons of stress and want. The time when our covenant-keeping God, who cares for us, will make the provision is not indicated, nor the method but:—

> In some way or other the Lord will provide!
> It may not be my way, it may not be thy way,
> But yet in his own way the Lord will provide.

While this name of Moriah bids us cast all our care upon Him who careth for us, we must remember that its original reference was to the provision of the sacrificial lamb—Abraham's lamb then, God's Lamb in the fulness of time. We learn here that it is only "with Christ" that God also freely gives us all things. He who provides a Lamb for the world in the Person of his Son, will not withhold from us any good thing.

The sacrifice on Moriah teaches us more plainly than any other recorded sacrifice, the great doctrine of "Substitution." Abraham, we are told, "went and took the ram, and offered him up for a burnt-offering in the stead of his son." It was a vicarious offering; and in its relation to Isaac it becomes a telling type of the Lamb of God, who, with his sacred head wreathed and caught in the thorns of a fallen world's curse, died "the Just for the unjust."

We are told also in the New Testament that the great doctrine of the resurrection was taught on Mount Moriah. "By faith he that had received the promises offered up his only-begotten son, accounting that God was able to raise him up even from the dead, from whence also he received him in a figure" (Heb. xi. 17-19). It was under this great strain on his faith, obedience, and affection, that man first grasped the glorious consolation of the resurrection of the dead.

Passing from Abraham to David, we find another impressive scene transacted upon Mount Moriah. It was here that at the command of God the angel who had slain by pestilence 70,000 men of Israel because of their monarch's sin, stayed his hand that held the drawn sword stretched out over the devoted city of Jerusalem. In 2 Chron. iii. 1. this striking incident, which took place at the threshing-floor of Araunah, the Jebusite, is assigned definitely to Mount Moriah, the site which David selected for the erection of the Temple which was built by his son Solomon. The great lesson of this scene is that nations under God's moral government suffer for the sins of their rulers. If this was so in ancient times, when the people were only indirectly responsible for their rulers' conduct, the righteousness of the Divine action is much clearer to-day, when in the foremost nations the choice of the rulers and the decision on matters of public policy are entrusted to the suffrages of the people. Rulers and subjects form one body politic with national duties and responsibilities, the failure to discharge which calls down Divine judgments.

It was the self-moved mercy of God that prompted Him to say to his angel, "It is enough; stay now thine hand"; but it was only after sacrifice had been offered and accepted that the angel put up again his sword into its sheath.

. . . Our churches cannot do better than study the important lessons taught us by Mount Moriah. But we as individuals must learn these lessons too; and in order to impress them let me, before bidding Moriah farewell, ask my readers:

Have you learned that the Lord will provide? and that not only in the great crises and necessities, but in the little incidents and wants of life? and that it is in and with Christ that He who spared not his own Son will freely give you all things?

Do you know that God so loved the world that He gave his only begotten Son, to be the sinner's sacrifice and substitute? that Christ took our place upon the altar, and suffered in our room and stead? that the Father had his share in this sacrifice in providing the Substitute, and the Son in willingly giving Himself up for us all?

Have you learned that all other sacrifices and offerings were of worth only as preparatory types of this great offering, or as sequences of it, and derive all their value from the precious blood of Christ?

Girls' Letter Guild.—Miss A. M. May, hon. sec. of the Leeds centre, asks us to say that there is need of lady correspondents for Nonconformist girls. She says: "We have a large number waiting who are very anxious to have lady friends to write to them. A simple friendly letter every month is all that is needed, and I am sure there must be many of your readers who, for Christ's sake, would be willing to undertake this small work of love." "Our Daily Bread."

SUNDAY, February 2. Genesis viii.

"GOD remembered Noah." He cannot forget, through all these weary months, that thou hast been tossing on the waters of a deluge of trial; He has been beside thee, and now He is elaborating plans for thy deliverance.

Every part of the human family has its tradition of the Deluge, which proves that all mankind issued from those who crossed the darksome waters. Mount Ararat rises some 16,254 feet above the sea-level; it is not necessary to suppose that the ark rested necessarily upon the highest point of the range, of which it forms a part. Dove and raven came from the same ark, so the sweet-tempered child and the awkward one emerge from the same home. The child of God can find no resting-place amid the death which reigns supreme in the world, but wings his flight back to the pierced hand of the Saviour. "Return unto thy rest, O my soul, for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee." "Come unto Me, and I will give you rest."

The saved family, having floated across the deluge from the old world to the new, may be used as a befitting type of the redeemed Church, which, through the Resurrection of the Lord Jesus, has been brought out of the world, where death reigns, into the new world of Resurrection life. It is our duty, if we belong to this happy number, to offer ourselves as living sacrifices to God, which is the reasonable service of those constrained by the thought of his mercies. Notice that God smelled a sweet savour, or "a savour of rest," a phrase which occurs in many a following passage, and especially of the Beloved Son (Lev. i. 9; Eph. v. 2), bespeaking the Divine satisfaction. May we always have that! (2 Cor. ii. 15.)

MONDAY, February 3. Genesis ix.

God had blessed man when first created, and now He did the same as the race was beginning afresh. All that grows on the earth had been given as the food of Adam, but henceforth every moving thing that lives was to be for meat. But the blood was expressly forbidden. The warm blood of men and of the humbler creation has always been identified with the essence of life or soul. This belonged to God; and thus the way was prepared for Moses to command that the blood of all sacrifices should be poured out on the altar, as an atonement for the soul of the offerer (Lev. xvii. 11). Because the life is in the blood, therefore the blood of the Lord Jesus is so often referred to throughout the New Testament. It is by the shedding of that precious blood, representing the laying down of his life, that we have been redeemed. The sacredness of life was still further protected by the stringent regulations of verses 5, 6, 7. The rainbow was a fit symbol of the covenant, uniting heaven and earth, and overarching the whole sky as though to emphasize the encircling love of God. Are any passing through a deluge of trouble? It will not last always. Days of unclouded joy are at hand. He will no more smite the world of thy life; and thy sorrows will make the bank of dark cloud, on which the rainbow shall be embosomed.

That Noah should fall teaches that it is easier to live a great life amid great troubles than to be noble and lovely in the tent or home. Apart from the keeping power of God, we are never safe till we reach heaven!

TUESDAY, February 4. Genesis x.

This chapter has been designated as containing "the Fountains of History." It is of marvellous interest, and the most marvellous thing about it is that all modern investigation and discovery are only tending to confirm more absolutely its literal accuracy.

The main lesson for the general reader is that God hath made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on all the face of the earth, and has determined their appointed seasons and the bounds of their habitation. As one has said, this chapter is therefore humbling and elevating. It is humbling to think that we are related to the cannibal in his kraal, the slave in his hut, and the wastrels and scum of our modern cities. It is elevating to think that we may call the kings of men, the royal races of the world, brothers. This oneness of the race makes Christianity the heritage of all, and enabled our Lord to say, "Go ye and teach all nations." There is a bond between every man and every other man. Our Lord is emphatically the Son of Man. He speaks the language of the heart, which is understood by all.

On the whole, JAPHETH was the father of the fair people of Europe, or perhaps the man whose descendants spread abroad more widely than the rest. Gomer is probably the great Celtic race, whilst Javan is the whole Hellenic people. HAM was the man who settled in the warm regions of Africa. Nimrod was probably a hunter of men, one of the first of the tyrants, who have built up vast empires at an awful cost of human suffering. SHEM, the firstborn, is mentioned last, because the sacred historian proceeds from this point, almost without a break, to tell the story of Shem's descendants, who dwell chiefly in Western Asia, and from whom sprang the Hebrew people. Let us remember that, from the first, God loved the world; not one of all these multitudes is excluded from the Divine care and the propitiation of his Cross.

WEDNESDAY, February 5. Genesis xi.

The land of Shinar was a fertile valley watered by the Euphrates and Tigris. This was chosen as the first great metropolis of the human family. Here began that city life which has been the curse of mankind. Although ignorance and sin make their home in the villages, there can be no doubt that the close gathering of men in crowds breeds more enormous evils. Mark the thrice-repeated "Let us . . . . make brick . . . build a city and a tower . . . . make us a name." See what pride inspired their attempt! God bade man multiply abundantly, and spread throughout the earth, whilst man insisted on a focussed and concentrated existence. "Lest we be scattered," said human pride; "The Lord scattered them abroad," was the inevitable issue. Vain man opposes his way and will to God, to discover that the eternal purpose must overthrow him, and pass on to its glorious consummation.

Notice what a small thing it is for God to confound our plans when they are subversive of his will. In this case, He touched a tiny nerve, and the speech of one man became unintelligible to his neighbour. No doubt a great purpose has been conserved by this estrangement of men from men. Each country has been able to preserve its individuality, and make a more distinct contribution to the well-being of the whole. The Hebrew people is a striking instance of this. From Gen. xi. we naturally turn to Acts ii., and thence to Rev. vii.

At verse 10, and again at 27, there are distinct chapters or divisions in the original document, inaugurated by the word "generations." In the one paragraph our attention is focussed on the line of Shem, till it fixes upon Terah; and in the other on the line of Terah, till it fixes on Abram.

THURSDAY, February 6. Genesis xii.

Recent discoveries reveal a high state of civilization in the lands from which Abram came. Ur or Orfa means "light" or "fire;" not improbably it was the centre of fire-worship. In any case we know that Terah and his family were as much infected with idolatry as the rest of the people around. As a proof of the high civilization of the time, traces have been lately discovered of a lending library which preceded the days of Abram, and tablets containing the names of books which borrowers desired to read, and which were cast away when their want had been met.

It must have been an effort for Abram to tear himself away and adopt a pilgrim life, and his full obedience to the call which came to him in Ur (Acts vii. 1, 2) was trammelled by his father and the rest of the clan resolving to accompany him. Under these circumstances he was able to go no further than Haran, where he tarried by the Euphrates ford till Terah died, then again the Divine summons appealed to him; as in the earlier verses of this chapter. Remember that that promise is for you. It is intended that the blessing of Abram should come on the Gentiles who believe, and that they who are of faith should be blessed with faithful Abraham (Gal. iii. 9, 14). Thou art blessed, O Christian soul, with all spiritual blessing in the heavenlies with Christ, but it is incumbent on thee to separate thyself from Ur and Haran, and to step out in simple obedience, though thou knowest not whither (Heb. xi. 8). Whithersoever thou goest, be sure that the tent is accompanied by the altar, and that the fire of devotion be kindled to burn after thou hast gone.

Learn how a man of faith will stumble as he first steps out on the difficult path. But God is patient with his dull scholars, and, in spite of many shortcomings, can yet perfect that which concerneth us.

FRIDAY, February 7. Genesis xiii.

Abram got back at last to the place where his tent had been since the beginning. How often this happens in life. We make a long digression, but happy are we if we come back to where we stood at first. Lot had been swept forward by the inspiration of his relative's noble faith; but he resembles the seed on the stony ground that springs up quickly, and dies away because it has no root. The world is full of Lots—shallow, impulsive, doomed sooner or later to fall away. They are parasites upon the religious life of others. See to it that you strike your roots into the heavenly soil, where they will be nourished and fed by the life of God.

The offer made by Abram to Lot was very magnanimous. As the servant of Jehovah, it would be better for him to lose everything, than imperil his testimony. But a man who is prepared to lose everything for God can lose nothing. No good thing shall fail.

Often it comes to individuals and nations that a choice is given between the conservation of high and noble ideals or temporal advancement. These are the questions that show our true calibre. Be it yours and mine to be prepared to sacrifice everything for the loftiest interests. A man can hold material things with a light hand to whom God has said, "I will bless thee, and make thy name great."

SATURDAY, February 8. Genesis xiv.

It is remarkable that recently discovered monuments tell the story of this confederacy of the kings of the Euphrates Valley against those of the Plain of Jordan. The raid was disastrous for Lot, who must have bitterly rued his choice. Abram might fairly have left him to reap as he had sown, but his soul yearned over his weak and entrapped relative, and he set himself to secure his deliverance. Thus still, men of faith who are strong in the life of separation are able to deliver those who have been taken captive by the devil at his will. Had Abram sunk to the enervated life of the plain, do you suppose for a moment that he could have achieved Lot's deliverance? and do you think that any of us will be able to deliver those who are enthralled by sin and Satan, unless we ourselves live on the uplands of fellowship with God?

Melchizedek was king and priest of a neighbouring tribe that held Jerusalem. The few facts which are known about him are seized by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews to set off the mystery and grandeur of our Lord, who is, first, King of Righteousness, and then also King of Peace (Heb. vii. 2). Like Melchizedek, our Lord was greater than the Aaronic priesthood. Like Melchizedek, He was not made after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an indissoluble life. Like Melchizedek, our Lord exercises his royal and priestly functions at the direct instance of the Father. Like Melchizedek, our great High Priest intervenes in the moment of temptation between ourselves and the bribe of the tempter, so that we are able to stand in unquestionable superiority to all the assaults of the Evil One. Why should the soul need the shoe latchets of Sodom, which has been blessed by the Most High God, the Possessor of heaven and earth?

F. B. M.

Samuel and Saul.

Samuel, the Saviour of His Country.

(1 Sam. vii. 2-7.)

BY REV. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

IN this chapter we have to bridge over a considerable tract of Scripture (iv. i-vii. 7), covering, perhaps, forty years, because the details of Samuel's life and growing influence given by the sacred historian during that period are very scanty.

It was an age of disunion and anarchy. After the deaths of Joshua, Caleb, and of all that generation, "there arose another generation after them, which knew not the Lord, nor yet the work which He had wrought for Israel" . . . (Judges ii. 10). There was no man, and no tribe, able to unite the people under one leadership, or recall them to the lofty monotheism—the worship of the one Jehovah—which characterised the founders of their commonwealth. "Every man did that was right in his own eyes." "The children of Israel forsook Jehovah, the God of their fathers, which brought them up out of the land of Egypt, and followed other gods, of the gods of the peoples that were round about them, and bowed themselves down unto them."

There was, therefore, nothing to hinder the steady encroachments of the neighbouring nations. Now it was the children of Ammon on the east, then the Amalekites and Midianites from the desert, and again the Philistines on the south-west. From time to time judges were raised up, but their authority was only temporary and limited. For the most part it ceased with their death, and was the means of delivering only a section of the land. "When the Lord raised them up judges, then the Lord was with the judge, and saved them out of the hand of their enemies all the days of the judge . . . but it came to pass, when the judge was dead, that they turned back, and dealt more corruptly than their fathers" (Judges ii. 18, 19).

Our story is specially connected with the southern and midland districts of Canaan, which, notwithstanding Samson's heroic exploits—for he was contemporary with Samuel's early years—lay under the tyrannous yoke of the Philistines, who seem about this time to have been largely reinforced from the original seat of their empire in the neighbouring island of Crete, and to have made the position of the Hebrews almost intolerable.

In these Philistines stealing up from their own territories and cities to dominate the Hebrews, in the land which God gave them for an heritage, a land to which the Philistines could have no possible claim, but which was certainly the allotted possession of the chosen people—I see the type of so much which is always taking place in our own experience. For instance, they stand for unholy desires and evil habits, from which we were once set free by the risen Son of God, but which, in subsequent years, may have come back to assert their former sway and tyranny. And again, they represent the inroads of worldliness into the Church, and of wickedness into the State. The forces of evil are never at rest. Just as the spirit of destruction and waste is perpetually at work in untiling our roofs, stripping off our wall papers, pulling down our walls, and sowing our gardens with weeds whilst we sleep; so the evil tendencies in the heart, the Church, and the nation are ever warring against the law of the mind, and bringing men into captivity to the law of sin.

In the insidious attempts to rob us of our Rest Day, and to turn it into one of public amusement; in the unblushing effrontery of vice in various forms; in the threatened domination of all other interests by the mad greed for money; in the spirit of amusement which infects society; in the worldliness and luxury which divide with the spiritual the hearts and lives of professing Christians—we are brought face to face with the bands of the Philistines as they steal up from their lowlands to the uplands of religious constancy and strength. They have no rights, but they never fail to assert their pretensions; and sometimes we almost lose heart, and begin to question whether there is any use in opposing them.

At other times, like the children of Israel, we are goaded to make one desperate effort for freedom.

I. AN ILL-FATED ATTEMPT. "Now Israel went out against the Philistines to battle, and pitched beside Ebenezer, and the Philistines pitched in Aphek" ("the Fortress," perhaps in the neighbourhood of Bethlehem). From these words we infer that the war was commenced by Israel throwing down the gage of battle, because the yoke of Philistia was too galling to be endured; but it is almost certain that from the first it was an ill-starred and badly-managed campaign. No priest was called in to ask counsel of God, or bless the going forth of the Israelite hosts. Not even Samuel, in whom the people were beginning to recognise the servant and prophet of Jehovah, seems to have been consulted. It was the sudden flaming out of a spirit of hatred and revenge from a race of slaves who were stung to the quick by the taunts, the insults, and the scorpion-whips of their masters.

Such has been the spirit in which we have sometimes turned on the powerful sins which have asserted their mastery over us. We have seen the ruin to which they were bringing us, we have winced at the shame and indignation which they were causing to others, we have felt insulted and outraged in any lingering sense of honour and nobility that may have escaped the general wreck, and we have turned on our tormentors. We have signed the pledge against the use of intoxicants, we have taken a solemn oath never more to yield to our besetting sin, we have vowed that we will be free. But within a month we have been back in the old state. It has not gone better with us than with Israel, for this battle is not to the strong, nor this race to the swift.

II. THE ARK, BUT NOT GOD, TO THE RESCUE. On the evening of that disastrous day the elders of Israel held a council of war (v. 3). It was evident that their defeat must be attributed to some failure in their relations with Jehovah. They said, "Wherefore hath the Lord smitten us to-day before the Philistines?" "Let us fetch," they cried, "the Ark of the Covenant of the Lord out of Shiloh, that it may come among us, and save us out of the hand of our enemies."

They remembered the wonderful scenes in which that Ark had played a part; how the waters of the Jordan had fled before it, and the walls of Jericho had fallen down. Its going forth, in the words of their great lawgiver, had always meant the scattering and flight of Jehovah's foes. Surely it would do the same again. They did not realize that God's very present help depended not on the presence of a material symbol, but on moral and spiritual conditions which they should have set themselves to understand and fulfil.

The arrival of the Ark, in due course, borne by the Levites, and accompanied by the sons of Eli, as its custodians, was received with the exultant shouts of the entire host. Eli had evidently been most unwilling to allow it to leave the sacred enclosure—"his heart trembled for the Ark of God"—but he had yielded too often and too long to be able to sustain a successful protest; and probably no one else had any misgivings, for "when the Ark of the Covenant of the Lord came into camp, all Israel shouted with a great shout, so that the earth rang again."

As soon as the Philistines, by means of their scouts, were acquainted with the cause of this exuberant outburst, they were correspondingly depressed, for they, too, identified the presence of the God of Israel with the advent of the Ark, which had always been associated in their minds with the hand of "these mighty gods that smote the Egyptians with plagues in the wilderness." Neither had they any idea of those moral considerations on which alone the co-operation of God could be given. "Woe unto us!" they cried, "for there hath not been such a thing heretofore. Woe unto us! Who shall deliver us?"

It was necessary that a decisive answer should be given to these materialistic conceptions of the Hebrews and their foes. It must be demonstrated that the mere possession of the symbol of the Covenant was valueless, whilst the strange gods and the Ashtaroth were still cherished, and the abominations of the heathen were constantly and shamelessly pursued (vii. 3, 4). "If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me."

The Philistines advanced to the conflict with the words of their leaders ringing in their ears. "Be strong, and quit yourselves like men, O ye Philistines, that ye be not servants to the Hebrews, as they have been to you. Quit yourselves like men and fight" (see 1 Cor. xvi. 13).

The issue of that terrible day was disastrous in the extreme. "Israel was smitten, and they fled every man to his tent, and there was a very great slaughter, for there fell of Israel 30,000 footmen." Around the Ark the ground must have been heaped with corpses, as the Hebrews fought desperately in defence of the symbol of their faith; but in vain, for the Ark of God was taken, and the two sons of Eli were slain. Thus had Samuel foretold, and thus it befell.

That afternoon a Benjamite, with his clothes rent, and dust upon his head, bore the tidings to the hamlets and villages that lay all along the ascending and open road to Shiloh, and, "when the man came into the city, and told it, all the city cried out."

The old man, Eli, blind and anxious, had caused himself to be seated on his throne, facing on the main thoroughfare. He had a foreboding that bad news was in the air, and when the noise of the tumult arose, he anxiously inquired of the attendant priests and Levites, and, perhaps, of Samuel, waiting as usual to respond to his least appeal for help, "What meaneth the noise of this tumult?" At the same moment the messenger appears to have burst into the presence of the little group, telling Eli who he was, and in answer to the eager inquiry of the High Priest, "How went the matter, my son?" he blurted out, with an ever-rising climax of dread awfulness: "Israel is fled before the Philistines, and there hath been also a great slaughter among the people, and thy two sons also, Hophni and Phinehas, are dead, and the Ark of God is taken."

The old man received the tidings in silence. The three first shots hit him severely, but not mortally; but "when he made mention of the Ark of God, he fell from off his seat backward by the side of the gate, and his neck brake and he died."

But worse troubles still befell. In frantic haste the Israelites bore away the remnants of the sacred tent and its furniture, and concealed them. In subsequent years they were at Nob (1 Sam. xxi. 1). The removal of these precious relics was hardly effected, before the Philistine invasion burst on the deserted city as an overflowing flood. "Go ye now," says Jeremiah, "in the Divine Name, into my place which was in Shiloh, where I caused my name to dwell at the first, and see what I did to it for the wickedness of my people Israel (Jer. vii. 12)." And the further fate of the city, which for 300 years had been the centre of the natural life and worship, may be guessed from the pathetic words of the Psalmist:—

He forsook the tabernacle of Shiloh,
The tent which He pitched among men;
And delivered his strength into captivity
And his glory into the adversary's hand.
He gave his people over also unto the sword,
And was wroth with his inheritance.
Fire devoured their young men,
And their maidens were not praised in the marriage song;
Their priests fell by the sword,
And their widows made no lamentation.

(Psa. lxxviii. 60, &c.).

Home Bible-Study Classes.

It has been found desirable, in the best interests of the Bible Teachers' College, of which Professor Wilbert W. White is president, to remove the headquarters from Montclair, New Jersey, to New York; and temporary accommodation has been secured at 45, West Thirty-fourth Street, next door to the chapel of the Broadway Tabernacle, where the exercises will be conducted during the coming winter.

An important and successful experiment in "At Home Bible-Study Classes" has just been carried out, of which Professor White sends the following particulars:—

The plan is to provide a competent teacher of the Bible for any group of persons willing to gather in any home at any time. It is the home department of the Sunday-school, with certain important additional features, among which are:—(1) The living teacher is provided instead of the printed page. (2) The social element is present in place of solitary study. (3) The teaching is done immediately after the preparation and stimulus of presence at a meeting designed to furnish equipment by prayer and conference and study under the direction of a competent leader.

Already fifteen groups are in successful operation under direction of the extension department of the Bible Teachers' College. Our secretary in charge reports more homes open to us for these classes than we are able to provide teachers for. Our teachers' training class for this work meets every Monday evening for one hour; and the majority of the groups are taught immediately after the class of teachers meets.

That people will respond to sympathetic, earnest, unaffected effort to teach the Bible in their homes we are fully convinced by actual experiment. We believe that we have hit upon a most practical and effective plan of reaching the poor with the Word of God. This is the age of the delivery waggon. People will not go away from home to get what anybody will bring to them. Mr. Moody used to say: "The way to reach the masses is to go to them," and I believe this in a new sense since this work began in November.

One group is conducted in a home where the mother has been an invalid for seventeen years. In another home is an invalid of twelve years; both being Christians they naturally welcome the classes. One mother is rejoicing at the interest of her two boys who never cared for these things before. A wife is glad that the meeting has kept her husband away from evil companionship for a succession of weeks. You ought to hear the interesting reports which our teachers bring in every time we meet. It is thrilling to hear them tell of the good which they themselves are receiving. They are finding that it is indeed blessed to give.

Several of our teachers are students at the Teachers' College, Columbia University. A graduate of Vassar has one class. Our own students are teaching. We hope to have 100 groups in operation before spring. Our plan includes a mass meeting of all members of the groups once a month, for review and supplementary instruction.

Spread of Romish Practices.

We have received a communication from Sir Charles S. King, Bart., in which he points out that such efforts as have been made by the bishops to put a check on the spread of Romish and Ritualistic practices in the Church of England have had an unfortunate effect, inasmuch as the statistics for the year show an increase of sixty-one in the number of churches where the Mass has usurped the place of the Lord's Supper, besides others where vestments, &c., have been introduced. Our correspondent believes that there is at present much need for the publication of a Protestant Catechism or solemn declaration, drawn up by such a body as the National Free Church Council, containing an authoritative statement of Protestant teaching on such questions as Sacerdotalism and the Christian ministry, the Mass, Auricular Confession, the Conventual System, the Invocation of the Virgin Mary and other saints, graven images and sacred pictures, Prayers for the dead, the Papal claims, &c.

Anti-Infidel Tract Enterprise.—Consequent on the fire at a printing office already referred to in our columns, and business connections with two firms which were obliged to make arrangements with their creditors, the Anti-Infidel Tract Enterprise (Mr. W. R. Bradlaugh, 70, King's Cross Road, W.C.) finds itself in dire straits for means to maintain its position in the conflict with open unbelief. A sum of £200 is urgently required.

Mr. Silas Back, of Bath.

"Better is the end of a thing than the beginning thereof." Truly this may be said of the career of a Christian. To me it is ever a joy to visit the cottage of Mr. Silas Back. He is now seventy-five, and can look back upon sixty years of discipleship, having been converted at the age of fifteen under the Methodist ministry. During this long period he has been able to prove the faithfulness of the unchanging God under all the trials and amid all the changes of the life of a working gardener, with a family dependent upon him.

If some visitor from a distant land had only known the Gospel of the grace of God by the ear, and wanted to see a living example of the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ, it would be quite possible to show him excellent samples in the ministry, among the cultured, the nobility, and the gentle. But I would far rather take him to such a humble home as that of my friend; for with those there would be advantages of birth and education; and so the inquirer would naturally say, "These people are doubtless very good, but can you show me what your religion can do for a man who has no favouring circumstances?"

From Photograph by Mr. T. C. Willway, Beechen Cliff, Bath.

Here, then, is a man who has proved to the utmost the exceeding practical value of the grace of God in the most ordinary life; here is one who has proved that Christianity is not a mere system of morals, but a living force, suited to the needs of men living in this work-a-day world.

Mr. Back has a godly wife, who has been his faithful companion and helpmeet in joy and sorrow for half a century; and together they have sought to train their children in the fear of God. They have their reward, for now there is to be seen on Sunday mornings the beautiful sight of this patriarch taken in his wheel chair to Snow Hill Gospel Hall by his son, with his grandchildren by his side. It was there that I first met him; and there at the open morning meeting he is seen to advantage.

With meekness, and in a quiet, gentle manner, he opens the Bible, and comparing Scripture with Scripture, he sets Christ before men as the beloved Son of the Father, the Great High Priest, the Perfect Sacrifice, and the sinner's only Saviour. His theme is Christ and his work; and as you go away you feel that you have been fed with the finest of the wheat. It is as a father instructing his children, and yet, such is the humility of this man of God that, whether in public or in private, he never has the air of "Come-sit-at-my-feet-and-I-will-instruct-you," which spoils some religious teachers. He would much like to learn from you.

His discourses partake of the character of a musing, and an opening-up of Scripture. It is as if Mr. Back were taking us to a well of living water, from which he has often drunk, and where he now wants others to be refreshed.

The most salient feature in his character, in my judgment, is a perfect satisfaction with the will of God. So contented is he that he has not done what many Christians would, asked for a larger house.

Then he has such largeness of heart, such a beautiful spirit of brotherliness towards all the children of God. "I have a place in my heart for all the people of God, whether Baptists, Methodists, Churchmen, or by whatever name they are called, so that they really love God," he told me once. But let no one suppose that he would tolerate error. To him it is a very solemn matter that there is such a downgrade movement in the Church.

His has been a life of labour. The bread of idleness has not been his fare. Even now in the evening of life he does not make lameness an excuse for folding his hands; but does such work as he can in the garden and the home. "Satan would get an advantage over me were I not to be well occupied," he assures me.

Christian Giving.—A Bible Study.

Will a man rob God? Yet ye have robbed Me. But ye say, Wherein have we robbed Thee? In tithes and offerings (Mal. iii. 8).

He that hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the Lord (Prov. xix. 17).

I.—A Duty and Privilege.

Give alms of such things as ye have (Luke xi. 41).
Use hospitality one to another (1 Pet. iv. 9).
Distributing to the necessity of saints (Rom. xii. 13).
Be not unmindful of benevolence and liberality (Heb. xiii. 16, C. and H.*)
Charge them to practise benevolence, to be rich in good works, to be bountiful and generous (1 Tim. vi. 17, 18, C. and H.*).

(*Conybeare and Howson's translation.)

II.—How to Give.

As able (Luke xi. 41).
Systematically (1 Cor. xvi. 2).
According to promise (Eccles. v. 4, 5).
Sharing what we have with those who have not (Luke iii. 11).
As every man has need (Acts ii. 45).
Sufficient for his need (Deut. xv. 7).
Labouring in order to have to give to the needy (Ephes. iv. 28).
Secretly (Matt. vi. 3, 4).
Liberally (Rom. xii. 8, marg.).
As he purposeth in his heart; not grudgingly; not of necessity; cheerfully (2 Cor. ix. 7).
Without murmuring (1 Pet. iv. 9, R.V.).
Thine heart shall not be grieved (Deut. xv. 10).
To point of making ourselves poor (Prov. xiii. 7).
The widow gave all she had (Mark xii. 44).
Early Church had all things common (Acts ii. 44).
Macedonians gave according to their power, and beyond their power, of their own accord (2 Cor. viii. 3, R.V.).

III.—To Whom Specially to Give.

Needy (1 John iii. 16).
Sick (Psa. xli. 1, marg.).
Destitute (Luke iii. 11).
Poor brethren (Deut. xv. 7).

IV.—Blessings Promised to the Giver.

God will not forget (Heb. vi. 10).
He shall be repaid by God (Prov. xix. 17).
It shall be returned by man in abundant measure (Luke vi. 38).
Bountiful reaping (2 Cor. ix. 6).
Increase (Prov. xi. 24).
Soul fatness and freshness; shall be watered (Prov. xi. 25).
No lack (Prov. xxviii. 27).
Prosperity (Deut. vii. 13).
Deliverance, preservation, blessing in this life, help in sickness (Psa. xli. 1-3).
Light, health (Isa lviii. 7, 8).
Righteousness shall go before, and the glory of the Lord shall be his reward (Isa. lviii. 8).
Answered prayer (Isa lviii. 9).
Guidance: satisfied (Isa. lviii. 11).
Overflowing blessing (Mal. iii. 10).

V.—What it Implies.

The love of God in us (1 John iii. 16).
Living faith (James ii. 14-16).
The righteous (Prov. xxi. 26).

VI.—God's View of Giving.

He is well pleased (Heb. xiii. 16).

PRINCIPAL OF "THE CHILDREN'S HOME AND ORPHANAGE."

AMONG the numerous and varied forms of present-day philanthropy, none is of greater service to the community, or more imbued with the spirit of Christ and Christianity, than the care which is being extended to suffering, friendless, and homeless children. The neglected waifs and strays of our crowded streets, and the unfortunate orphan and friendless little ones of our city (and village) life, instead of running wild and untaught to become the prey and sport of every evil influence, are, by these modern institutions, being reclaimed from their evil surroundings and trained for the kingdom of Christ. The Wesleyan Church, true to the spirit of its first great chief, and its early traditions, has for many years had a share in this Christlike service; and the group of homes which finds its centre at Bonner Road, N.E., has long been recognised not only as one of the best of its class, but also as one of the most progressive and enterprising of the activities of Methodism.

Among the chief features of the work, we may call attention to its catholicity, its freedom from any taint of sectarianism, the genial and homely character of its family life, the intensely spiritual tone pervading the whole organization, and the marvellous success which has attended it from its beginning until now.

The institution has recently passed through a great crisis, owing to the unexpected and apparently premature resignation of Dr. Stephenson, its founder and Principal. Dr. Stephenson commenced this work more than thirty years ago, a young man just beginning to be known for his striking and varied capacity, his enthusiasm and enterprise. The management was in his hands from that day until eighteen months ago, when he retired from the position, full of honours, rich in affection, with a world-wide reputation; and, as his many friends hope and believe, with yet many years of useful life before him. Such a change as this involves is always a source of anxiety, and a time of stress and strain, in the history of any institution; but especially so when the loving and capable hands of its founder and its presiding genius are withdrawn, and another must take the reins of government and carry on the work. But the new Principal—whose knowledge of the work of the Homes is almost life-long—has already successfully grappled with the difficulties of the position, and is not only maintaining with efficiency its existing agencies, but endeavouring to develop and extend its loving ministries to suffering childhood.

Rev. ARTHUR E. GREGORY, D.D., the new Principal, was born at Southampton, November 30, 1853. He is the third and youngest son of the late Rev. Benjamin Gregory, D.D., ex-President of the Wesleyan Conference, for many years Connexional editor, and one of the most beloved and accomplished of Methodist preachers of his day. The new Principal is one of three sons who entered the ministry from the same gifted family. Educated at the Manchester Grammar School and at Clapham, he came there under the influence of the late Mr. Henry Jefferson, M.A. After leaving school, he was for a few years in an office in London; and spent his evenings in mission work in various parts of the Metropolis, especially at Whitecross Street (afterwards taken over and worked by the Leysian Mission). About this time he was greatly impressed by reading Dr. Fleming Stevenson's "Praying and Working," and the "Letters of Edward Denison;" and in February, 1872, offered his services to Dr. Stephenson, with the view of gaining some experience of East End life and work. The Home was then in its infancy, and was very small in comparison with the vigorous life and varied agencies carried on by its officers to-day; but the twelve months spent there made a great impression on the young worker, and left their mark and influence on all his after life.

HIS WORK AS A PREACHER.

In 1875, Mr. Gregory became a candidate for the ministry, and, after his acceptance by the Conference, was sent to the Ministerial Training College at Didsbury, where he came under the powerful influence of Dr. W. B. Pope and the late Dr. J. D. Geden. They were both men of high attainments in scholarship and of an intensely spiritual character, and at this critical stage of the student's career they did much to develop and fashion his intellectual and spiritual life. At the Conference of 1878, Mr. Gregory received his first appointment to Blackburn, in 1879 he became President's assistant, and in 1880, editor's assistant. Subsequently he "travelled" the usual term of three years in the Highgate, Clacton-on-Sea, St. Albans, Kentish Town, Lewisham, and Victoria Park circuits, leaving the latter in 1898 (and before his three years were expired) to take up the duties of vice-Principal of the Children's Home. Two years later, in 1900, owing to the retirement of Dr. Stephenson, he was called to take the entire management of the Home, and thus became its second Principal. It is interesting to note that Mr. Gregory ended his circuit life as superintendent of the circuit from which he went out as a candidate. At his first local preachers' meeting, in the Victoria Park circuit, all the local preachers had been passed on to "full plan" at the same time as himself; and a young man who was then examined, prior to admission as a "fully accredited local preacher," ascribed his conversion to something said to him by Dr. Gregory when he was a scholar in one of the mission schools twenty-four years earlier.

Dr. Gregory's circuit work has been characterized throughout by great energy and almost uniform success. At one period of his history, the present writer was in close touch with him for a considerable period, and had many opportunities of watching and estimating his work. Although he could never be called a man of robust physique, the new Principal is a man of tireless energy, of inexhaustible fertility of ideas, of great tact in managing men, and with that high spiritual tone which is an essential of such labour.

In all his circuits Mr. Gregory has given special attention to labour among workingmen, to special classes for young men, and to meetings for Bible study and the advancement of spiritual life. At Lewisham he started a series of Sunday afternoon conferences with workingmen. These were attended by neighbouring clergy (who viewed the experiment with alarm), by Socialists, Secularists, and sometimes Anarchists, who were all allowed to speak and to express their opinions on the subject under discussion. These meetings were often excited, but always orderly, and wonderfully amenable to control from the chair. Mr. Gregory took the men into his confidence, and never hesitated to tell them that his one aim was to get them converted. As a matter of fact scores joined the Church who had first entered its doors to attend these meetings, and many of the men told Mr. Gregory that he was the only minister to whom they had ever spoken. When he left Lewisham, the secretary of the local Secularist Society attended the farewell meeting, on behalf of the Secularists, to express their regret at his removal.

EXTENSIVE LITERARY WORK.

No account of Mr. Gregory's career would be either accurate or adequate which did not specially emphasize his success in the world of literature. Born into a literary family, and cultivating a love of books from his earliest years, it is no surprise to his friends that he has made his mark in this department of Christian work. He was assistant to his father — the Wesleyan Connexional editor — during 1879-80, and after that continued to help him while in circuit work. For many years he edited the Christian Miscellany; was co-editor with Rev. W. L. Watkinson of two series of books entitled, "Helps Heavenward," and wrote an excellent volume in the first series on "Christian Childhood." He has also been editor of the Preachers' Magazine (a periodical which has a considerable circulation among preachers and Bible students) from its commencement. In this work Rev. Mark Guy Pearse was his colleague until 1900, but the responsibility for the magazine was always on Mr. Gregory's shoulders, and it was through his energy that it became an assured success.

Probably the most valuable work he has done in this direction has been the initiation and publication of a series of "Books for Bible Students," which now extends to thirty volumes; these are used as text-books in many Theological Colleges in England, Scotland, Canada, and the United States. Some 70,000 volumes have been already sold, and the circulation is steadily growing. Among other contributors are found such names as Professors Davison, Findlay, Banks, and Dr. Jas.

Hope Moulton. In recognition of this work and other services rendered to Biblical literature, Mr. Gregory was, in 1901, awarded the degree of D.D. from Montreal.

Early in the history of the Preachers' Magazine, Dr. Gregory established the Union for Biblical and Homiletic Study, which has now a membership of nearly 1,000, and has fostered and developed a love for Bible study in the minds of hundreds of young local preachers and others. Of this Union, he was secretary from the commencement of its career until the time when he was appointed vice-principal of the Children's Home. He was also secretary to the committee which compiled the "Young People's Hymnal"; and is now one of the secretaries of the committee to which the Wesleyan Conference has committed the important task of preparing a new hymn book.

HIS LABOUR FOR THE CHILDREN.

From his experience and work as a member of the committee, and as vice-principal of the Home, as well as by his personal characteristics, Dr. Gregory was specially fitted for the task which devolved on him when Dr. Stephenson retired. The interests of the institution have steadily advanced; and since his appointment as Principal, the annual income has increased by £5,500, and there has been a special development of work among crippled and afflicted children. A house has been acquired at Alverstoke, through the generosity of Mr. S. Chadwick—a member of the United Methodist Free Church—and a beginning has been made with sixteen of the most helpless and forlorn members of the great army of friendless and afflicted children. Two other additions have been made during the past year, viz., the Eric Townsend Memorial House at Edgworth—the gift of a gentleman in memory of his eldest son; and a new house for boys at the London branch, one of many gifts from the generous hand of Mrs. Clifford Davies.

The needs of the class of children for whom the Home provides are as great as ever, if not greater, and many very needy applicants for admission cannot be received for want of room. The new Principal is a man of ideas, and one who believes in progress, and he has already several new schemes for which he is trying to secure the Committee's sanction. A children's hospital, convalescent homes, cripples' workshops, and a new house for the reception of destitute children, are among the most crying needs of the moment. All these claims could be speedily met if the Lord's servants would recognise the claims of their less fortunate brothers and sisters, and support as they ought this most valuable and successful philanthropic and religious work. There will naturally be a further great extension of the work when the Twentieth Century Fund is completed, and the grant of £50,000 is paid. But this amount can only be spent on buildings, and will necessitate a large increase in the annual income of the Home, as its beneficent operations are thus extended.

The change to the new administration is now safely accomplished, though there have been many periods of grave anxiety during the time of transition. But Dr. Gregory is a firm believer in the power of prayer; and many times he has used this means of seeking deliverance in times of special difficulty. His custom is to call the community together for prayer in every crisis of the work—the children, office-staff, and work-people, all being included. The answers to prayer have been most definite, and have made a deep impression on the children and officers, while the influence of these meetings on the general work of the Homes has been singularly helpful.

There is also a "Young Leaguers' Union," which seeks to interest the young people of Christian and happy homes in their less fortunate brothers and sisters; we urge those of our readers who wish to see what can be made of the very roughest human material to study the annual report; or, better still, pay a visit to one or more of the branches of the Home, and see the results with their own eyes.

Deep Sea Fishermen.

FROM all the spheres of work of the Royal National Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen fresh tidings are continually received showing the usefulness both of the Medical Mission vessels and of the shore agencies.

Particularly encouraging have been the labours of the staff on the hospital steam trawler, the "Alpha." This vessel, which was given to the Mission by an anonymous donor about eighteen months since, is replete with every convenience both for fishing and for medical and religious work. The fleet also includes two hospital ships capable of nursing men who are ill or disabled by accident at sea, five dispensary vessels capable of rendering first aid to the sick and wounded, two old vessels used as harbour Mission stations, a new steamer, the "Strathcona;" as well as the launch, "Julia Sheridan," engaged in medical work on the Labrador coast; and the steam launch, "Princess May."

THE MINISTRY OF HEALING.

Deep and wide is the appreciation felt by the officers and men of the various fleets. One letter, typical of a sheaf of others, reads: "Allow me to thank the officers and crew of the Mission ship, 'Queen Victoria,' for the treatment I received while on board, suffering from scalds caused by the bursting of a tube on board a steam trawler. I am sure I should not have known what to have done if there had not been a Mission ship in the fleet. Both my eyes were completely closed, and both my arms were scalded, and it might have been days before I could have got home. But, thanks to your Mission ship, I was able to open my eyes the second day on board."

A Milford skipper writes:—"I should like to thank the Mission for the kind treatment and care my cook has had on board the Mission ship at Milford Dock. I put him on board with a poisoned hand, and I can well say he has had every attention and care while on board, and is now ready for sea again, within a week. The boy is working for a widowed mother, who I am sure would be more than grateful to the Mission for the kindness shown to her boy."

"I write to thank you," the quotation is from a smacksman's letter, "for the kindness and attention I received on board the 'Queen Victoria,' in the Grimsby Ice Company's Fleet, for I had a very bad poisoned thumb, and everything was done to heal it that could be; but amputation was necessary to the first joint, which was successfully and ably performed by the doctor, and it is now quite well."

STEAMSHIPS OR SAILING VESSELS?

Steam Mission vessels are, of course, necessary, in order to keep up with the steam fishing fleets, and the "Alpha" has been so signally blessed that the Society is sparing no effort to secure similar vessels to be despatched to those fleets which at present are accompanied only by sailing Mission vessels. It often happens that these sailing ships lose the fleets in which they are stationed, and this means the absence for some days of these havens of refuge for bodily ills and temples of peace for those needing spiritual advice.

The second steam hospital ship, the "Queen Alexandra," is rapidly approaching completion, and it is expected that she will be in commission in about two months' time. There still remains £800 to be raised to complete this vessel, and it is also desired to commence a third at as early a date as possible.

The secretary of the Mission is Mr. Francis H. Wood, Bridge House, 181, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.

Baptist Deaconesses.

THE influence of consecrated womanhood in the alleviation of the miseries of the sick and suffering poor, and in the proclamation of the Gospel among the non-church-going masses, received fresh and fervent recognition at the annual meeting of the Baptist Deaconesses' Home and Mission, held last week at Bloomsbury Chapel, of which Rev. B. T. Gibbon is the minister.

THE MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

From the account given by Rev. E. Henderson, Warden of the Home, of the year's operations, it appears that good progress is being made. The out-stationed deaconesses, who labour in a number of the large provincial cities, and in the London suburbs, are greatly esteemed for their godly service. In connection with the Mission centre at Cross Street, E.C., in the notorious Leather Lane district, religious and philanthropic work is maintained with far-reaching effects. A noteworthy feature is the medical department, carried on with skill and devotion, to the manifest advantage of so squalid a neighbourhood.

Dr. Lush, medical superintendent, in a brief account of his labours, showed that over 2,300 cases had been dealt with during the past twelve months. At the dispensary, where Dr. Lush attends weekly, a Gospel service is held, and at a nominal charge tea is subsequently provided for the out-patients. A large number of surgical and medical cases have been tended by the sisters, and many a helpless sufferer nursed into convalescence.

STORIES FROM LEATHER LANE.

A vivid sketch of life in the slums, and of the sisters' ministry to the spiritual and social needs of the "one-roomed home" population, was given by Sister Constance, the lady superintendent, who drew from her experience in the slums many touching stories and incidents, illustrative of the power of the Gospel among the "ice-cream barrow painters" and other poor folks of the vicinity, and of the helpful influence of the mission. A sister noticed at a tea, that one little boy placed his allowance of cake in his pocket, and on being asked the reason, replied, "Well, I've had the bread and butter, and seen the magic-lantern, but I think mother ought to have the cake." Visiting a dying atheist in a hospital, one of the sisters was refused a hearing by him, although she had undertaken the journey at the request of his sister. At length he repented, and in response to a message the deaconess again visited him. "Tell me," he cried, "if there's hope for a bad man like me." She explained the Gospel to him, and read passages from the Bible, when the repentant sinner believed on the Lord Jesus, as she read the words, "The blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin." Next, he besought her to bring as many of his boon companions as she could to his bedside, that he might testify to them of saving grace. This was done, and, later, he passed away, gasping "The blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin."

Sister Constance went on to speak of the dismal surroundings of the district, particularizing an "outhouse" home, and a dark cellar in which lived a poor family. A pathetic story of struggle was that of a brother and sister, aged seventy-four and sixty-seven respectively, who had never been separated. The old man refused to enter the infirmary, declining to be parted from his sister after so many years, and, in spite of the care and skill of the missioners, passed away. The sister is being cared for by the deaconesses.

A CALL FOR WORKERS.

Other speakers included Messrs. G. W. McAlpine, J.P. (chairman) and D. Ford Goddard, M.P., both of whom spoke in high terms of the mission; and Sisters May (Ipswich) and Hilda (Woodberry Down, N.), who gave telling accounts of the work at their respective spheres of labour. Christian ladies are needed, to devote themselves to deaconess work, the applications that have been received from churches being far in excess of the number available.

Other Lands.

India's Present Need.—II.

THAT the highest ethics can never be a substitute for Evangelical teaching, or attain to the value of its results, is certain, and it is here that the missionary problem comes in.

More than once, missions have been the forerunners of Governments. When the first Protestant missionaries landed at Tranquebar, in 1706, the establishment of schools was one of their earlier efforts. Wherever they work on educational lines, the Word of God is made the pivot of instruction. When we meet English-speaking natives, we ask, "Where have you learned your English?" and almost invariably the answer is, "In the Mission School." Questioned as to the Bible, the man will give a clear summary of its contents, and often show an intelligent knowledge of the way of salvation. Turn to the native who never had this opportunity, but picked up his English as he went along. He is a staunch Hindu, and most in earnest when worshipping his gods. But what does he know about them? Several times we ventured to ask, the last time of our travelling servant, after he had prostrated himself before the repulsive image of "the terrible Kali," "Who is that?" "This is goddess Kali." "Who is Kali?" "Kali is Kali—the wife of a god—goddess Kali." This was all, and no more we could get out of him by way of explanation. Others seemed equally ignorant on the subject of their religion.

INDUSTRIAL TRAINING.

The need of industrial training has been recognised by many missions for some time past, but never has the problem so imperatively confronted nearly every mission in India as in recent years. Through this medium, many thousands of lives have been saved from starvation, and gathered into homes. These lives, mostly young, form now a sacred charge. It is not enough to feed them. They must be prepared for a useful future, their latent powers developed, and means of livelihood put at their disposal. How is this to be effected? Not without further sacrifices on the part of those who recognise their Christian duty towards their unfortunate Indian brothers and sisters. By helping missionaries to make of the young generation under their charge Christian men and women, they will help to solve India's problem.

It is universally acknowledged that the greatest curse of this land is

THE CASTE SYSTEM.

Able-bodied men and women will live by begging, while they scorn the idea of work, as degrading to their caste. The thief will consider it his right to steal, because he is a thief by inheritance. It would be no merit to him to be an honest man, for in the eyes of the other castes he would always remain a thief.

Nothing has made such a breach in this absurd system as the recent famines and their consequences. The first thing that is pressed upon the mind by the missionaries is that God made of one blood all men on the face of the earth; and the second is that work is elevating and not degrading. Caste has made of human beings men "of one idea" in the bad sense of the word, and that is, just to do one thing and to do it to-morrow. Industrial education, hand in hand with the training of soul and mind, proposes to make of them all-round men and women, able to reach a high moral standard, because grounded on the firm foundation of the Word of God. Said a Hindu gentleman to us as we looked down from the Mutiny Memorial Tower upon the city of Delhi:—

"It is the duty of our rulers, and especially of the Christian section, to extend a helping hand to us in developing manufactures, of which there is a dire need in the country. There are anti-Christian papers sneering at the industrial efforts of missions, and calling it 'Buying converts'; but, according to my judgment, this is not buying or pauperising, but making them independent." He had confessed to us, the day before, that he was an inquirer after Christianity. What lay in his mind, was independence of the cruel caste system.

DIFFICULTIES OF A CONVERT.

We English people, of whom so many have literally been coaxed into the Kingdom, do not realize the tremendous difficulties that beset a Hindu convert. By confessing Christ, we did not lose anything in respectability; perhaps we gained in the esteem of our environment. To the Hindu, open confession means the loss of everything, of property, affection, family ties, means of livelihood, respect of his caste, and safety of life. What he sees of the conduct of passing trippers from the Christian land does not always tend to strengthen the missionary influence over him. We conclude that Christian testimony must be almost entirely left to preachers and evangelists; for each time we speak to a native about his soul, he either asks, "Are you a clergyman?" or says, "One can see that you are a minister."

Rev. James Smith, of Ahmednagar, mentioned in a former letter, is an enthusiast on the Industrial Mission subject. Speaking from nine years' experience, he finds that manual training is a moral force to develop mental discipline, observation, reflection, and straightforwardness. Three industries are taught in connection with his school. (1) Carpentry, including turning and carving; (2) Oriental rug and carpet weaving (it may be said here, by the way, that India produces the wool, the dyes, and the labour, for the finest carpets); (3) Hammered metal work, or repoussé. Each student has to spend three hours daily in the workshop, learning one or other of the above-mentioned industries, and this does not handicap in any way the pupils in their school examinations. The brightest boys are sometimes those who are the most skilful at the bench.

The result, on the whole, is so encouraging, and the demand for work is so great, that the director of the Ahmednagar High Schools is of the opinion that industrial education should become a more general feature in India. No less strongly does the Industrial Missions Aid Society emphasize the need of this enterprise on a larger scale.

In compliance with a request, the Government gave a grant of 10,000 rupees to Rev. W. Park, of the M.E. Mission, for such a purpose. On our visit to Nariad, we saw him busy with the arrangements, directing, instructing, putting up looms, which would enable the weaver to do in half a day the work of three days, and other improved time-saving implements by means of which the people's wages might be increased. This effort answers to the proposal of Dr. Murdoch, who says that it is of little benefit to the working class to reduce taxations like that on salt, but of very great importance to create conditions for the people which would allow them to earn more and to live better. One's heart aches at the tale how, during the famine, men and women pressed to the mission-stations, willing to work for 1 anna (an English penny) per day. It is true that the food it purchased was as much in quantity as they could eat; but in many cases the weakened stomach could not digest it, and numbers died, whose lives might have been saved by a less unsuitable diet.

In order to prevent pauperism, the M.E. Mission made it a principle only to give relief in exchange for work. At Nariad 5,000 people were supported for six months by weaving.

FIGURES ARE DECEPTIVE.

To hear of so many thousands having been relieved by this and that mission, one feels, especially at a distance, inclined to be satisfied with what is being done. But what are thousands compared with millions? Generous as many gifts were, they form but a drop in the vast ocean of need. The missions are handicapped in their well doing, and in the extension of their work, because of the struggle for bare existence. The actual problem is not, how to feed paupers, but how to prevent pauperism.

WILMA MORGAN.

British East Africa.

A UNIQUE work for the uplifting of the tribes of the East Africa Protectorate has been done by the Neukirchen Evangelical Mission, a German agency named after the Rhineland town in which the headquarters of the Mission are situate. The district known as Tanaland, which passed by agreement from the protection of Germany to Great Britian a few years ago, has engaged special attention; and notwithstanding political changes, the work has developed in a very encouraging manner. The missionaries are devoted men of God; they command the fullest confidence of the authorities, and have been warmly praised for their Christian prudence in discharging duties at once arduous and difficult.

Begun in 1887, the work has steadily grown, and now there are nine missionaries on the field. The stations number six, and there are seven native helpers. An influence has been exerted far beyond the ostensible results in converts baptized and adherents brought under Christian instruction. One of the missionaries, Herr Kraft, has brought out the entire New Testament in the Pokomo language. Who can measure the importance of such a work of love? In the course of a recent furlough home, the missionary has been passing translation work through the press in connection with the British and Foreign Bible Society.

A few days ago the worker's furlough came to an end, and with his beloved wife he left home and friends once more for his distant sphere. A student in the Mission Institute at Neukirchen (Kr. Moers, Rhenish Prussia) writes: "The farewell service lasted from three o'clock till seven: and included an observance of the Lord's Supper. It was a solemn season, and likely never to be forgotten by those present. Songs and prayers, as well as the words spoken, will be a help to the heart in coming days. Next morning Brother Kraft and wife left. Nearly all of us men followed on foot the waggonette that took them to Capellan, an hour or so distant. Here they took leave of their children—little boys of about seven and four years; it was a most touching sight. The train came up, and last 'good-byes' were said. Thus the Master thrusts forth labourers into his great vineyard. God forbid that we should sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray (1 Sam. xii. 23) for those who, for the love of Christ and the souls of men, go to distant lands to preach the glorious Gospel."

The "Casa Sarepta," Florence.

THIS Home for destitute, aged, Christian Italian women was opened recently. Five poor widows have already been received from different parts of Italy, and two others are about to be admitted. They have each a sad history of toil and hardship, semi-starvation, and persecution. The good Sister in charge of the Home says it is touching to hear them join in praise to the Lord for bringing them out of this misery to such a haven of rest. They can scarcely realize that it is not all a dream.

These inmates are nearly all over seventy, and most of them helpless and ill, so the Home partakes also of the nature of a hospital. We have been saddened to-day by the death of one dear old woman, who only came to the Home five days ago. "The Lord just brought her here to die in peace and comfort," said another of them, and, indeed, it was even so. It is hoped that this good work may be liberally sustained, so that we may see our way to receive many other suffering ones.

A Pitiable Advertisement.—A Romanist contemporary has an appeal for funds which is remarkable even in the midst of a number of peculiar announcements. It is stated in it that "this is the third Christmas that the Infant Jesus is looking for a dwelling-place in Totnes, and still cannot get but a borrowed one, for to secure the temporary chapel £500 has had to be borrowed. Readers are implored "for the love of the Infant Jesus" to help in paying the sum "in order to secure Him at last in this powerless mission a real home!"

BARMAIDS IN CALCUTTA.

WE are informed that the statement recently made that the employment of barmaids in Calcutta was prohibited in deference to native opinion was incorrect. "The agitation against the present condition of things," writes Rev. F. W. Dunster (Anglo-Indian Evangelization Society, Dinapore), "was the outcome of Christian sentiment, and the change was brought about by Christian effort. Mrs. Brockway, the wife of the pastor of Union Church (L.M.S.), took a leading part in this agitation."

ZEALOUS FILIPINOS.

Rejoicing in the good work which the Lord is doing in the Philippine Islands, Mrs. White Jansen adds: "We are anxious for your help in prayer for the thousands of Filipino seekers. The converts in their eager desire to answer the plea of the seekers, and to spread the Gospel among their people, are very much inclined to neglect Bible study and to hold services instead . . . The Gospel was taught secretly in this town of Cavite by the Moravian missionaries. As one of the results of their work there remained thirty-five men, mostly young, who were deeply interested in the Gospel. I presume they were converted. Probably there were more persons interested; but these were known to the priests, who got the Spanish Government to arrest them under the false pretext that they were rebels. A very short time before the occupation of the Americans, twenty-one were publicly shot in the parade ground of their native place."

TRESCLÉOUX.

This unfamiliar name is borne by one of the remote villages of Les Hautes Alpes, in the South of France, the poorest and coldest region in the whole country. Here Protestantism withstood the influence of the secular arm, and remained strong, notwithstanding the terrible persecutions of more than two centuries. It bears to-day the stamp of the ancient patriarchal customs of the brave Huguenots. For twenty years the Protestant pastor of Tresciéoux—F. Bravais—has lived in the same rented house. Now he is obliged to move out, as the landlord requires it for his own use. In this old-world village houses are scarce, and the little church of 300 members—all poor—has to face the problem of building a manse. They have given liberally, contributing at the outset some £40, and promising to help the building operations by carrying the stone and otherwise performing much of the unskilled labour. There is now about £120 in hand, but £400 more at least is needed.

CHARLOTTENBURG, BERLIN.

Our many friends will be glad to know that the Lord has graciously sustained us throughout another year in his service for Him here and continued his blessing upon our family and upon his work, in which we have been engaged these twenty-one years. We may well praise Him. He has continued to us bodily health, mental vigour, and spiritual power, regularly to preach the Gospel, to conduct Bible readings, Sunday-school work, and to go on visiting among the people here; and we have had the joy of leading not a few to trust in a living and coming Lord. My dear wife has also been able to continue her meetings with the women and to visit the homes of the people, also our eldest daughter to continue her Bible classes with young women, though for the past two and a half months she has been laid aside with a most serious attack of peritonitis, from which she is only slowly recovering. Our three sons and two daughters are on the Lord's side, and more or less in his service. Many English friends who came to study the language have found the Lord while here and are serving Him in various spheres. In looking back, we can say, "Eben-Ezer"—hitherto the Lord hath helped us; in looking up, we say, "Hallelujah," for the Lord liveth; and in looking forward we will say, "Jehovah-Jireh"—the Lord will provide.

TEACHING GIRLS IN ALGERIA.

In a recent communication from Cherchell, Miss H. Duval Day (of the North Africa Mission) writes:—"We still have a goodly number of children, though those of the better class have fallen off. It was distinctly encouraging, and a cure for depressed spirits, to find they are still willing to listen to us, and to hear their neighbours' praises of 'your girls.' They really are morally superior to those who have never been under our influence. How I wish I could say some of them are Christians? But we look for that joy before long. One of those, Miss Readsaw, has been away a long time in Medcah and Blidsh, but her great pleasure is to sing the hymns she learnt with us. She knows quite through 'Nothing but the Blood of Jesus,' 'Only trust Him,' 'Him that cometh,' 'Come to the Saviour,' 'Christ receiveth sinful men,' and some others; but her favourite tune is 'There is a green hill far away,' so she sings them all to that same tune, and she told Miss R. she had taught them to a lot of girls in the places where she had been while away. Certainly, her neighbours here seemed to know them well."

GOD'S DAY FOR BRAZIL.

Mr. J. D. McEwen (Orobo, Bahia) writes:—"There never was a time in the history of Bahia when the Gospel was so sought. In a recent tour of some months I found villages, withdrawn from the larger towns, that never saw a missionary before. It was so easy to get an audience. Sometimes it was in a little "venda," sometimes on the corner, and sometimes in a hut-home. 'We are brutes. We do not know anything,' was a common thing to hear. 'You are not brutes, you are men and women; you have power to learn and be good, and Jesus wants to give you his power,' I told them. It is really pitiable to see how these inhabitants of the forests of Brazil feel their need of a better life.

"In the larger places of the interior, our reception is often phenomenal. Dr. G. W. Chamberlain has travelled with me during the last five weeks. We have touched towns of 5,000 and 10,000 souls, where the Camara, or Municipal Hall, was always at our disposal. In one town the crowd was so great that standing room was at a premium. Bibles were eagerly bought, and a decidedly earnest spirit manifest during the four days. This is God's day for Brazil. Whole families have confessed their faith in the Lord Jesus, have broken their images, and have sat down at the Lord's Table."

Dr. T. L. Cuyler.

THE eightieth birthday of the venerable Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler, of Brooklyn, on Friday, January 10, was made the occasion of many private, and not a few public, testimonials of esteem and affection. On Sunday morning he preached to his old congregation in the Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn. His subject was "A Message at Fourscore," and his topic, "Hope." Below are two noteworthy paragraphs from his discourse.

HOW HE HAS REACHED EIGHTY.

Some have a pitiful dread of old age. To-day, instead of being a matter of sorrow, it is a matter of joy to me that I have reached such a ripe old age. By avoiding stimulating drinks and indigestible foods, by getting sound and sufficient sleep, I have been enabled to spend fifty-six years in the Christian ministry, and I have never passed a Sabbath on a bed of sickness.

THE OCTOBER OF LIFE.

The October of life may be one of the best months in all the calendar. If a man never outlives his trust and hope in God, why should not the later years be the happiest of his life? Then one has friends ahead of him and friends behind. Oh, my friends ahead, perhaps your old pastor will come to join you before the close of the year. Toward evening the sun shines with peculiar sweetness and mellowness. So with a departing Christian. Every hour he is gaining new light, new knowledge.

News from Chicago.

THAT saying was never truer that God takes away his servants, but He carries on his work. Ever since the departure of Mr. D. L. Moody to the homeland, the work in connection with the institute, and the church in this city, was never in such a flourishing condition as it is now. Perhaps there were never such a large number of students as we have in the various departments now. In all, 250, including men and lady students, are studying the Word of God, which is to equip them for future work. All the students, who were here three years ago, are scattered far and wide the world over; some of them preaching in fashionable churches; others of them in mining towns, in log huts on the rolling prairies, and in far-away Japan, are witnessing for the Lord Jesus, and even some who went out to China have already become martyrs for the truth.

Mr. Torrey, whose name is so well known in England, and who is the superintendent of the Institute, has just started on a tour around the world, visiting Japan, China, Australia, and other centres where some of the former students have gone, and we are praying that he may be greatly used in all the cities that he shall visit. During his absence of twelve months, well-known teachers will be lecturing to the students, amongst the number, Dr. A. T. Pierson and Rev. George C. Needham.

Mr. Fitt, who came from Ireland, and who is a son-in-law of Mr. Moody's, is superintending the work here in a very devoted manner, and the Lord is abundantly blessing the work in his hands, and he and all the workers need the prayers and sympathy of the people in Great Britain.

A revival spirit seems to be abroad, not only in this city but on this continent. Hundreds of missions are being held, and from all sides, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, one hears of glorious results.

It is my privilege to be preaching and lecturing in this city two and three times a day, and in Mr. Moody's old church it is our joy to see the most blessed work of grace going on. Hundreds of people have been under conviction, and it has been the delight of the workers to be dealing with many anxious souls in the inquiry room up to a late hour, many of whom have decided for the Lord Jesus Christ.

I met Mr. Sankey when I was in New York City. He seems just as fresh and as energetic as ever, and the Lord is greatly blessing him in various cities.

Many of your readers will be sorry to hear that Mr. Stebbins has been laid aside from active service, but we are praying and hoping that he and Mr. McGranahan, may be restored to health, and once again used mightily in the Lord's service.

We are having blessed times in connection with prison work, and only recently I had some 800 convicts to preach to, and it was a scene that I shall hardly ever forget.

From Madame de Ramsay.

SUCH a long time has elapsed since English friends have heard from us. The Rescue Homes are progressing in an encouraging manner. I share the work with my daughters, and am continuing the various agencies, through God's mercy, with undiminished mental and bodily powers. This year is one of jubilees for me. The Bible and Prayer Union, the first foreign branch started after Rev. T. Richardson's plan, has accomplished twenty-five years of blessed existence, as thousands of souls yearly testify. Also the Christmas Letter Mission, started at Wilhelmsro twenty-five years ago, survives many difficulties. I send parcels before Christmas to foreign ports where Scandinavian Sailors' Missions are founded, and many letters testify how acceptable they are. Swedish hospitals, poor-houses, Sunday schools, are also very grateful to have a packet year by year. At these two quiet missions I continue myself, as the only subscriber and worker about 4,000 members have given their names. At Wilhelmsro it is a thirty years' jubilee, 1872-1902, a wonderful privilege to have been sustained so long.

The Basutoland Mission.—It is a pleasure to be able to state that Rev. A. Casalis, B.D., who will be in London during February, is expected to address many meetings of Christian people. He will specially dwell upon the development of native work, it being his part to train evangelists for labour among the various tribes in Basutoland and beyond. Many of his addresses will take the form of lantern lectures, and the first of these will be given in the Mildmay Conference Hall on Tuesday, April 4, beginning at 7.30. Over a dozen other gatherings have been arranged, Tunbridge Wells, Folkestone, and Torquay being also visited. There are still a few dates open, regarding which communications may be addressed to Mrs. Sutherland Taylor, 25, Brownswood Road, Clissold Park, London, N.

About Motor-Cars.

I WONDER how many of you are interested in motor-cars. No doubt you envy the people who ride in them, and travel along at such a delightful speed. But perhaps some of you think they are "horrid things," because sometimes they frighten horses in which you are more interested. Well, you know, the same was said of bicycles, years ago, and I expect in time the horses will get as accustomed to motors as to them. I don't know much about motor-cars myself, but I have noticed one thing about a certain kind, which forms the subject of my talk this week.

I daresay you have seen one standing still, and that although it is not moving, yet it throbs and vibrates with the movement of the machinery inside, which, I always think, must be very unpleasant for the people sitting on it, and enough to give them the "fidgets." I am told that it does not do to stop the machinery, except at the end of a journey, owing to the difficulty of re-starting; but that when you want to stop for a short time you move a lever, which shifts a band from the "fly-wheel" on to the "driving-wheel," and thus applies the force of the engine for the purpose of forward movement.

Are not lots of boys and girls (and grown-ups) like that? They have plenty of force in their character, which is full of ideas and promises and good intentions, but somehow they do not apply them to forward movement, or action. Their ideas do not take useful shape; their promises are not fulfilled; their good intentions are not carried out. Perhaps your parents have scolded you sometimes for these very things.

You remember our Lord told his disciples about a young man whose father said to him, "Son, go work to-day in my vineyard," and he said, "I go, sir!" and went not (Matt. xxi 30). He not only disobeyed his father, but disappointed him, because he led him to expect more than he was willing to fulfil.

Now, I trust I am speaking to those who are not wilfully disobedient either to your parents or to God; but for all that, my little lesson may apply to you. Although you are young, your minds are full of ideas—good ones, I hope—and the machinery is at work. But then, is it producing any practical result? You need to apply it to some useful purpose. You mean to do all sorts of right things, but do you do them? Are you trying to make your life one of progress—at school, and above all in the Christian life? Some of you have been learning the lessons taught in our "Young People's Page" for months or years. Are you better and more useful boys and girls because of them? Do your parents, friends, and teachers see that you are making progress?

When your birthday comes you stand up against a wall to mark your height, and consider how much you have grown since last year. Do you ever consider how much you have "grown in grace, and in the knowledge of your Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ"?

You have been learning your daily lessons at school, and the spiritual teaching of your church and Sunday-school, but it is not enough to let these things throb and vibrate in your mind and heart; you need to set them in motion, to practise what you learn. If you have ideas in your mind as to how to keep and bless other people, put them in motion; if you make promises see that you fulfil them, so that people may feel they can trust and rely on you; if you have good intentions, carry them out; if you want to please Jesus in your life, look out for opportunities of doing so.

Never be a boy or girl who says, "I go," and goes not. Yield to Jesus the lever of your will, so that your good intentions may pass from the fly-wheel (which goes round and round, and nothing more) and get on to the driving-wheel, to put a forward movement into your life. Ask Him to be your Engineer, to guide you through the traffic, to thread your way through the temptations and obstacles around you; to regulate your speed, and conduct you safely.

Of course, you must be careful not to let Satan take the driving-seat of your heart, because he would use all the force of your character to take you in the wrong direction, which would lead you into all sorts of evil and unhappiness.

So whenever you see a motor car, think of what I have been saying; do not be content with bustling about like a clown at a circus, making a lot of fuss without doing any good, and getting into everybody else's way; or like the machinery, making a lot of noise and smell without any forward movement; but be like St. Paul, who said, "This one thing I do. I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" (Phil. iii. 13, 14).

But I wonder if in some of you the machinery of right desires has not yet begun to work at all? If so, you are like the other young man in the parable, who said, "I will not go." But he afterwards repented and went. Will you do the same? Jesus says, "Follow Me," and if up to now you have said, "I will not," now is the time to change your mind (that is what the word repent means). Ask Him to set in motion the silent machinery of your heart with the spark of his great love—to "create in you a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within you"; to set your life in motion to praise and glorify Him, and make you a blessing to those around you.

The other night I heard a gentleman speak of three classes of people—workers, shirkers, and quirkers! The first are busy folk; the second, lazy ones; the third, those who find fault with other people. Mind you get into the first class, and, whatever you do, keep out of the other two. UNCLE TOM.

"Is Not the Lord Among Us?"

Micah iii. 11.

"SUPPOSING Jesus in their company,"
At ease they journeyed on their homeward way,
"For surely He is somewhere near," quoth they.
What could He else but follow faithfully?
But, Jesus was not there—nay, He must needs
Grow further from them, as each step they took,
Until they turned, and their own path forsook,
For Jesus followeth not—He only leads.
'Twas but a day they journeyed thus in vain;
But, to retrace their steps and find Him, cost
Three days. Alas! His presence, lightly lost,
Oft means long, weary searching to regain.
And when they found Him, was it He to blame
For all their sorrow? Should they not have known
He must be busied with one work alone?
They ne'er had lost Him had they been the same.

The Red-Marked Testament.—The demand for the Red-Marked Testament—for use in mission and Bible-class work, both in England and America—is on the increase. Instances frequently come to light of this little volume leading to a clear, or clearer grasp of the one foundation, the substitutionary work of Christ. Indeed, from cottage to mansion, workers of every denomination find it most helpful; and, being small, and of small cost, together with the possibility of circulating it through the post, makes it the greater boon. Even workers in the mines and camps of South Africa and Australia make frequent mention of how much it is valued. What is clearer than the simple Word of God to ensure, through the Spirit of God, fruit in the future as well as the present? International S.S. Lesson.

Sunday, February 9, 1902.

Subject.—"The sin of lying" (Acts iv. 32—v. 11). Golden Text: Eph. iv. 25.

THE persecution described in the last lesson worked entirely different results from that anticipated by the rulers. Instead of scattering the followers of Jesus, and putting a stop to their teaching, it drew them more closely together around their Lord in fervent prayer for increased boldness to speak his Word.

The prayer-meeting held on the release of the Apostles from the Court of the Sanhedrim was remarkable for (1) Oneness of heart and voice among the members (24); (2) Immediate and definite answer given (31 and 33); (3) "All filled with the Holy Ghost" (31); (4) Power to speak the Word of God with boldness; (5) Spirit of unity, love, and brotherly-kindness; (6) Great power to witness of the resurrection; (7) Great grace upon them all (33); "As one man in belief and practice" (John xvii. 21).

Verses 34, 35. There were many poor among the converts. If a Jew would turn and "follow Jesus," he had then, as now, "to leave all"—home, relatives, friends, work. This was a test to the rich converts. The Holy Spirit led them into the truth (John xvi. 13) that their riches were talents to be used for God (Matt. xxv. 15; 1 Tim. vi. 17, 18), and showed them how to use them (Mark xiv. 7). Self-denial a sign (and help) to growth in grace (Luke ix. 23).

Joses, Joseph, Barnabas, "son of exhortation" (R.V.), consecrated his eloquence to preaching the Gospel, and his land to the Lord for his poor. Estate in Cyprus (not Canaan, because a Levite—Deut. x. 9; Col. iv. 10; Acts xii. 12, 25). Character (Acts xi. 24). Introduced Saul to the Apostles (Acts ix. 27). Accompanied Paul on mission tours (Acts xi. 26; xiii. 2). Cyprus (Acts xiii. 4).

1. How should we describe Ananias and Sapphira in present-day language?

Persons who wanted to appear better than they were, who pretended to be very religious, charitable, and self-denying, but were all the time covetous and untruthful. None were compelled to sell their possessions for the poor (v. 4), or give the full value (Ex. xxiv. 5).

Neither of them volunteered an untruthful statement to the Apostles; but both "agreed together" to act the lie; and Sapphira, who had an extra opportunity given her by Peter to draw back, assented to his question (perhaps with a mental reservation as a salve to her conscience). But no trickery could hide their sin from the searchlight of God's Holy Spirit (Prov. xv. 3; 1 Sam. xvi. 7; Jer. xvii. 10).

2. What excuse could they have given?

"That Satan tempted them." Eve gave the same (Gen. iii. 13). Temptation is not sin. Jesus was tempted (Heb. iv. 15 and Matt. iv. 1). "We cannot prevent evil birds flying over our heads, but we can prevent them making nests in our hair" (James iv. 7; Eph. iv. 27).

3. When Satan filled the heart of Ananias with wicked thoughts, what should he have done?

Cried up to God for help (Psa. cxx. 2). God saw the "thoughts afar off" (Psa. cxxxix. 2, 4; Matt. ix. 4, with Psa. cxlv. 18, 19). Instead of which he nursed the wicked thoughts till they became wishes, then he talked about them with his wife, and they both together fed them with their selfishness till they came out in a wicked action.

The Wages of Sin IS
- Desiring men's praise.
- Entrapped by Satan.
- Acting the lie.
- Taken in sin.
- Hopelessly lost.

Satan's language is—lies (John viii. 44).
Satan's work is—sin (1 John iii. 8).
Satan's wages is—death (Rom. vi. 23).
Satan's home is—hell (Matt. xxv. 41).

If we talk his language and do his work, may we not expect his wages, and to go to his home? (Rev. xxi. 8.)

Thank God for Rom. vi. 23; John xiv. 2; Rev. xxi. 27; Rev. xxii. 3, 4, 5 and 17.
- Loved of God.
- Indwelt by his Spirit.
- Forgiven in Christ.
- Eternally saved.

Are truths that are half lies, lies that are half truths, flatteries (Psa. xii. 3), exaggerations, invectives, expletives, strong and uncalled for exclamations, to be included in the language of Satan, or left for "the lip of truth"? (Prov. xii. 19; Psa. cxx. 2; and cxli. 3). A man's whole life may be a lie, and yet not one be uttered by his lips. A LIE IS AN ATTEMPT TO DECEIVE, WHETHER BY WORD OR ACT.

If Satan cannot mar God's work from the outside by persecution, he will try to do so from the inside by temptation. A very small hand can lift the inner latch of the castle gate, and so give entrance to the enemy (Pro. xxiv. 9; 2 Cor. x. 5). Satan cannot force the followers of Christ to commit sin.

Christian Endeavour Day (Twenty-first Birth Day.)

Past, Future (Ps. cxxvi).

MANY happy returns of the day all round! Thank God for Dr. and Mrs. Clark, and the noble fellow-workers who have gathered round them in all lands. Love and goodwill to our fellow-Endeavourers in the United States! Endeavourers everywhere, rejoice on the attainment of your majority! What hath God wrought in these few years, during which our great and glorious movement has spread like a network into all the world, securing "Glory to God in the highest and goodwill towards men"!

It is pleasant to turn to this "song of ascent" sung by pilgrims on their way from every part of Palestine to the great temple festivals, and, therefore, well becoming us in our pilgrimage from all lands to the heavenly city. The Psalm itself dates from the return after the Babylonish captivity when, under Ezra and Nehemiah, the exiles were brought again to Zion. It seemed like a happy dream. Laughter and song passed from lip to lip, and even surrounding nations acknowledged what great things God had done. Associated with all the past, there was eager prayer, as they stood together on the threshold of coming years, and asked that what had been done in deliverance from the outward exile might have its counterpart in deliverance from all internal dissension and spiritual deadness. They desired streams of blessing, as when the dry watercourses of southern lands, from which the winter flood has long since died away, become filled again with dancing, brimming wavelets. Tears had been plentiful. The Psalmist liked to think of them as seeds—every tear the seed of ten and fifty-fold of joy—and dared to anticipate that, bitter as had been the sowing, it would be more than compensated for by the exuberance of the harvest home.

The Past.—I leave it to others to provide the figures of our remarkable increase, only recording my personal thankfulness that, so far as I know, there has been no approach of misunderstanding or division like that which has risen in so many of these great movements in the past. I can only express my hope that as it has been, so it will be, and that the time may never come when there shall be any cleavage in our great and noble movement.

The Future.—Amongst the perils, I think, what we should carefully guard against is that of allowing ourselves to become superficial. There is such a tendency to undertake too much work. On all hands there is so much imperious need that we are apt to cover too much ground. This can only lead to the same heads, hearts, and hands being overtaxed by too much detail, and becoming worried and burdened. This must not be. Better do less, and allow time for fellowship with God. I never shall forget my dear friend, Mr. Hudson Taylor, telling me that before he accepted an engagement he always considered how far it might prevent him having his quiet hours for prayer and study of the Word. I am persuaded that one way by which Satan tries to hinder our usefulness is in crowding upon us too many details. Speaking generally, no young person should be on more than one committee; and if we are working in connection with the Christian Endeavour, it becomes us to be very careful as to what other Christian agencies we are assisting.

A thoughtful man, who had examined a great many young men applying for training in theological colleges, told me that in his experience, which had been confirmed by the remarks of others, there was a superficiality about many who called themselves Endeavourers. It seemed to show that too much stress was being laid upon speeches, machinery, and activity, whilst too little attention was being given to the more solid foundations of a strong, thoughtful, well-equipped Christian.

In conclusion, let us turn again to our Psalm. Let every one of us become a sower bearing seed: that is, for ourselves prayer, study, and pains, which cost something; and for others, wholesome words, the holy influence of consistent lives, as well as Gospels, tracts, booklets. By word and act let us sow beside all waters. Let us saturate our seed with our tears and prayers. Let us give ourselves up to the guidance of the Holy Spirit, that we may know where to cast our seed. Let us be stimulated by examples like that of a young man attending one of my Bible classes, who in two years has won for God as many as seventeen of the young fellows of the warehouse where he is employed; and let us be sure that sooner or later we shall reap, if we faint not. It is not enough to help our own associates. We must go forth to seek the definite conversion to God of the unsaved—one by one.

Free Distribution of the Scriptures.

THE LATE MRS. ROBERTSON.

ON January 15 many of our readers lost a friend on earth by the death of Mrs. Robertson, the beloved and honoured foundress of the Association for the Free Distribution of the Scriptures, and who for many years carried on its work as honorary secretary. She was widely known as one who never spared either herself or her means in helping on this much-loved work which God had so evidently laid on her heart, and which He gave her the strength and courage to establish and carry on in spite of the great initial difficulties and opposition which had to be overcome.

"This happy work!" she always called it, and ever felt it the highest honour that she had been the chosen instrument in God's hand for commencing it. In the forthcoming report of the Association's work during the past year, any changes in address or otherwise, which the Committee may deem it necessary to make through Mrs. Robertson's lamented decease, will be made known.

Meanwhile, Mrs. A. E. Pridham (who took up the work of honorary secretary ten years ago, when failing sight obliged Mrs. Robertson to relinquish it) appeals with confidence to the members of the Association to uphold her hands, and by their sympathy and co-operation to enable her to continue a work begun with much prayer, and abundantly owned of God.

Day of Prayer for Students.

A CALL to observe the annual day of universal prayer for students has been issued on behalf of the World's Student Christian Federation—signed by Mr. Karl Fries (chairman, Stockholm) and Mr. John R. Mott (general secretary, 3, West 29th Street, New York)—from which we give the following extracts:—

Reports received from over thirty countries give facts showing that the observance of this day of prayer has been attended with most gratifying spiritual results in all parts of the world. The General Committee calls upon all Christian student organizations, and upon Christians in general, to observe Sunday, February 9, 1902, as a day of special prayer on behalf of students.

The past few years have witnessed an unprecedented multiplication of Christian student organizations, and a world-wide extension of the student Christian movement. There is needed a correspondingly great intensive work. This must come in large degree through prayer. The difficulties and perils in the pathway of the student movement are many, subtle, and great. No field is without its difficulties, problems, and dangers. Prayer is an essential factor in removing all these hindrances. The opportunities for usefulness which to-day confront the student movement in every land are greater and more inspiring than ever. God alone can enable us to recognise and improve these opportunities.

A few suggestions are given to facilitate making the most out of the day:—(1) If practicable, let more than one day be observed. In some places it has been found desirable to devote the Saturday preceding the Day of Prayer to preparatory services. In other cases the following Monday is used for special student evangelistic meetings. (2) Let there be meetings of earnest Christian students given up largely if not entirely to intercession. In connection with this call are given a number of objects for praise and intercession. (3) There should be also at least one meeting for all students, in which the aim shall be to present the claims upon them of Christ as Saviour and Lord. (4) This call should be brought to the attention of Christian ministers, and they should be requested to preach sermons designed to influence students for Christ and to call forth on their behalf more prayer among Christians.

Miss Leakey's Homes.—Owing to the death of many supporters and friends, Miss Leakey has found it necessary to close the Exeter Home, after forty-one years of Christian service.

Bible Reading and Prayer Union.—Members of the Bible Reading and Prayer Union will have noticed that an error occurs in the card for this year, a daily portion being set for February 29. Dr. Paton being ill at the time, the error was not discovered while the card was being printed. Corrected copies may be had from Messrs. Morgan & Scott, 12, Paternoster Buildings, E.C.

THE LATE

Rev. Dennis Osborne.

THE news received by cable from Calcutta, on Monday last, to the effect that Rev. Dennis Osborne, of Poona, died on the previous Saturday, as the result of an apoplectic attack, will come with a sense of personal shock to many friends in the home-land, while in India the mourning will be wide-spread among both native and European Christians.

Mr. Osborne was born in India, and was orphaned at the age of thirteen, in the great Sepoy rebellion of 1857. Entering the Government service, he enjoyed social and other advantages above the common; but when at length he gave his heart to Christ, he resigned his appointment as assistant secretary in the Public Works Department, North-West Provinces, in order to preach the Gospel.

Mr. Osborne was brought to the Lord in the city of Lucknow. He was subsequently greatly helped by the revival which followed the mission of William Taylor, afterwards so widely known as Bishop Taylor of Africa. He was, indeed, privileged to take part in the meetings held in connection with the movement, and his religious life acquired tone and symmetry thereby. Having joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, Mr. Osborne began a life of ministry which continued to his death. For twenty-two years he had been a presiding elder of the Church; he opened up work at Allahabad, where he laboured for ten years; he undertook a like enterprise at Mussoorie, where he stayed for twelve years. In 1897 he was transferred to Western India as presiding elder of the Bombay district, and made his home at Poona.

Mr. Osborne was for some years general evangelist for the Methodist Episcopal Church in India. He had twice represented the Church as delegate in the General Conferences in the United States of America. On those occasions, while passing through London, he had spoken in Exeter Hall and other public places, and became acquainted with Sir George Williams, the late Mr. C. H. Spurgeon, and other prominent workers.

During the visits paid to this country of recent years in the interests of famine sufferers, Mr. Osborne had won many hearts by his transparent sincerity and earnestness, and by his eloquent addresses had aroused general interest in the cause he advocated. He was, indeed, an expert on all matters connected with Indian famines; in the last and terrible visitation of 1900-1901 his ripe experience and remarkable sagacity rendered him a persona grata in official circles, and he had recently been consulted by Lord Curzon.

The mere mention of Indian famines always stirred the heart of Mr. Osborne. Too well he knew what they meant in sadness for Christian workers, in misery and mortality among the native community. He remembered the famine of 1876-8, as well as that of 1896-7. His appeals on many platforms during his stays among us were singularly powerful, and the fearful facts in their mere recital did the rest—inducing many to give liberally in aid of the relief funds that were raised by Christian people.

Those who were privileged to be present on the occasion of the breakfast at Cannon Street Hotel in March 1900, when Mr. Osborne was bidden God-speed on returning to his work at Poona, will long remember his pathetic words as he pictured the homes of the peasantry, graphically outlining their normal condition of want, and moved his hearers to tears with a recapitulation of shocking sights which he had personally observed. He appealed both for the starving adults and for the orphan waifs who were wandering at large, exposed to the machinations of unprincipled people; and showed that many of these hapless little ones would be entrapped into vice unless help was forthcoming.

Mr. Osborne's labours bore rich fruit, not only for the workers of his own denomination, but among missionaries of all denominations; he acted with mingled generosity and discrimination as the almoner of large sums subscribed by Christians at home. Up till the time when the home call came he was occupied, in addition to his own important work, in pleading the cause of the great numbers of famine orphans, whose maintenance and education entails such serious financial responsibilities upon the missionary organizations. He was also deeply concerned for the inhabitants of those districts of our great dependency, upon which at the present time the dark shadow of famine is again falling, and, as our pages testify, he was unremitting in his efforts to impress upon the authorities the fact that the water supplies of India are sufficient, if properly conserved and distributed, to avert famine.

The loss which India has sustained was the subject of prayer at the noon meeting at Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A. on Monday last, when Rev. Isaac Row, who had long been intimately associated with Mr. Osborne, spoke feelingly of the life and labours of the departed missionary, and made an appeal for more labourers for the vast spiritual fields which are ripe unto harvest in many parts of India.

University Notes.

CAMBRIDGE.

DR. RENDEL HARRIS has been re-elected President of the Cambridge Free Church Federation.

Rev. H. L. C. V. de Candole, the new vicar of Holy Trinity in succession to Rev. C. J. Procter, preached in Trinity Church for the first time last Sunday. In the morning his text was Isa. lv. 1 and in the evening John ii. 11.

During the past week Rev. Robert Culley, Wesleyan Sunday School secretary, has visited Cambridge. He was present at a conference of Sunday school workers, when Rev. Sydney Milledge read a paper on "How to Interest Children" and Mr. Clement Smith on "The Teacher in his Class."

OXFORD.

With the Lent Term many are setting themselves to the task of preparing for their Final Schools. To the earnest men there will be no relaxation for the next few months. To many, a good place in the class list means more than the honour attached to it. It means daily bread. Never, perhaps, were a greater number of men to be found at our Universities, whose position in the world depends on their industry. This is a good sign. It may indicate less capital, but it certainly means more character.

Rev. Canon Christopher presided over the annual meeting of the St. Aldate's Men's Service. There has been a steady growth in the numbers attending this service, and Rev. D. B. Griggs, who has taken up the work during the last three months, has already succeeded in winning his way to the hearts of the men. The object of the service, as stated by the rector, is to draw those who were not in the habit of going to church or any other place where the Gospel is preached.

Obituary.

REV. GEORGE PERCHARD.

THE pastor of the French Independent chapels of St. Aubin's and St. Peter's, Jersey, Rev. George Perchard, fell asleep on Sunday afternoon, January 19. He had been waiting for the home call for the past five years, having had, in 1896, a first attack of paralysis. He was a man of saintly character, a deep student of the Word, humble, and of transparent character, an earnest preacher and pastor, and greatly beloved.

COLONEL GRIFFIN.

The death of Colonel Griffin, which occurred on January 21, removes one of the best-known laymen in the Baptist denomination. Born at Rochester, N.Y., and early devoting himself to religious work, particularly among the young, he became president of the Rochester Sunday School Union. Coming to England he settled in London, and became a member at Regent's Park Church, during the pastorship of the late Dr. Landels. In 1889 he was elected chairman of the London Baptist Association, and in 1891 was president of the Baptist Union. Colonel Griffin took an active interest in a number of religious and philanthropic organizations, and his devoted services in connection therewith will be greatly missed.

MR. J. A. BEALE.

The body of believers known as Brethren has sustained a serious loss through the death of Josiah Alfred Beale, who passed away at Liss, near Petersfield, after being in fellowship for over forty years. He was well known as a preacher of the Gospel in Hyde Park, at Battersea, and other places, his simple, homely, and earnest manner always attracting a crowd. Though suffering acute pain, to the end he had full possession of all his faculties, and the grace of Christ manifested there spoke to all who came near him. To the writer he stated the day before he died, "The Lord is my strength, He sustains me; my trust is in the Lord Jesus Christ." His last utterance was

> The Shepherd's bosom bears each lamb,
> O'er rock, and waste, and wild;
> The object of that love I am,
> And carried like a child.

His remains were interred in Milland Churchyard, Sussex, on Lord's Day afternoon, Jan. 5.

PROFESSOR A. B. DAVIDSON.

The death took place suddenly on Sunday last, of Rev. A. B. Davidson, D.D., the distinguished Professor of Hebrew and Old Testament Exegesis in the New College of the United Free Church of Scotland. Born in Aberdeen in 1840, Professor Davidson was educated for the ministry; and at his ordination in 1863 he was appointed colleague and successor to Dr. John Duncan, known to many as "Rabbi Duncan," Professor of Hebrew. He took an important, but quiet and unobtrusive, share in the work of the Free Church; and, as one of the first rank of Hebrew scholars and an acknowledged authority on the Old Testament, he did much to mould and direct the thought of the younger generation of ministers. Dr. Davidson was a member of the Old Testament Revision Committee. His Hebrew grammar is widely used. Among his other works were "The Epistle to the Hebrews," "Hebrew Syntax," and commentaries on Job, Nahum, and Habakkuk. He also contributed a series of important articles to the Hastings Dictionary of the Bible.

Prayer for Revival.—A spirit of grace and supplication was manifest in the meeting of evangelists and other workers held at the Y.M.C.A., Aldersgate Street, E.C., on January 22. The gathering was devoted almost entirely to prayer. Mr. A. Garstin, who led the assembly, briefly alluded to topics for prayer that had been suggested. Among these were the work that evangelists may be called upon to undertake during the coming summer; the revealing and removal of hindrances to usefulness, and that a spirit of hearing and conviction may be outpoured upon the unconverted masses.

The Christian Temperance Campaign.

REV. DR. HENRY IN NOTTINGHAM.

AN enthusiastic welcome awaited Dr. Henry upon his return visit to Nottingham, where, last Friday, he opened a new campaign by a week's mission of daily meetings in the Albert Hall, with the hearty co-operation of the Notts United Temperance Council.

There was a large gathering of townspeople in the afternoon at the Exchange Hall, where Alderman and Mrs. MELLORS held to greet the eloquent advocate of Christian temperance, who was attended by the Fisk Jubilee Singers.

Alderman MELLORS intimated that he had known Dr. Henry for many years. His successful temperance labours in the United States had led to his giving extended help on this side, and wherever he had gone his words had been a power for good.

In the course of a vigorous address Dr. HENRY held that no work could be of greater importance to the community than a determined and aggressive effort on the part of Christians, with the object of limiting and restricting the influence of the traffic in strong drink. The time has assuredly come for an effective unification of all the forces that are in opposition to the public-house and the encroachment of liquor interests upon the life of the people and of the Church. The platform on which a rational and successful temperance crusade is conducted must be broad and strong enough to hold every man, woman, and child who wishes to do definite personal work against the drink. They were all agreed as to the effects of the evil confronting them, and the necessity to repress—and, he hoped, ultimately to suppress—its power in the world.

Dr. Henry proceeded to urge his hearers to be "workers together with God." Not only were they personally workers under God, but they stood in vital and sympathetic relationship to one another; they represented a vast brotherhood, and, what was of even greater importance, a vast sisterhood, against the drink. The supreme value and dignity of life is, that we may co-operate with God for the fulfilment of his purposes. The time has come when temperance, the greatest reform of the new century, must be elevated to a Divine plane. We can have no confidence in this reform, nor in any other, unless it rests upon a Scriptural basis. The Church is God's institution, and stands as a connecting link between the drunkard and the imperilled child, on the one hand, and the Saviour with his omnipotent strength and tender sympathy, on the other; and the Christian, as the representative of the Church, stands between the Saviour and the lost, for the purpose of putting the hand of the helpless into the strong hand of the Lord Jesus Christ.

COUNCILLOR R. SANDS, seconded by Mr. ROBERT SCOTT (London), conveyed the thanks of the assembly to Alderman and Mr. Mellors for their hospitality, and the benediction was pronounced by CANON LEWIS.

PUBLIC MEETING.

The first public meeting of the mission was held on Friday evening. Among those on the platform were Revs. J. Gay, H. W. Pates (Retford), J. Dingle, J. Thomas, A. Thomas. J. M. Thorpe, F. R. Duffill, and the local secretaries, Messrs. John Stewart and F. Rodger.

Dr. HENRY'S subject was, "The Supreme National Reproach." His eloquent and impassioned address held the close attention of the audience, as he showed that the reproach is not a force from without, but an enemy within. As an impressive fact the speaker said that, since the war began, twelve times as many people have died in this country from the effects of drink as have fallen in South Africa.

The simple but powerfully effective sacred melodies of the Jubilee Singers formed a thoroughly appreciated part of this and subsequent meetings; while a general practice is the giving in of name and address by persons already abstainers, and the extensive signing of pledge registers handed round the hall.

THREE DAYS OF MEETINGS.

On the next three days of the Mission, afternoon and evening meetings were held. Saturday's meetings were presided over respectively by Councillor KNIGHT (Newark) and Mr. W. B. BAGGALEY. Dr. HENRY said he was never more delighted than when he could look into the faces of young people and warn them against strong drink. Taking up the words of an old prophet, that the enemies of the people were like lions, the speaker applied lessons derived from a lion hunt, and gave a graphic and exciting description of how the people of Iowa get together to fight the prairie wolves. The time has come for temperance people to "hang on" in their fight against the drink; and the reason why we are going to win is that we must—such tremendous issues depend upon the victory.

On Saturday evening DR. HENRY spoke to the many assembled concerning the great temperance task in its relation to national safety, in view of the words of Scripture, that "Righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people." While we are grateful for the past and hopeful for the future, yet, as living in the present, God calls us, by facts that are indubitable, to separate ourselves in every way from the nefarious drink traffic and custom.

The Albert Hall was crowded at both meetings on the Sabbath, and Dr. HENRY delivered two stirring addresses. It was a solemn and an awful word-picture that he drew in the afternoon, when dealing with the words of Ezekiel, "Make a chain; for the land is full of bloody crimes, and the city is full of violence"; but he had hopeful counsels for the salvation of the nation and the redemption of the city. In the evening effective use was made of David's declaration, "Died Abner as a fool dieth."

On Monday the mission was combined with the annual Conference, tea, and public meeting of the Notts United Temperance Council, which has a record of a good year's work. Dr. HENRY'S afternoon subject was the suggestive one of "Partnership with the Publican." Mr. ARNOLD F. HILLS, President of the National U.T. Council, travelled from London to act as chairman in the evening. His address was inspiring and practical. Dr. HENRY enlarged upon hopeful facts in connection with temperance reform.

FUTURE MEETINGS.

Feb. 1-9, Dublin; 11-12, Limerick; 14, Holyhead; 18-20, St. Albans; 24-25, Chelmsford; 28-March 1, 2, Ipswich; 14-21, Leicester.

For West-End Working Girls.

A SPECIAL and successful effort was made on Tuesday to awaken deeper interest in the working girls engaged in the West End of London. A comprehensive exhibition was held at the Central Rooms of the Young Women's Christian Association—George Street, Hanover Square—of the various trades, businesses, and handicrafts carried on by the young women with whom the workers are in touch. As an object lesson this display filled a most useful place, drawing attention to facts seldom realized. Perhaps the most unexpected in such surroundings was a model bar, with a strongly-suggestive variety of glasses on the counter; but it brought home forcibly the nature of the work in which too many young women are employed. Advantage was taken of intervals in the course of the day to exhibit a series of lantern slides illustrative of different phases of Christian effort among girls at home and abroad.

From the chair of a public breakfast in the morning, Lord KINNAIRD expressed the warm feelings with which the Association greeted its new president, Miss MORLEY, who followed with a clear and convincing statement of the needs of the Association and its present position. The motto is still "The Women of the World for our Lord Jesus Christ." The aim is to put before the young women of this generation the ideal of womanhood as revealed in Christ, and to help them to turn the ideal into the real. As indications of the enormous amount of work devolving on various departments, it was mentioned that in twelve months nearly 23,000 letters went out from the business agency, with about 28,000 from that dealing with domestic service, while 1,000 personal cases are dealt with every week of girls seeking help or guidance.

The immediate object of the gathering was emphasized in a telling appeal by the Hon. EMILY KINNAIRD for help in the provision of more adequate restaurant accommodation for girls working in the West End. Among other facts, she said there were several firms employing 2,000 girls each, while the employers of girls in Marylebone parish numbered 1,700, and the distances from which they come makes larger day accommodation imperative.

A generous response was made to this call.

The Emphasized Bible.

WHEN Mr. Joseph Bryant Rotherham brought out his work, "The New Testament Critically Emphasized," we were among those who encouraged him to deal with the Old Testament on similar lines—or rather to give to the world the fruits of many years of labour, already existing in an advanced stage of readiness for publication. At length we welcome the first volume of a work which admirably satisfies the desire we then expressed. The book is thus described on the title page:—The Emphasized Bible: A New Translation, designed to set forth the exact meaning, the proper terminology, and the graphic style of the sacred originals; arranged to show at a glance narrative, speech, parallelism, and logical analysis, also to enable the student readily to distinguish the several Divine names; and emphasized throughout after the idioms of the Hebrew and Greek tongues. Vol. I.—Genesis—Ruth. (8s. nett. H. R. Allenson.)

This version of the Holy Scriptures has features all its own. It has been made by one who, whatever else he knows, is well acquainted with the resources of pure literary English. How to set out to the best effect records in which narrative and speech are closely combined, and oftentimes alternated with poetical passages, speech within speech, and logical analysis, is a problem which has exercised many a translator without fruitful result. Mr. Rotherham, by the use of typographical devices that are understood at a glance, and of signs that are at once simple and expressive, does what others have desiderated but failed to accomplish. He gives us a volume the pages of which tell their own tale; not only are words and clauses marked emphatic, but by paragraphing, indentation, and other modes of treatment, the argument and logic of the chapters and books stand out in a manner that appeals to the mind through the eye.

The Expository Introduction to this volume shows the spirit in which the translator has done his work. The modern method of historical confusion which passes under the name of "Criticism," does not engage him. He deals with the documents as we have them, and in a conscientious manner tries to give us their meaning and sense, even to the reproduction of emphasis and stress, as indicated by inversion, repetition, or in other recognised ways. The analysis of the text has been carefully done, and the precision of the work is nowhere better shown than in the many footnotes on various readings and renderings. Here the fewest words are used, but sometimes they are of great value. A specially interesting feature is, that the version has been carefully adjusted to the newly-revised Massoretico-Critical Text (or assured emendations) of Dr. Ginsburg. Hence, in some cases, the notes convey information that has not appeared in any previous translation in our language. Though special topics are reserved for discussion in an Appendix, a few longer notes are given, including one on the Destruction of the Canaanite Nations, and one on Bible Genealogies. Both these are noteworthy.

We trust Mr. Rotherham will be encouraged to complete his work. His object has not been to produce a Bible to compete with those that are in the hands of all, but rather to give us a companion version for the study and for such as would ascertain something of the lights and perfections of the Sacred Word. The entire Old Testament is to be completed in three equal volumes, uniform in size and style with the Emphasized New Testament. The volumes are first appearing in monthly parts (2s. each). As a translator Mr. Rotherham is acute, luminous, and unconventional: his work is one which will richly reward careful and prayerful study.

Scriptures for India.

DEAR SIR,—I ask the earnest prayers of the people of God that the Christians in England may realize the momentous crisis in the spiritual history of India, and the very remarkable opportunity each one has of giving the message of salvation to one, at least, of the 294,000,000 who are still in darkness and the shadow of death. It has been a cause for thankfulness to see how warm has been the response to the many appeals in your columns. But I venture to say that the proportion of need seems to have been overlooked. If it is right—and it is right—to make an effort to save thirty or 300 in our own land, surely the needs of nearly 300,000,000 should awaken a response a million times greater, more especially when it is remembered that probably nine out of ten of these 300,000,000 of our fellow-subjects have no opportunity of hearing the Gospel once in their lives.

The Government has taught 25-30 millions to read, but it is to be feared not one in ten has ever seen a Gospel, while of five millions in schools there are probably at least three-and-a-half millions who are left to have their minds steeped in the corruptions of Hinduism varied by theosophy or atheism. Surely there cannot be one Christian who would not like to send a Gospel, price 2d., and thus possibly send the message of Eternal Life to a Hindu or Mohammedan child who is perishing. I would mention the fact that in Bengal alone applications have been received from missionaries for about 25,000 New Testaments, and 250,000 Gospels, besides Bibles, and large demands are made by missionaries in other places. The people are prepared to read; the missionaries are prepared to distribute.

Surely it only needs to mention these facts to ensure that each Christian will endeavour to send at least one Gospel (price 2d.). Those who wish to help should without delay send their gifts (to save correspondence made up to 5s. by arrangement with friends) to "Gospels for India," 56, Old Bailey, whence they will be transmitted for distribution through the Indian Sunday School Union, and its 14,000 Sunday-school teachers. There is also a deeply interesting work of distribution among lawyers, medical men, railway people, civil servants, post office men and women, by members of their own class, particulars of which can be obtained from Hunt and Barnard, Blandford Street, London, W.

We praise the Lord for the love which has prompted many thousands of his children, old and young, often at great personal cost, to help in this blessed work; but "there remaineth much land to be possessed."

Let every Christian have their part in the harvest of souls for the "praise of the glory of his grace, whereby He has made us accepted in the Beloved." Let each help their own class. Subscribers will kindly specify the class for whom their donations are intended, whether for Children, Civil Servants, Bankers, the Medical Profession, Lawyers, Editors, Post Office Employés, Students in Colleges, Railway People, Police, or Women.—Yours for Christ's sake, RADSTOCK.

Dr. Newman Hall's Illness.

MUCH anxiety was caused last week by the news that Rev. Dr. Newman Hall was laid aside with a serious illness. On Sunday week he attended Dr. Horton's church, as usual, apparently in excellent health. The following day he became somewhat drowsy, and had a paralytic seizure. But a worse feature during the ensuing days has been great weakness, and a return of his old complaint, bronchitis. On Monday evening a change for the better was observed, and the patient was reported to be showing signs of recovery.

Christmas Cards (old) for which, from lapse of time, there is no further need, could be used by tract distributors in their districts the gift being highly prized by the children, and promoting a cordial regard with the parents, who receive tracts continuously for lengthened periods. They should be sent to F. P., c/o Mr. Walter Wild, Secretary Y.M.C.A., 172, Queen's Road, Bayswater, W.

Evangelistic.

Mr. W. R. Lane at Llandrindod Wells.

THE mission services conducted lately at Llandrindod Wells by Mr. W. R. LANE aroused general interest, and large crowds flocked to hear the evangelist. Many were spiritually impressed. The churches found it necessary to continue the united prayer meetings. That which was held on January 22 will long be remembered. Mr. JENKINS ("Gwalia") made a tender appeal to the people, and after an address from Rev. D. GARRO-JONES, of Christ Church, a number of people were led to decision. The religious life of the place has been stagnant for years; now, the Spirit has come as a mighty rushing wind.

Canon Hay Aitken at Southwold.

Prayer is asked for the parochial mission to be held at Southwold for seventeen days, commencing February 1. Though special evangelistic efforts have from time to time been made during the last eight years by open-air services taken by the clergy and tent services by the Evangelization Society, with mission addresses by a layman from Missions to Seamen, no parochial mission has been attempted for thirty years. Canon Hay Aitken will be assisted by Rev. John Nunn for work among children and young people and Mrs. Crouch for work among women.

Work in Stonehaven.

Facing the German Ocean, on a rough bit of the coast fifteen or twenty miles south of Aberdeen, lies Stonehaven. A mission carried on it recently has been accompanied with many tokens of the Spirit's working. The meetings, which were begun on Sabbath, January 5, and continued till Sabbath, the 19th, were conducted by Mr. W. J. GERRIE, a china merchant from Leith, who now and again goes out on an evangelistic tour. The services were held in the Old Town Mission Hall, which is under the care of a committee composed of office bearers belonging to the South United Free Chuch (Rev. H. Esson Michie). The regular mission work, however, is carried on along undenominational lines.

After the second or third night of the mission the attendances rapidly grew, and on the closing night the place was crowded out. A number of backsliders were reclaimed, and many others professed to receive Christ during the progress of the mission. Some of these had not been without a name to live, and had not been without a form of godliness, but the name and the form were all, as they now frankly confess. J. C.

Mr. Leonard Weaver at Dartford.

A hearty welcome was given at Dartford to Mr. LEONARD WEAVER on his revisiting the scene of his labours of a year ago, when so much blessing was given. The six days' united mission commenced on Lord's Day morning at the Primitive Methodist Chapel, which was crowded. The earnest word of exhortation given by the evangelist on "Now are we a new creation," was refreshing to many. In the afternoon, at a meeting for men, a large number gathered at the Y.M.C.A., and a powerful service was held. At the close several signified their desire to commence the Christian life. An interesting feature of the meetings was that a number of young men testified that at Mr. Weaver's last mission they were led to accept Christ as their Saviour, and are now working for Him. A further outcome of the last mission is that a number of the young men have formed themselves into a brass mission band, and go out playing in the streets and holding open-air meetings. At night the service was held in the Baptist Chapel, and, ere the time to commence, the place was crowded, seats having to be placed down the aisles. An impressive service was held, and the people listened with deep attention to the message. At the after meeting a great number stayed for prayer, praise, and testimony, and one cannot help feeling the earnestness and desire on the part of all the workers that God will answer their prayers, and that many more will be brought to Him during this week. G. R. W.

The Boy Preacher.

Throngs of people have continued to attend the mission conducted by Mr. JACK COOKE, the boy preacher, at the Great Assembly Hall, Mile End, E. Deep interest was aroused throughout the district, and the evangelist and his message were regular topics of conversation. Many who seldom or never are found within the walls of any place of worship were attracted, doubtless by the fact of Mr. Cooke's youthfulness; but they listened with respectful attention to his clear delivery of the Gospel message.

Mr. E. H. KERWIN, speaking from ripe experience, says that the mission has been a record one, the Assembly Hall being filled nightly from floor to ceiling, while on Lord's Days the services of the police have had to be requisitioned in order to keep the path and supervise the crowds seeking admission. Large attendances, however, have not been the only feature. The spiritual effects have been most encouraging. Up till Monday last no fewer than 900 names of inquirers had been registered. Remarkable scenes have been witnessed in the inquiry rooms, and a large force of Christian workers has been busily employed night after night in pointing the seekers to Christ. In addition to local people who have been influenced, many from various parts of the London suburbs were among the inquirers. Mr. Kerwin quotes, as likely to prove helpful among those who regard so young a missioner with something of distaste, the words of a gentleman who was a severe critic—"Well, it is really wonderful that a young fellow like Jack Cooke can preach so argumentative a sermon and conclude by presenting the Gospel so simply and clearly."

On Lord's Day evening thousands of people had to be turned away from the hall, even after the lower hall had been filled for an overflow meeting conducted by Mr. F. N. CHARRINGTON. In the afternoon Mr. Cooke had spoken to an audience of men only, when some 2,000 persons came together. Mr. Cooke continues his mission throughout the present week.

Rev. JOHN MCNEILL has held a mission in Stirling. It is evident, from the communication received from an esteemed correspondent just as this paper is going to press, that a season of blessing has been experienced. It is hoped to give a report of the meetings next week.

Deep interest is being manifested in the mission at Merrion Hall, Dublin, conducted by Mr. J. J. SIMS. The hall is filled on Lord's Days, and there are large audiences on week nights. Some remarkable cases of spiritual impression are reported.

A mission has been held in Bonnington Hall, Leith, by Mr. CHARLES E. BARRACLOUGH. Much expectancy was aroused, and every night the attendance grew, until, on the second Lord's Day, the building was full. At the close of an earnest address on Isaiah liii. 6, the inquiry room was filled with the anxious, many of whom decided for Christ. On each of the succeeding nights further decisions were made. Local friends gave cordial encouragement to the work.

A mission of an encouraging character has been held by Mr. JAMES DIXON at Ballynahinch, near Belfast. Rev. J. Cullen writes:—"Mr. Dixon's former mission was gratefully remembered, and much expectation was excited, while preparation in various ways was carefully and zealously attended to. The numbers attending night after night constituted a record. Three afternoon children's services were held, that on Sunday being conducted by Mrs. Dixon with excellent effect. Much power accompanied the word spoken, and it is believed that many souls were blessed."

Fallen Asleep.

On Thursday, January 23, at Romford, aged sixty-five, Rev. FREDERICK SWEET, a prominent Nonconformist minister in Essex. Mr. Sweet in 1864 went to the Congregational Church at Romford as pastor, and occupied that position until his death. He took an active part in public affairs.—Mrs. BELL, wife of Rev. Benjamin Bell, of Withington Presbyterian Church, Manchester, passed away on January 11. Although it was known that she had not been in robust health for some time, it was with a shock of surprise and sorrow that the intelligence of her death was received.—Aged ninety-four, Mrs. CUFF, mother of Rev. W. Cuff, of Shoreditch Tabernacle. Mr. Cuff was with his mother during her last moments. He speaks in tender terms of her saintly influence and example.—Aged eighty, Rev. JAMES HUTTON, who had been Church of Scotland minister at Closeburn, near Thornhill, Dumfriesshire, for forty-five years.—Mr. EDWARD KEARSLEY fell asleep on January 17 at his residence 56, Anson Road, Tufnell Park, aged seventy-nine. For some years he did good work on the committee of the Friendless and Fallen, 200, Euston Road, and was beloved by a large circle of Christian workers.

Mr. W. Spencer Walton is sailing from Liverpool on February 1 by the ss. Lucania for two months' work in America. His address will be care of Pastor Mosier, 90, Court Street, Brooklyn.

Literature for Hospital Patients.—Mr. T. Hare, Librarian and Scripture Reader of the Royal Infirmary, Newcastle-on-Tyne, is anxious to replenish the library for the use of patients, and will be glad to receive gifts of books for this purpose.

NATIONAL BLIND RELIEF SOCIETY.

The following pitiful case will appeal to the readers of The Christian, being one of many that are constantly coming before me:

A young Clergyman (aged 35 years) having lost his sight through some nerve affection, has been obliged to resign his Curacy at ———. The case is particularly sad as, in addition to his affliction, his wife is in an advanced stage of Phthisis; she has been ailing for ten years, and during that time he has spent all his savings going from place to place in the hope of restoring her health. He is a good Theological Scholar, a man fond of his work, and had a brilliant career before him. He has excellent testimonials from the commencement of his ministry, and is spoken highly of by all who know him. Now this heavy trial has befallen him he is greatly depressed, feeling his position most keenly; he was a hard worker and never spared himself, and was a great reader.

The Rev. J. PULLEIN-THOMPSON, Hon. Sec. the Vicarage, 27, Tite Street, Chelsea, S.W., will gladly acknowledge donations, or they may be sent to the Office of THE CHRISTIAN.

Scripture Readers' Society for Ireland

This Society continues to Spread the Word of God in the homes of the people, and never found a more open door, but funds are much needed to extend the Work.

Contributions will be thankfully received at the Offices, 27, Lower Pembroke Street, Dublin; or 9, Paternoster Row, London; and at the Office of THE CHRISTIAN.

REV. J. O. GAGE DOUGHERTY, M.A.,
Secretary and Treasurer;
or CAPT. JAMES KEARNEY WHITE,
Hon. Secretary.

Notes & Comments

The Child and the Church. A most practical suggestion as to the shepherding of children after conversion is given by Rev. Albert Swift on page 12. We commend it heartily to pastors and parents, as it seems to afford an excellent solution of a very difficult problem.

A Royal Example. The fact that Queen Alexandra has just contributed to a Salvation Army bazaar articles of clothing of her own making, affords a striking illustration of the value of what Mr. Gladstone used to lay so much stress upon, "the sanctified half hour." The example is one which might, with advantage to themselves and much benefit to others, be steadily followed by numbers of ladies in all ranks of society, whose lives are so largely given up to the pursuit of personal pleasure. Her Majesty's sympathy, however, is not of a spasmodic kind, and on many occasions she has, with each of the other members of the Royal House of Denmark, evinced, in a very practical way, a strong personal interest in the great evangelistic and philanthropic work of the present day.

Prospects of Peace. The enigmatical answers given by the Government since Parliament opened to questions asked regarding the possibilities of peace have created a widespread hope that there is some real prospect of the end of the war. This is a time when prayer should be offered with redoubled fervour for the Divine intervention, so that the minds of those who will have to settle this momentous problem may be turned towards an amicable settlement upon a just and lasting basis. The cry has often been raised in devout hearts during this terrible struggle, "How long, O Lord, how long?" At last it would seem that the light is beginning to dawn, and the end is in sight. Let those who believe in the efficacy of prayer lift their voices day and night in public and in private for the ending of this melancholy strife.

International Slanders and their Suppression. The new phenomenon of International hatred, of which we are the victims, is a fact that we should do well to consider a little more carefully. As directed against ourselves it may not be immediately dangerous, but it contains a germ of peril that may in the future bring forth bitter fruit. How far it is well to take notice of widespread slanders is always a delicate problem, both for the individual and the nation. Our national habit has been to ignore them altogether. It is doubtful, however, if the time has not come to adopt a different policy. Nations have far more to do with one another than formerly; the world is smaller, the chances of explosion more numerous, and the consequences of an international outbreak would be a great deal more serious. There should be a dissemination of the real facts regarding our doings in South Africa. Many of the Christian leaders and religious associations of Germany and Switzerland have been under a mistaken impression as to our treatment of the Boers; let them now be put in a position to disseminate the truth.

The Government and the Native. A Blue-book relating to legislation affecting the natives of the Transvaal, contains reassuring evidence of the good intentions of the South African Government. It refers to the two great problems of the regulation of the drink traffic, and the employment of native labour. Lord Milner gives the clearest evidence that the dangerous attitude advocated in some of the South African papers, from which we quoted at length last week, is not in accord with the mind of the authorities. Speaking of the difficulty of enforcing the prohibition law relative to the liquor traffic, when the mines are in full working order (employing probably 200,000 natives), he goes on to say:—

> But while I realize the difficulties, I also feel that we are bound by hook or by crook to overcome them. The whole credit of this administration is at stake in the matter, and I feel confident that his Majesty's Government will support us in the view that no effort and no expense should be spared in carrying out a policy which, if successful, will mean a momentous triumph for civilization in this part of the world.

In regard to the labour question, the native labourer is to be protected in the enjoyment of his own rights, and he will not be allowed to bind himself by contract for more than twelve months; while the punishment of flogging for offences against the law will be abolished. This is a promising and inspiriting programme, which we trust will be rigorously carried out.

Slavery in the Soudan. It has taken the Government a long time to follow the example set by France in North Africa of dealing drastically with slave dealers, but at length an order has been issued to all British military and civil officers in the Soudan, authorizing and directing them to arrest slave dealers wherever found, and to use any degree of force in doing so. The step has not been taken any too soon. The tacit recognition of slavery, or negative action in regard to it, are quite out of keeping with the propagation of the Gospel of Christ.

Chinese Reforms. Recent telegrams from China give evidence of a new state of affairs at Peking, including a recommendation of the abolition of foot-binding by women, with an expression of repentance for the "terrible mistake" of the attack of the Legations. But professions of friendship to the ladies of the diplomatic body, accompanied by presents of jewellery, must not be allowed to obscure the real issues, which affect so materially the well-being not only of the Chinese nation, but of the world at large. We join heartily in the expressions of thankfulness for the re-establishment of peaceful relations, but many terrible deeds besides the attack on the Legations are still unexplained. One test of the reality of these professions will lie in the suspension of such human monsters as the Viceroy of Shansi, and the replacing of the reforming leaders who survive.

Earing-time and Harvest. It is gratifying to learn that the announcement of a deficit in the funds of the London Missionary Society due to its praiseworthy "forward movement" has drawn forth donations amounting to about £9,000, and that a grant has been made from the Congregational Nineteenth Century Fund. The amount required has, however, as yet only been about half made up, and a special effort will be made in the week ending February 16 to relieve the Society entirely from the pressure of the burden and the consequent anxiety. The time certainly has not come for any relaxation of missionary effort and expenditure. To-day more than ever in the world's history the fields are white unto the harvest, and it is to be hoped that the appeal which has been made may result not merely in meeting the deficit, but in enabling the Society to undertake a further development of the work of evangelizing the world.

Romanism in Australia. Rev. J. G. Greenhough, M.A., president of the Free Church Council, whom we are glad to welcome home from his Australian visit, draws a vivid picture of the tactics of Rome in our Colonies. Mr. Greenhough disclaims being an alarmist or a fanatic, but he gives good reason for his fears of the inroads of Rome in Australia:—

> Rome, foiled, disappointed, and weakened in her ancient fields, is turning for compensation to the Anglo-Saxon people beyond the seas. There is proof of these things at every turn. The priest is ubiquitous in these colonies. There is never a goldfield opened, or small agricultural settlement made, but he is found amongst the earliest arrivals, and the spire of his church shoots up almost before other religious bodies have secured their building site. How he obtains support he only knows, but the support is forthcoming, and that of an ample kind.

The Catholics of Victoria and New South Wales, he says, have an attendance amounting to one-third of all the religious bodies. The Protestants are simply asleep, while Rome is wide awake. Mr. Greenhough complains, with reason, that some of the leading Protestants send their children to the convent schools; nay, more, "The convent schools are three-fourths filled with the daughters of the wealthiest Protestant families. And they ask, 'What harm can result?'" It is extraordinary, almost beyond belief, that the children of Englishmen have practically forgotten their country's history, with its tale of Romish intrigue and persecution.

A Vindication of Missions. The current number of the Sunday at Home will afford great pleasure to all friends of foreign missions, for in it there is an attractive article on the change of attitude which came over R. L. Stevenson towards mission work. Stevenson, as is well known, was most unfriendly at one time towards Christian missions, but when he went to live at Samoa, and saw with his own eyes the transformation which had been wrought in the lives of the Samoans, he completely altered his opinions, and became the firm friend of the missionaries. Mr. Lovett quotes from a speech delivered by Mr. Stevenson at Sydney in 1893, in which he said:

> I had conceived a great prejudice against missions in the South Seas, and had no sooner come there than that prejudice was at first reduced, and then at last annihilated. Those who deblatterate against missions have only one thing to do—to come and see them on the spot. They will see a great deal of good done; they will see a race being forwarded in many different directions, and I believe, if they be honest persons, they will cease to complain of mission work and its effects.

Words like these are worth more than all the superficial criticisms of vagrant travellers, and of unobservant and hostile Government officials.

The Obstacles to Combination. The proposal made by Dr. Parker some months ago, that the Congregational Churches should surrender some degree of their autonomy in favour of a "United Congregational Church," has been from that time, and is still being, eagerly discussed. It was only to be expected that so radical a suggestion would be strenuously opposed, as well as vigorously supported. Several of the various leaders who have taken part in the discussion seem to regard the independence of the local church as the one thing that is fatal to the suggested combination; while by all it is felt that there is grave need for a combination of forces in order to cope with the wants of an ever-growing population. Weak causes can rarely do their proper work unless they are supported by strong ones. The question is one of pressing interest for many others besides Congregationalists. Surely it is a thing to aim at, that when separate churches are engaged in one work, and seek to reach one goal, the strong should help the weak. And this can only be done through some surrender of absolute autonomy.

Hidden Work. An old student of the late Professor Davidson, in an appreciation of his old master, refers to the hiddenness of his work as being its chief characteristic. His classes were held in a back room in the University, and scarcely ever more than thirty students attended them. The outside world knew nothing of him or his work.

No one ever heard of his attending a public meeting or moving a resolution; he went very little into society; no one turned to look at him as he went along Princes Street, and his face was unknown to the people. Yet this retiring and modest man, who simply loathed publicity and sensationalism, put a new spirit into the preaching of the Bible, affecting the people through a thousand pulpits.

Though a measure of hero-worship seems to lurk in the description, this is a rare picture in a day when circus methods are so popular in nearly every department of society. Many a quiet worker will find encouragement in the contemplation of it. To a number of people God has entrusted the sacred function of quietly influencing just a few people, who in their turn may influence large numbers of men. Let such be content to do their work well, without envying those whose service is of a different character. The hidden worker may possibly possess a greater force than the man whom everybody knows.

The Value of Old Men. We have frequently expressed our dissent from the prevailing craze for only young men in the ministry, and the consequent shelving of elder and tried servants of God. It is very difficult for a man beyond middle age to obtain a change of pastorate. The cry is all for younger men. The young men are wanted without doubt, but so are older ones. Experience ought to count for something, as well as youth and vigour. A servant of Christ who has outlived his earlier mistakes, and who retains a deep and glowing love of his Lord and of men, is always needed, and for him a place ought to be found. According to the order of true development, a man should do his best work at the end of his life. John Wesley was a conspicuous example of one who did his ripest work in old age. And to-day the Church has a number of grand old men who are now accomplishing their finest work. These facts should tell in favour of others, not so conspicuous perhaps as some of their brethren, but equally capable of rendering noble service for their Lord.

Lord's Day Observance. The line taken by Rev. F. S. Webster in his recent sermon on Sunday observance is one that should appeal especially to Christian parents, since it offers the only practical solution of the Sabbath question for the children. Let the emphasis be placed upon the word "hallow" in the Fourth Commandment. Whatever is then permitted on the Lord's day should be harmonious with what is included in that word. If, however, anyone interprets the word to mean morose, dull, or gloomy, the Sunday will be more dreaded than a servile Jewish Sabbath. Should the Lord's Day be associated in a child's mind chiefly with rigid restrictions, a reaction is inevitable when the little one comes to the estate of man or woman. If parents would follow the wise advice of Mr. Webster, and let Sunday be the day when the family see most of each other, when secular things are excluded, and when all sacred things are made attractive to young people, we should have less revolt in after years from the sacred institution.

The Husk and the Kernel. We have every sympathy, of course, with those earnest Christians who are seeking, in their presentation of the Gospel of Christ, to distinguish between the husk and the kernel of truth. The husk has been formed, too often, by the hand of man, and it needs to be cut away. But this process may be carried too far, and the knife may cut into the heart of the truth. In a volume just published, the author, who has won some renown for himself as a scholar, sets out to try and "form a body of doctrine fitted to contain those ideas of religion which are vital among us, and to present them to the world in a form which shall be suited to modern ways of thought." This laudable object was born of a desire to appease the mental restlessness of many men of our time concerning Christ and his truth. But the author's method includes the rejection (without reasons) of the prophetical Scriptures concerning our Lord, and of the Evangelists' records of our Lord's birthplace, and their stories of his infancy, and of many of his miracles. Such a method of separating the alleged husk from the kernel is fatal in every way. No Christian will allow it for a moment; it is too unscientific and rationalistic; while those for whom the concession is made will be worse off than ever. Not in this way can the "mental restlessness" of men be appeased.

Bigotry and Fidelity. All men who make a definite stand on behalf of a great principle are liable to be maligned as "bigots." If the historical origin of this word be respected, no one need be ashamed of being known as a bigot. The original "bigots" were men who could hold their own against all. In changed circumstances, however, the word has at present a sinister meaning, and no one cares to be known as a bigot—an unreasoning, violent adversary. Men of invertebrate character do not seem capable of distinguishing between bigotry and fidelity, and they brand persons whose sense of trusteeship is profound and keen with the wrongful name of bigot. It is to be greatly desired that in some way men might understand that fidelity to a trust involves firmness, and that strong attachment to a grand principle does not deserve an opprobrious epithet to describe it. At the same time, earnest advocates of a great cause need so to present their case that their reasonableness shall appear to all fair-minded people. It is possible to advocate a righteous cause in a most irritating manner. This always does harm.

Pessimism and Optimism. In dealing with those problems of life and morals which are fixed upon us at every turn, the tendency of many good people has been to take either the extreme of pessimism or the extreme of optimism. To the one, things are incurably bad; to the other everything is rose-coloured and must come out well. These extreme positions are both mischievous; the first paralyses all effort, while the second is likely to view things falsely, and to treat too flippantly the gravest questions. The true position is between the two extremes. Our Lord tells us to despair of no man—this relieves us from pessimism: his Apostle tells us that evil men shall "wax worse and worse"—this sobers our optimism. If there is to be a bias at all, it is better that it should be on the side of the truth expressed by the royal singer: "His Kingdom shall endure for ever."

Critical Moments. The real crises of life are often unrecognized. The moments of final choice between good and evil do not stand out dramatically in human life, claiming instant recognition. They may be unmarked by any sense of their importance except in the character of the alternatives presented. When the young ruler met Jesus, and decided the great question, it seemed but a chance encounter in the street. A few words were spoken, a few glances interchanged, while a crowd looked on—and that was all. And yet within that short space of time a soul had come forth out of the shadow, stood for a moment in the blaze of noonday, and passed again into the shadow of a great eclipse. Heaven's gate had opened and shut, and a man had shut himself out. This is a call to perpetual watchfulness on the part of all who would save their souls. The solemnity of moments is great when a soul's tragedy can be thus brought to its crisis in a few minutes. "Watch and pray, lest ye enter into temptation."

Commercial Oppression. Lord Ebury, chairman of the Army and Navy Stores, has not added to his reputation by his unsympathetic, not to say discourteous, treatment of Rev. H. Westall, a clergyman who ventured to call his lordship's attention to the arbitrary dismissal from the stores of one of his parishioners. The well-intentioned action of the reverend gentleman on behalf of a man whom he had long known as bearing an exemplary character was, in itself, entitled to appreciation; and, even apart from the circumstances of the man's dismissal, he was, at least, entitled to the common courtesy that rules as between one gentleman and another. But the dignity of the chairmanship of a wealthy company must not be ruffled by such trifles as the grievances of a mere employé! Such is the doctrine of modern commercialism. It might be well, however, if clergymen and ministers would more frequently take up the cause of those who are hardly used by their employers.

Practical Papers.

On "FOOLS AND THEIR FOLLY."

"Behold, I have played the fool, and have erred exceedingly" (1 Sam. xxvi. 21).

THE attitude of the world to the Christian (see last week's Practical Paper) is expressed in Hosea ix. 7:—"The prophet is a fool; the spiritual man is mad!" When a man is called a fool, a good deal depends upon the character and personality of the speaker. A boy may apply the term to his master, and only reveal his own folly thereby. So is it when the scoffer derides the follower of Jesus. The world calls a man a fool for doing what is right; God describes a man so for doing what is wrong.

There is no such fool as the man who, being one, does not know it; and none is so wise as he who realizes what a fool he is. Probably in all his chequered career, Saul never so nearly scaled the heights of wisdom, or was so nigh to the Kingdom of God, as when, realizing his folly, he exclaimed: "Behold I have played the fool, and have erred exceedingly." The scholar who makes the most progress is the one who, when his mistakes are pointed out to him, avoids a repetition of the errors into which he once has fallen. The traveller who would reach his journey's end without mishap or loss of time, must observe the signposts by the way, and follow the directions of those who know the road. We are but learners and tourists in a foreign land; let us turn to our Guide Book and see how to live, "not as fools, but as wise."

(1) Let us begin with the young man, because in these days he must needs be well to the front. Of course, there is no one quite so important as he, and there is nothing in life that he does not feel competent to undertake! What he lacks in wisdom is made up in assurance, until one might almost think he weighs a ton, instead of a hundredweight or less. But he is a many-sided being all the same, with many a good quality that we cannot but admire—free and boisterous, full of fun, generous and frank, with open heart and hand. But his very love of mirth is a danger, and the Wise Man's warning is not unneeded, that "Fools make a mock at sin" (Prov. xiv. 9).

The modern youth has many temptations in this direction—to laugh at the drunken man, to enjoy the obscene jest, to welcome a mean standard of morality in conversation, in entertainments, in the pictures he buys, in the books he reads! Woe be unto those who lightly esteem innocence of character and purity of life. My young reader, let not your youthful vigour lead you astray. Respect that which is holy; ridicule not that which is good; make not a mock at sin, which at the last biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder. Enjoy the good gifts God has given you. "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth; and let thine heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth; and walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes; but know thou that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment." Enjoy the sunshine of the day, but prepare also for the solemn hours of the night, remembering that "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom."

In whatever phase of life it be, the heart is but a treacherous mainspring, which often makes the clock of life go wrong. Still more so is it in regard to eternal things. How often have we poured our hearts in earnest, passionate devotion at the Saviour's feet, only to find that in a week or less our spiritual clock had stopped, or was going wofully slow. How many of us have had to admit with Saul in bitterness of soul, "Behold I have played the fool, and have erred exceedingly." Trust not in that old deceptive heart of yours; lean not to your own understanding. Betake you to your Maker, and pray Him: "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me."

(3) The Psalmist speaks of another, bound to his predecessors by a link of the same chain: "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God" (Psa. liii. 1). Here is the man who, bursting with his own prodigious wisdom, rides roughshod over evidence of every kind, and dashes madly, blindly, into the battle of life, with "No God!" as his battle cry; until he falls, at last, wounded by the Lord of Hosts, whose existence he has denied. In his conceptions of life—"No God!" in thoughts of marriage—"No God!" in the conduct of his business—"No God!" and in the training of his children—"No God!" Such an one sought to wed his little girl to his disbelief. One day he was ill in bed, when the child came into the room with her slate from school. He wrote upon it, "GOD IS NOWHERE!" and asked her to read it. The little one in her innocence spelled it out, "GOD IS NOW HERE!" 'Twas but a trifling change, but eternal issues hung upon it.

Our Lord addressed two of his disciples, after his resurrection, as "Fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken" (Luke xxiv. 25). There is a practical, though not theoretical, atheism in many a Christian heart. There are men who claim to be atheists outwardly, but who in truth are not so inwardly. There are, alas! to be found in the Christian Church others who are infidel in heart, while they admit it not in outward speech. How "slow of heart" are the best of us to "believe all that the prophets have spoken" concerning Jesus; to believe all that God has spoken concerning Himself; to trust in all the promises He has made for our own spiritual blessing. How sadly have we failed to drink deeply of the wisdom of God in Christ, or to partake of the fulness of his grace. If not by blatant word of mouth, yet in the unsuspected recesses of our heart, have we never thought or acted as if we believed that "there is no God"? The atheist calls us fools because we believe so much; Christ, because we believe so little.

(4) Our Lord introduces us further to the rich fool—whose earthly possessions filled his soul—"Thou fool. . . . so is every one who is not rich toward God" (Luke xii. 20). "Rich fool," do we say? Nay, rather, "poor fool!" Few men fail of heaven because they have too little; more often it is because they have too much. A man inflated with worldly wisdom and importance can no more pass through the narrow gate, than can a camel through the eye of a needle—so full of self, he has no heart for God. This man was doubly blessed. He had a shrewd, business-like faculty, and an abundance of wealth with which to carry out his plans. But his plans were wrong. Rich as he was, he was unspeakably and eternally poor, because he was "not rich toward God"—like a train of well-appointed cars, attended by guards in faultless uniform, drawn by a powerful engine of latest design, amply supplied with steam; but on the wrong line. He was rich, but "not toward God"—a fool, and a poor one at that.

Let us take heed lest we fall into a similar snare. His temptation may not be ours in detail; a kindly Providence may have placed excessive wealth beyond our reach. But there are other pitfalls than this; and in so far as we withhold our best—of mind, of intellect, of physical strength, of heart-devotion and worship, or whatever it be—from the God who gave it, and are not rich toward Him, in this we "play the fool, and err exceedingly."

These lessons are all embraced by the parable of the "foolish man which built his house upon the sand" (Matt. vii. 26)—"a hearer and not a doer" of the words of God (Jas. i. 23)—self-deceived, he regards himself as superior to the necessity of obedience. A foundation laid in man's wisdom is eternal folly. It will never stand when the crisis comes.

"The wisdom of this world is foolishness with God" (1 Cor. iii. 19). "Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty glory in his might, let not the rich glory in his riches; but let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth Me" (Jer. ix. 23, 24). God give us to seek "the wisdom that is from above; first pure, then peaceable . . . full of mercy, and good fruits" (Jas. iii. 17). G.

The Burden of the Valley of Vision.

Isa. xxii. 1-14 (R.V.).

A LESSON FOR TO-DAY, FROM THE PAST HISTORY OF THE PEOPLE OF GOD.

1. What the prophet Isaiah saw in Jerusalem.

"Thou art . . . . full of shoutings . . . . a joyous city" (v. 2).

2. The prophet's burden of soul.

"I will weep bitterly; labour not to comfort me, for the spoiling of . . . . my people" (v. 4).

3. The condition of affairs.

"It is a day of discomfiture, and . . . . of perplexity (v. 5).

4. How the people had met their difficulties.

"Thou didst look in that day to the armour . . . . ye numbered . . . . and ye . . . . [fortified] . . . . but ye looked not unto [the Lord]" (vv. 8-11).

5. The prophet's message from God.

"In that day did the . . . . Lord . . . . call to weeping . . . . mourning . . . . sackcloth" (v. 12).

6. How the people responded to God's call.

[But] "behold, joy and gladness . . . . eating flesh and drinking wine" (v. 13).

7. What the Lord said of the people's neglect for seeking Him.

"The Lord of Hosts revealed Himself in mine ears, surely this iniquity" (v. 14).

Protestant Catechisms.—In view of the suggestion of Sir Charles King, that a Protestant Catechism should be circulated among the people, a correspondent writes:—"I should like to call attention to the excellent booklets published by the Protestant Reformation Society, 62, Berners Street, London, W. There is one, I know no better, entitled "Anti-Ritualism," by Dr. Preston; it consists of 144 pages, and the price is 2d. I owe a great deal to this little work, as I was once a Ritualist. The Society is also issuing a new set of catechisms, edited by Rev. Dr. Wright, and written by Rev. C. Neil. The titles are, 'The Church,' 'The Lord's Supper,' 'The Mass,' 'Wholesome Doctrine,' and 'Ritualism' (One penny each). Another on 'Ritual,' by Canon Meyrick, costs twopence. These publications will be found very useful at the present time."

THE CHURCH AND THE CHILDREN.

SOME CONSIDERATIONS IN VIEW OF THE

SPECIAL MISSION TO THE YOUNG,

BEING ARRANGED BY THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL UNION.

Converted Children—Do they Abide?

THIS is a question which deeply exercises the minds of many good people, and there is to be found no lack of unsympathetic critics who all too readily give to it a negative reply. It is well, therefore, to deal with concrete facts rather than with abstract arguments.

Probably the greatest missioner to children that Great Britain or America has ever known is Rev. E. Payson Hammond, and although he has not visited these shores in recent years, the fruits of his ministry among the young abundantly remain.

In answering the above question, Rev. W. Manchee adduces in the New York Observer strong evidence of the stability of such effort. We may appropriately reproduce his testimony:—

I unhesitatingly say that Edward Payson Hammond has led multitudes to Christ, not only adults but, in far larger numbers, children; and that the permanency of his labours among the children can be seen or ascertained on both sides of the Atlantic in the lands where he has been welcomed and has wrought as the "Children's Evangelist."

AFTER TWENTY-FOUR YEARS.

Mr. Hammond's recent work in New York and its vicinity abundantly certifies to the propriety of what I have just said. For example, a few weeks ago he laboured in Yonkers, a suburb of this city. In the audiences which greeted him were several of his old friends, who, in the fall of 1877, twenty-four years ago, were associated with him in services he conducted in Yonkers for five weeks. Among these was Dr. David Cole, who testifies that in that 1877 visit, Yonkers "was stirred as it had never been before or has been since by any labourer for Christ."

After speaking briefly of Mr. Hammond's strikingly enthusiastic manner, Dr. Cole says, as to the evangelist's methods: "Whatever may be said of these in detail, I notice that he is consecrated to the preaching always, in whatever way, of the three old Bible subjects of sin, salvation, and holy and useful living. I have been with him throughout in one of his most noted and memorable campaigns, and now again during his recent visit, and have never known him to turn for a single minute from these themes. He preaches the law with the greatest directness, makes clear as light what sin is as its transgression, brings guilt home to every conscience, and faces every hearer with the fact of man's peril while still in the natural state. . . . His method of approaching the subject of the death of Christ, and of presenting and enforcing its significance, is also clear and effective beyond my power of description. Natural and simple, his words go straight to all hearts. Even little children are entranced by them, and brought into deepest sympathy with the sufferings of our Lord. No doubt in many cases their emotion is but transient. But I also know that many children have become intelligently and permanently exercised, and brought to saving faith in Him who died upon the accursed tree."

EVEN THE VERY YOUNG.

Dr. Cole then adds, as to the evangelist's work among the children, this: "He believes in the conversion of children, even very young children, with whom the Holy Spirit has given him remarkable power. I cannot conceive why he should be criticized for this, or for the consecration of his peculiar power to the bringing of it about. Every parent, it seems to me, must desire the conversion of his own children, and must know the teaching of the Bible on this subject, both doctrinally and by illustration. During his visit this week, Mr. Hammond received the assurance from 122 children that they had given their hearts to Christ. May we not hope that with them all divine truth has found a welcome lodgment, and that many, if not all of them, may be able, in future years, to reckon to his visit their saving conversion to Christ, and their point of start upon a genuine and devoted Christian life."

SOME CHEERING FACTS.

This is the testimony of "one who knows" as to the permanent value of Mr. Hammond's labours for the young. The writer, from his own personal experience and knowledge, also testifies to the same abiding results of the evangelist's work. I laboured with Mr. Hammond in Guelph, Canada, for nine weeks in 1879, and it was my joy to gather into the fold over a hundred persons, many of whom were children. In one instance four generations stood together to confess Christ. Visiting my old parish many years after, I found that only two had forsaken Christ, and these were adults. All the children stood true and faithful to the Lord. Some of these were holding positions of influence in Christian labour in the Sabbath school and the churches, and were spoken of as the salt of the land.

Let these facts, which I could almost indefinitely multiply, inspire God's people everywhere with faith in the permanent value of the conversion of the children. Let us get the young converted to Jesus that we may surely raise up such consecrated lives as the world so greatly needs to-day for Christian testimony.

The Children's Mission—and After.

By Rev. ALBERT SWIFT, East Dulwich.

IMMEDIATELY the present effort for the conversion of the children shall have passed, pastors and churches will be facing the problem of what to do with the little folk who have professed conversion. Better have no mission than doubt the efficacy of its work. On the other hand, it is manifest that many of these children are unprepared to assume the responsibility of church membership. What, then, is to be done with them? To relegate them merely to the Junior Christian Endeavour, where they are on equal terms with others who have made no such profession, is, in fact, to doubt the reality of the work of grace in their young hearts. Something between such societies and Church membership seems to be imperative. This conviction was borne in upon the writer's mind a year ago, when during the National Simultaneous Mission a series of children's meetings were conducted in his church by Mr. C. Dudley Smith, resulting in the names of a hundred children being taken as professing a desire to accept Jesus Christ as their Saviour and serve Him. Much prayerful deliberation led to the formation of a Children's Christian Band, the work of which it is the purpose of this article to explain.

A CHILDREN'S CHURCH.

The Children's Christian Band is essentially a Children's Church. Its membership consists only of those who are believed by the committee of management to be living within their light as little Christians. They are received into the membership of the Band at the public service, in much the same manner as ordinary Church members are received, and it is assumed that they have thus taken a first step toward Church membership.

The object of the Band in its working is to maintain a constant and sympathetic oversight of the children. The whole is under the direction of the pastor. He is assisted by a number of helpers, chiefly Sunday-school teachers, each of whom takes the oversight of not more than six of the members. As far as possible, teachers take their own scholars, and thus are in touch with them week by week. At any rate, they are expected to visit the children at home once a quarter, and converse with the parents concerning their deportment at home and elsewhere. Of course, it is not expected the children will be perfect. Grown up people, who are Church members, are far from that. The intention is not to be severe and critical, but sympathetically watchful.

The children are urged to a faithful attendance at the Sunday-school, at the Junior Christian Endeavour, and at the monthly meeting of the Children's Band, which is invariably conducted by the pastor himself; and each helper presents to the committee a quarterly report of such attendances, together with the impressions formed in the course of their work and visitation.

ADMISSION TO CHURCH MEMBERSHIP.

Directly the children reach the age of manifest intelligence and character which seems to warrant their promotion to Church membership, it is proposed that they shall be formed into catechumen classes for further instruction by the pastor.

Children are invariably impressionable, and they are very prone to follow each other. It is not to be expected that all whose names may be taken will prove satisfactory. Indeed, if only twenty-five per cent. of those who shall thus commit themselves, during the Children's Mission, can be carefully shepherded, it will mean an immense ingathering for the Church by-and-by. Merely to disregard the results of the Mission, and leave the children without special care, expecting in the process of the years to gather them into the Church, is simple folly. The children may not so state it, but they will intuitively feel that their sincerity has been doubted; and thus, in all probability, they will be hardened, rather than helped.

The constitution will give in concise form the organization of the Band:—

THE CHILDREN'S CHRISTIAN BAND.

CONSTITUTION.

1.—That this Band shall be called the Children's Christian Band of the ——— Church.

2.—Its object shall be to enrol and care for children who, there is every reason to believe, have accepted Christ as their Saviour, but who may be considered too young for admission to Church membership. It shall be regarded as a stepping-stone to Church fellowship.

3.—It shall be controlled by the pastor and a committee of pastor's helpers to be appointed by him. The deacons and Sunday-school superintendent shall be ex officio members of such committee, and the whole shall be under the supervision of the Church.

4.—Meetings of the Band shall be held on the first Saturday afternoon of each month (August excepted) at three o'clock. The children shall further be urged to attend the Junior Society of Christian Endeavour.

5.—Each helper shall take the supervision of about six children, shall visit them at their homes at least once a quarter, and hear the parents' testimony concerning them. They shall report the facts of the visit on form provided, together with record of attendance at Sunday-school and Junior Christian Endeavour, and any other information of interest. Above all, they shall make the children assigned to them the subjects of their special prayer and loving care.

6.—Members shall be elected by the committee on the following conditions:—

(a) Their own express desire to forsake all wrong, and accept Jesus Christ as their Saviour.

(b) That one of the parents' written consent shall be obtained.

(c) That the committee is satisfied of each child's sincerity.

7.—Members shall be received into the Band at the morning service in the Church on the last Sunday of the month.

8.—Members shall be recommended for Church fellowship by the committee, each case being treated on its merits.

9.—Members failing to attend the monthly Band meetings, and whose conduct is otherwise unsatisfactory, may be removed from the roll by the committee; not, however, until parents and children have been visited and apprised thereof.

10.—The pastor shall report to the Church meeting quarterly on the work of the Band.

One or two points remain which are worthy of notice. A neat circular letter addressed to the parents containing the constitution, and a form for their signature giving consent for the children to join the Band, should be sent to each home. This should be followed by a visit from the helper, further explaining the intention of the Band. Some parents may hesitate to let their children join; some few may allege that the home training would suffice until such time as the children should be ready to join the Church itself; some, of course, are utterly indifferent. In the main, so far as the writer's own experience went, the parents very warmly responded to the occasion; and, after a twelve months' trial, probably more than 50 per cent. of those whose names were originally taken are attending the meetings of the Band, and giving reasonable satisfaction to the helpers in whose care they are.

A Mother to Mothers.

ALL Christian parents wish and endeavour to bring up their children in the fear of the Lord. How is it, then, we meet with so many apparent failures?

Why are there so many broken-hearted fathers and mothers whose children have gone out from them into the wide world of sin, only, as it seems, to be carried away by the flood of temptation and evil? In such cases parents have only one resource left—to follow them with their prayers. "God forbid" that they should "sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for them" (1 Sam. xii. 23). Is not the cause of failure and of many broken hearts the outcome of parents, especially mothers, not realizing their great responsibility, to say nothing of the wonderful privileges that have been entrusted to them?

(1) We must pray for our children.—Who like a mother can pray for her child from the very first? May we not take a lesson from Hannah (1 Sam. i.) in her solemn vow, that if God gave her a son she would give him back again to the Lord—that our children might be consecrated to God from the very first?

There is the need of daily prayer as the character of the little one unfolds. How much will depend upon the early Christian influence! What record is left day by day on the opening pages of the young life? If when we see the first signs of some besetting sin, we beseech our loving Father in heaven, in faith to take away this particular tendency to evil, how many a dark blot and stain of sin might be wiped away from our children's lives, so that they may arise and call us blessed.

(2). Then we must teach our children to pray. Mothers may ask, How early it is well to begin to teach a child to pray? A preacher of the Gospel was once asked this question. In reply he inquired the age of her child. "Two years old," answered the mother. "Then, madam, you have lost two years!" and there is no doubt truth in this statement. If mothers only make the attempt, they would be surprised to see at what an early age a child is capable of receiving impressions regarding the things of God. "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings Thou hast perfected praise."

(3). We must also pray with our children. Thank God there have been, and are still, those who faithfully act up to their light in this respect. We can praise our Heavenly Father for the influence of such prayers; they bear fruit, if not at once, in after life. It may be when troubles come, when life is a disappointment, and the burden of sin weighs heavily, that the memories of early childhood will come back with redoubled force, and even the words uttered in prayer by dear lips long closed on earth may be the means used of God in bringing the prodigal back to the Father's love.

A Mother.

Is Church Attendance Declining?—I.

By Rev. J. GUINNESS ROGERS, D.D.

THE correspondence on the subject of church attendance in the Press, which recently attracted so much attention, though it did not lead up to any practical issue about which there was even an approach to agreement, brought out many valuable points. But perhaps the most suggestive feature in connection with it was the deep and widespread interest it excited. If the religion of Christ was, as some of the writers—and they the most confident of any—would have us believe, either dead or dying, there would not be so much attention given to the condition of one of its great institutions. It is not easy to understand why those who have satisfied themselves that Christianity is an obsolete force should be so greatly concerned about the rate at which the decline in its outward and visible form of influence is proceeding. Unwilling as they may be to admit it, their very eagerness to prove its decline is a tacit, though undesigned, confession that it retains a powerful hold upon the popular belief. Christianity remains as much as ever a dominant factor in the life of the nation, and of this the numbers who attend public worship with more or less regularity is an emphatic testimony. It is not proved that those numbers are declining, and even if it were, it would be necessary to examine the fact far more closely before accepting it as conclusive evidence of a decay of faith in the Gospel itself. What is proved is that there are multitudes to-day who value the weekly day of public worship, and find pleasure—numbers of them more than pleasure—in church attendance. To me the surprising fact is that the multitude of worshippers is so great, and this is a fact to which the whole correspondence bears witness.

A REACTION AGAINST PURITANISM.

I have no desire to ignore hard facts. It is impossible to deny that there is, in certain classes, a growing tendency to laxity in relation to Sunday observance, and, where this exists, it is sure to show itself in an indifference to public worship. The fact is one which is deplored not only by earnest Christians, but even by many who may be regarded as occupying an attitude of friendly neutrality, but who, recognising the untold advantages the nation has derived from this weekly interval of rest with all that belongs to it, regard the possibility of its loss with grave solicitude. There are men of this type who, on patriotic grounds alone, deplore any weakening of the influence which has been exerted on the national character by the kind of family life which has had its inspiration, its law, and its support in the teachings and surroundings of the sanctuary. That this force has been, to some extent, weakened by modern upheavals, it would be fatuous folly to deny. We are in the midst of a reaction against Puritanism, whose outcry is swelled by the shouts of a rowdy throng, who know as little of that about which they shout as the furious crowd who turned the theatre at Ephesus into a pandemonium. It is enough with numbers—and among them many who ought to know better—to brand an idea or a practice as "Puritan" to ensure its contemptuous rejection. The Puritan prized his Sunday, loved his humble chapel, valued the preaching of the Gospel. Therefore it is fashionable in some quarters to despise and sneer at them alike. And there are those who are caught by the fashion of the hour, or who love to pose as specially free and advanced thinkers, who swell the company of such as desire to range themselves on the side of what they are pleased to regard as liberalism and culture. These are the adverse influences from which both church and chapel are suffering, while hostile spectators looking on exult in the effect as evidence that the Christianity which at heart they hate is losing its hold on the faith of men.

The question whether there is any real foundation for the triumphant tone which they adopt is one of grave import, but it is not to be too hastily answered. Before we acquiesce in the assertion that those who have forsaken the churches, whether their number be great or small, have done so because their faith in Christianity has been undermined, it is essential first to ascertain the exact value of any faith they ever possessed. A man can hardly be said to have lost something which was never his, and it is certain that there always have been attendants on our sanctuaries who have not had any true faith in the Saviour. Whatever the loss of these attendants may mean, one thing it does not mean, and that is an eclipse of faith. There never was any faith in the matter. At one time society—that is, the society in whose circle they moved—expected its members to put in an appearance at a religious service on Sunday morning. Mr. Gladstone once said to me that a distinguished friend of his used to call such people "oncers." They were a numerous company so long as society held that its respectable members should at least be "oncers." The decree of fashion is no longer so stern, and as a consequence the attendance of this class is not so regular as it once was. But it would require some hardihood to admit that this meant any real loss to the army of the faith.

"THE OUTSKIRTS OF RELIGIOUS SOCIETY."

This is not a change from a real acceptance of the Gospel, and the consecration of heart and life which that implies, to a rejection of its authority because of a disbelief in its truth. If it were so, and if a change of this kind were passing over any considerable section of the English people, there would be enough to make Christian hearts anxious and concerned. Such developments would be too ominous to be passed over. For my own part I fail to find them. It is true that unbelief, or, to speak with more exactitude, agnosticism, is more bold and aggressive, and consequently those who were once disposed to give an occasional attendance at public worship, rather than face the social obloquy attaching to avowed unbelief, are now more pronounced in their hostility. But at heart they always were enemies of the Cross of Christ.

So with another class who, having once been formalists, have abandoned even this outward conformity to religious habits. They find it convenient or pleasant to hang on the outskirts of religious society, and are desirous to have credit for a certain measure of sympathy with it. They assume that they may hold their position to-day without the attendance at church which was once thought necessary to respectability. But there is nothing in this change of attitude which has any serious significance. They have neither more nor less faith to-day than when they were occasional, it may even have been regular, worshippers. The Gospel has no strength from merely nominal adherents of this kind. What decline there may have been in their number, I am not prepared to say. Occasionally in religious journals, especially those belonging to the Established Church by whom such defections are likely to be most felt, there are complaints that the house parties at country mansions are more careless on this point, and that the farmers and labourers, following the example of their social "betters," are less frequent in their attendance. Such lapses are to be regretted on many accounts, but it would be folly to exaggerate their meaning, and to treat them as indications of a waning faith. There was not much faith in the act of the fashionable lady who dropped her card in the box at the church door in fulfilment of the law of etiquette. But she had done the correct thing, and those who, as a mere matter of form, present themselves at the morning service, are simply carrying out the self-same idea. Their state furnishes matter for grave reflection, but the change in their outward conduct of which we speak is indicative merely of a change in the fashion of their class. "Oncers" have become absentees. That is the whole of the change. Estimates as to its importance will doubtless vary considerably. For my part I do not attach much significance to the change.

"Our Daily Bread."

SUNDAY, February 9. Genesis xv.

WHEN Abram had time to reflect on his return from the defeat of the great confederation, he might well have been dismayed at the possible consequences; and it was just then that the word of the Lord came unto him. This is the first time that this expression occurs in the Bible. Write word with a capital W, and is it not also true? Did not the Word come, and does He not come still? And is He not a shield, and an exceeding great reward? For every man there is need of a shield, because to every one life is a battle; and for every man who has renounced the goods of the King of Sodom, refusing to take even a shoelatchet, it is milk and honey to know that the Son of God presents Himself as his exceeding great reward.

Abram called the Almighty, Adonai Jehovah, a combination which occurs only twice more in the five books of Moses, and told Him that his heart was breaking with desire for a child of his own. As he was talking, the stars came out, and God said, Count them; and when Abram could not, God told him that so would be the numbers of his seed—not only after the flesh, but after the spirit (Gal. iii.). "And Abram believed God." This is the first time that believed occurs in the Bible; he reckoned on the promise as if it were already a fact. To him it was as good as done. Faith is our reckoning on God; while faithfulness is God reckoning on us.

Then God ratified his promise by condescending to the outward habits and customs of the time. The Shekinah lamp passed between the parted pieces of the sacrifice as the contracting party would do. There were to be dark days of sin and defeat, of affliction and bondage, but there was one ray of comfort, on which all after generations based their life, "They shall come hither again." And when God says it, Pharaoh cannot prevail.

MONDAY, February 10. Genesis xvi.

How often we are tempted, as Sarah was, to substitute our own thoughts and expedients for the simple way of faith. When ministers resort to worldly entertainments and social gatherings for the maintenance of their congregations, or when philanthropists raise money by raffling, is it not a resort to Hagar for the children, which should be the gift of God to faith? Out of Sarah's want of faith, came grief, to herself and to others; and above all, jealousy. Let us specially beware of jealousy, which is cruel as the grave, living as it does on suspicion, and eating out its own heart. The only cure is to act towards the person of whom you are jealous, in the power of the love of God. Let God's love pass through you. Do kind things to and for them.

Sarah was so cruel that Hagar fled, but the Angel sent her back with excellent advice—Return and Submit. This is a Christian precept, but it is early and startling to find it in Genesis. There is no other safe policy for any of us. Let us be sure that we are where God wants us to be, and if there be wrongs and troubles there, let us quietly bear them, knowing that in due time we shall conquer by our passive endurance. But see the hope that the Angel left with her. She could well bear Sarah's heavy hand, to whose eyes had been unfolded the prospect of so large an influence. Submit yourself to God's will and word, and then commit the keeping of your soul to your faithful Creator.

Yes, great God, Thou art a God that seeth not as I once thought, looking through the eyehole of a cell, like a gaoler, but waiting to see how and when Thou canst help thy children best.

TUESDAY, February 11. Genesis xvii.

Many years, at least thirteen, had passed since the promise was first given to Abram. Years of stern discipline! Years of hope strained almost to breaking! Years of special anguish to Sarah! But permitted by the God of Love. So wait we still. Year passes after year, and the time seems long. Our hearts misgive us and cry, "Hath God forgotten to be gracious? Hath He in anger shut up his tender mercies?" Then we say to ourselves, "This is our infirmity, but we will remember the years of the right hand of the Most High."

Yet all through these long years let us listen to the eternal voice, speaking to us in the stillness of the heart, "I am El Shaddai; walk before Me, and be thou perfect, and I will make my covenant with thee, and will multiply thee exceedingly." Thou art sowing for harvests, which shall fill thy soul with the joy of God!

But if we would have the blessing, we must keep the covenant. For us circumcision means the putting away of the sins of the flesh. There is sore need of separation from all that is worldly, selfish, sensual, and of the evil one. Are our lives clean? Have we consciences void of offence towards God and man? But let us see to it that in putting away what is wrong, we do not also put away what is natural and human, which God may have put into our life richly to enjoy.

Mark the inclusion of little children in the thought and purpose of God. Let the parents see to it that they so tend their children, by prayer and loving heed, that not by an outward rite merely, but an inward spirit, they may be included in the divine covenant.

WEDNESDAY, February 12. Genesis xviii.

Let us draw near and see this great sight. First, the Lord Himself becomes the guest of mortal man. Three men came to the tent, but in the presence of the One, whom Abraham addressed as Lord, the others are hardly noticed. When that mysterious Personage is withdrawn, the two others destroy cities. Did not the patriarch see and entertain the Christ that day? It seems that he did, for Christ said, "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day, and he saw it, and was glad." The Word of God rejoiced in the habitable places of the earth before his Incarnation. His delights from of old were with the sons of men; and He is with us still, standing at the door to knock, that if any open the door He may come in and abide. To us He says, as during his earthly life, "Make haste, and come down; for to-day I must abide at thy house."

When God comes to us, He brings such blessed promises as fill our souls with laughter. There is the laughter of unbelief and scepticism, but there is the genuine laughter of satisfied longing. Sarah laughed with the first; but she was destined to laugh with the second before the year had passed. There was a good thing in store for her beyond what her fondest hopes had conceived.

God was so sure of Abraham that He felt able to take him into his secret counsels, and tell him what He was about to do. He was no longer a servant, but a friend. The secret of the Lord was with him, as it will be with us, and he was drawn into holy familiarity with God, while himself being led on to know the love of God.

THURSDAY, February 13. Genesis xix.

The God who gave life can take it back if it is used immorally. He can create, and He can destroy—the supreme Judge of all the earth, and the Arbiter of human destiny. If a city or a country is a menace to the purity and well-being of the world, it must be destroyed; just as we stamp out the cattle-disease, with drastic severity, lest it rob us of all our beasts.

But God never sends the angel of judgment till He has made careful investigation. He goes down to see! Such sights as were to be seen, and such words as were to be heard in Sodom, carry with them their own sentence. It is impossible to see and hear them without feeling that only fire and brimstone can disinfect the world. Such sin cannot be tolerated lest man rot in corruption. Fulness of bread and abundance of idleness, failure to strengthen the hand of the poor and needy, haughty pride, and abominable sin, are cited by the prophet Jeremiah as the cause of the overthrow of the cities of the plain.

There are to be found symptoms of similar sins amongst ourselves; let us beware; let the children of God fervently bear their witness against them, that we may arrest the inevitable judgment. Jude tells us that these cities set forth to all after ages an example of what is meant by eternal fire. Probably our Lord had this scene in mind when He spoke of certain nations who were merciless to the hungry, thirsty, and naked, being sent away into the eternal fire, prepared for the devil and his angels.

In the midst of wrath God remembers mercy. He will not destroy the righteous with the wicked. In answer to Abraham's prayer, Lot is rescued from the overthrow. He was a sorry specimen of a righteous man, as the Apostle Peter calls him; but his rescue shows how glad God is to save any that He can.

FRIDAY, February 14. Genesis xx.

What a wonderful thing that Abraham should fall like this. He had walked with God for so many years, had been so wonderfully preserved in his residence in Canaan and conflict with the kings, had received such repeated assurances, that we might have supposed that he had reached a permanent position of unassailable goodness. Ah, such is not possible in this world! The best men are but men at the best; God takes us for worse, as well as for better; He knows that we are but dust. Note that the patriarch failed in his strong point—his faith. He feared for his life here as he had done on first coming into the land. Old sins have a curious tendency, like old stumps left in the ground, to sprout again.

There were natural religion and goodness in Abimelech, which were very attractive, and far exceeded what Abraham expected (v. 11). Have a large charity! Believe and hope all things. There is more religion in the world than you suppose. It crops up in unexpected places, and men have dealings with God, who are altogether outside the pale of your religious life. God has dealings with such (v. 3), but they need the help of those who are more perfectly instructed in the faith (v. 17).

If God kept Abimelech from sinning against Him, cannot He keep thee? Surely if thine heart is true in its desire to be kept, He will keep. Cannot He keep the feet of his saints? Cease to look at thy foes or thy weakness; engage thy thoughts with his great power and his desire to present thee to Himself, without spot, or wrinkle, or blemish. Praise God for the times He has withheld us from sinning against Him!

SATURDAY, February 15. Genesis xxi.

It seems a very sad and startling providence that Hagar and Ishmael should have to go forth into the inhospitable desert. One of the saddest cries ever torn from woman's heart was Hagar's when she said, "Let me not look upon the death of the child." A mother is generally eager to watch and minister to each movement of the little life that is flickering out; but here the bitterness of her anguish seemed to kill the maternal pitifulness. Poor slave-girl! She was more sinned against than sinning!

Beneath their sad lot a divine purpose was running. "And God said unto Abraham, Let it not be grievous in thy sight." This is the message of the Bible, that things happen not at the bidding of blind chance, nor at the whim of a jealous woman, but by the will of a Father's choice. And, after all, is not the wilderness more likely to nurture a strong and noble character than the verdant plains of Beersheba? Would not even Isaac himself have been a finer man if there had been a touch of the wilderness in his life also? How many of us owe the strongest traits of character to what may have seemed to onlookers, when it happened, a piece of unmitigated misfortune! It is an open question whether disinherited heirs have not done most for the world!

But in any case "God was with the lad, and he grew." He was with Abraham in his tamarisk grove in Beersheba, beneath which He invoked God's present aid (v. 33); but He was also with Ishmael, as he became the root of a tree, with far-spreading branches.

Samuel and Saul.

The Reconstruction of the Jewish Commonwealth.

(1 Sam. vi., vii.)

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

WE need not concern ourselves, to any great length, with the most interesting adventures of the Ark, the sacred symbol of the worship of Jehovah. That part of the history more closely concerns the growing illumination of the surrounding nations as to the true nature of the God of Israel.

There was no other way in which the Spirit of God could inform the people of Philistia, as to his holiness and power, than that which He adopted in the present instance. They bore the Ark from the battlefield to the Temple of Dagon in exuberant triumph. It seemed as though the Philistines had not only triumphed over Israel, but over its tutelary deity, and that Dagon was superior to Jehovah. They would not have been impressed by the message of a prophet. They would have scouted and stoned any who opposed the universal, national adoration of Dagon; but they could not resist the conclusions forced on them when, on two succeeding mornings, they found his image prostrate before the emblem of Jehovah. That it might be made still clearer that this was no coincidence, but the act of God, and that He had a controversy with them, a terrible plague of "tumours" broke out on each successive city to which the Ark was removed, and a visitation of destructive vermin.

The reverence with which the Philistines refer to the God of Israel indicates that new and lofty conceptions were beginning to take the place of the low and materialistic ones that had degraded Jehovah to the level of their own local deities. "The cry of the city went up to heaven." "Ye shall give glory unto the God of Israel." "Take the ark of Jehovah."

What a sublime revelation this is of the Divine methods with man! With an infinite longing He desires to win the allegiance and devotion of all men. The consummate and unapproachable revelation which He has made for this purpose is in the Son of his Love. "The only begotten of the Father, He hath declared Him." But of what use had it been to have spoken of his Son in those early days, when the hearts of men were darkened by the grossest conceptions and basest morals? No! line must be on line, precept upon precept. The times of ignorance must be "winked at." Could they have understood Epistles like those of St. John, such would, without doubt, have been written for their learning and correction, and communicated to them by some man of God; but since they could not understand such means of instruction, they were reached by the overthrow and shattering of their idol, and the plagues which accompanied the progress of the Ark.

Similarly, the inhabitants of that frontier town had to learn by a stern lesson that God was a holy God, and that He could not permit them to manifest a wanton curiosity and irreverence in handling the sacred emblem of his presence. To pry into the Ark as they did, lifting its lid, and peering on its contents, was forbidden to the priests, and even the High Priest himself; how much more to them? It had been distinctly asserted, when the two sons of Aaron perished on the day of their inauguration to the priesthood, that God would be sanctified in all that came nigh Him, and before all the people He would be glorified (Lev. x. 3).

The reverence due to Him must be shown to the vessels of the sanctuary, which were carefully veiled by the priests before they were taken up for transportation by the Levites (Num. i. 50, 51; iv. 5, 16-30). The swift retribution which followed on this act of irreverence extorted the reverent acknowledgment of the awful holiness of God, as the men of Beth-shemesh said, "Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God?" When, on the other hand, the Ark had been reverently borne to Kirjath-jearim, the city of the woods, some three miles' distance from the great valley of Beth-shemesh, on which the crops were goldening in the sun, and had been carefully entrusted to the custody of Abinadab and his son Eleazar, the blessing that befell his house was an indication of the tender love and pity of the Divine nature, who is willing to dwell with him that is of a humble and lowly heart, and that trembleth at his word.

Oh, do not fear Jehovah with the dread of a craven heart, but with the loyal love and devotion of sons, and open your heart to receive not the Ark of the Covenant only, but Him whom God had set forth for a propitiation, and who is the propitiation for our sins, i.e., the mercy-seat which covers the Ark of the Covenant, sprinkled with blood, and exactly fitting and hiding the Tables of Law beneath.

SAMUEL'S GREAT TASK.

Whilst these events were in process, Samuel was giving himself to the great and noble work of reconstruction. As soon as our flesh is lacerated, or our bones broken, Nature begins to pour out her reparative forces to renew the broken tissues, and so rebuild the ruined temple. As it is in physical life, so in spiritual there are always holy and gentle natures that are charged with the Divine work of bridging over the roaring torrent of revolution, and of rearing new continents of order from the weltering ocean waste by which the previous land had been engulfed. Blessed work, indeed, is this, like the work of the Almighty, who, when the earth was without form and void, began to build in the midst of her the habitable places for man's existence.

To this Samuel devoted the twenty years that followed directly on the fatal field of Aphek. The Philistine invasion seems to have somewhat subsided from its first triumphant outburst, and to have retired from the occupancy of the interior portions of Israel. He was thus able to pursue his quiet and unobtrusive toils for his fatherland, free from the zealous supervision and opposition to which, otherwise, he must have been subjected.

He seems to have taken up his abode in Ramah, so intimately associated with his earliest days. Here were his headquarters, where young men gathered to him, and were formed into the earliest of the schools of the prophets, and where also he married, and became the father of two sons. Their names are suggestive of their father's piety and walk with God, the name of the one being Joel—"Jehovah is God," and of the other Abiah—"Jehovah is my Father." Amid the general disturbance of the religious life in which he had been nurtured, with the Ark in one place and the remnants of the Tabernacle in another, with the discontinuance of the sacred rites and feasts, which had been so great an assistance to piety in former years, Samuel nevertheless was able to walk with God, and to preserve a devout religious life. Probably this is why God permits from time to time so great a shaking of the things that are made, that the things which cannot be shaken, the unseen and eternal, may be more clearly defined and more eagerly sought unto. In this present age, we have heard Him saying, "I will overturn, overturn, overturn;" we have seen the truths of inspiration rudely assailed, churches menaced with destruction, ancient creeds ruthlessly questioned; but, out of it all, true religion is destined to emerge in undiminished lustre, as gold from the purifying furnace. In the meanwhile, let us say with Samuel, Jehovah is God and Jehovah is my Father. Let us hold fast, above all, to His unchanging love.

Samuel knew that there were two objects which must be realized before Israel's sad condition could be remedied or the Divine ideal realized. First: The national unity must be recovered from the anarchy in which it had been overwhelmed. It was useless to think of holding the land against the inroads of the neighbouring people so long as each tribe was content with an isolated existence, repelling its own enemies for a time, but indifferent to the condition of its neighbours and of the country at large. Israel must be one, animated by a common enthusiasm for its future independence and integrity. Let each tribe be proud of its idiosyncrasy, and fulfil its own distinctive mission; but let all be one in asserting the independence and glory of the chosen people.

This is no less desirable in our own age. The divisions of the Church are her bane, and render her impotent before her foes. Ephraim envies Judah, and Judah vexes Ephraim; and their common enemies make profit out of their mutual recriminations and rivalries. It is a sad spectacle to witness the divisions between Christians in the face of a mocking world, and we shall never be able to win it till we have learned to magnify the points of agreement, and to bear with all those who love the Lord Jesus, and are united with Him as their living Head, though their method of stating the truth may differ widely from our own.

Secondly: The evils that had eaten into the nation's heart must be put away. The people had forsaken the God of their fathers for the Phœnician and Philistine deities, whose images were worshipped in his stead. Shrines to Baal and Ashtoreth covered the land. Foul orgies of shameless impurity were everywhere rife. And it was evident that only a widespread revival of religion could save the people from rotting away before the very evils for which the ancient Canaanites had been destroyed.

Samuel was pre-eminently a man of prayer. He is known on the subsequent page of Scripture as he that called on the Divine Name (1 Sam. ix. 6, 7, 8, 9; Psa. xcix. 6; Jer. xv. 1). In addition, he was a man of blameless reputation and life—in themselves eminent qualifications. It has been truly said that the special work of guiding, moderating, and softening the jarring counsels of men is the particular privilege of those who have grown up into natural strength from the early beginnings of purity and goodness; of those who can humbly and thankfully look back through middle age, and youth, and childhood, with no sudden rent or breach to their pure and peaceful recollections—and such was certainly Samuel's happy lot. He was also a man of practical sagacity, and by his appeals wrought upon the national conscience; so that, as the result of his efforts, "it came to pass, while the Ark abode in Kirjath-jearim, that the time was long; for it was twenty years: and all the house of Israel lamented before the Lord."

Notice those two phrases; all the house of Israel—there is the restoration of the lost unity; lamented before the Lord—there is the national repentance, which was followed by a widespread reformation: "Then the children of Israel did put away Baalim and Ashtaroth, and served the Lord only." Would that there might be a similar turning unto God in our own time and land! "Revive, O Lord, thy work in the midst of the years. In the midst of the years make known."

*Christ and the Believer.

By Dr. A. T. PIERSON.

WHAT is the difference between Christ's work for the world at large and his office for us as believers? Our Scripture (1 John ii. 1, 2) makes the distinction clear. Jesus Christ the righteous is not an Advocate or Paraclete for the world; that is the family blessing belonging only to the children of God. But He is the Propitiation or Mercy-seat for the sins of the whole world, in common with the sins of believers. Let us consider, first, the broader work which Christ does for those who, nevertheless, finally reject Him and perish.

It is in a representative sense that our Lord is the second Man or the last Adam (1 Cor. xv. 45-47). He is the second Man, because He follows the first, and He is the last Adam because there is no other to follow Him. Adam was a figure of Him that was to come (Rom. v. 14), in that both represented the whole human race. It was the misfortune, so to speak, of those who had no voluntary participation in Adam's guilt, and they inherited a sin-stained nature, and consequently came under the reign of death. The redemption which the infinite love of God provided in Christ, as the second representatives of the race, could not be extended to certain angels, seeing that they were outside the human sphere, and their fall was voluntary.

I simply express my own judgment when I say that, as millions fell who had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, so millions shall rise who had not believed after the manner of Adam's faith. In one sense the work of Jesus Christ was universal; it prevented any human soul going to perdition simply because Adam sinned. Until the will enters into transgression, the will need not enter into salvation; but when we fall of our own volition, our will having entered into sin, we must enter into salvation by voluntary faith. This is the plain teaching of God's Word; and, if theologians do not agree with it, so much the worse for them. Apart from this teaching, how shall we account for the salvation of infant children, imbeciles, and irresponsible persons? How is it we venture to hope that, out of all nations, some persons will be saved who have sought to live up to the light, though they have never heard of Jesus? There is instinctive acceptance of the fact that Jesus Christ was Head of the race, and He stood for it, and that it was affected by his work. So far as Adam's sin only is concerned, no soul need be lost. How beautiful and glorious is Christ's work for the world!

ATONEMENT UNIVERSAL.

Our Lord Jesus Christ has provided reconciliation even for sinning men. In his sacrifice, He laid the basis of a world-wide atonement—sufficient unto all men, efficient only to the believer. It is notable that God is never represented, in the New Testament, as needing to be reconciled to man. We are apt to talk of reconciliation in a loose way. Among men it implies mutual activity. If one of two estranged persons turns to the other, it is not reconciliation but conciliation. There is a common tendency to think of God as turned away from man until, through Jesus Christ, the Divine position is reversed, so that man may turn to God. Even Wesley sang, "My God is reconciled," but the Bible does not say so.

The heart of God yearned after sinning man from the beginning. "God hath reconciled (Himself to us? Never!) us to Himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation; and God was in Christ reconciling (Himself to the world? Never!) the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them" (2 Cor. v. 18, 19). God does not count my sins against me. Let there be no idea, on man's part, of placating God. The only hindrance to reconciliation between the sinner and God, is on the human side. God can be just, and yet the Justifier of him that believeth in Jesus (Rom. iii. 26); and having regard to the provision made by the atoning sacrifice of Christ, for world-wide reconciliation on the part of man God is ready to accept every sinner that comes to Him in penitence and faith.

By the work of Jesus Christ all responsibility is transferred to the sinner. Let us not do God the injustice of suspecting that his offer of salvation is not a genuine one. It is a false view of the doctrine of election, when the Divine choice is supposed to nullify any man's thirst after God, and desire for his salvation. Such a belief paralyses preaching, and is a reproach to God, who "will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth" (1 Tim. ii. 4). Look at Matt. xxiii. 37, "O Jerusalem . . . how often would I have gathered thy children together . . . and ye would not!" What is the last message of grace that ends the Book of Revelation? "Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." All that is necessary is the thirst of the soul. There is no decree of God that will keep any thirsty or willing soul from salvation.

MEMBERS OF HIS BODY.

The other aspect of Christ's work concerns the child of God. Believers are identified with their Lord under his Headship of the body, which is higher than that of the race. Receiving Him as your Saviour, you become part of the organism that thrills with his very life. In history, destiny, and glory, you are one with Him. The life that is in my head permeates all my body. Activity and sensation, in spiritual things, become possible because Christ's life enters into you. Representation of the race is judicial, but identification with Christ is actual, for believers become partakers of the Divine nature (2 Peter i. 4).

All the experiences of Jesus Christ are realised by his people. He was born of the Holy Ghost, and overcame the temptations of the devil; and these are points of your experience. He was crucified, in Him you died; He rose again, in Him you rose. For forty days He moved among men, in newness of life, then ascended up on high, took his seat at the right hand of God, and is coming in glory. You are coming with Him. When the Head is enthroned, the body is enthroned also. "All things are yours . . . and ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's" (1 Cor. iii. 21-23).

In Christ's name I have the same access to God as He has. Knowing that my name has no weight with God, I use the NAME of my Master. In his personality I dare to claim spiritual blessing, not only as my privilege, but as my right. It honours God when we take the place He assigns us; and it is a false humility to refuse to do so.

When I become a child of God I transfer my responsibility to Christ. I believe in the perseverance, not of the saints, but of my Lord. He says: "I give unto my sheep eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand . . . no man is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand." How shall anyone get at the sheep when these two hands come together?

NO SEPARATION.

"Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?" The children of God may be subjected all the day long to the killing process; but it cannot separate them from Christ's love; not through their persistence, but because He abideth faithful. In the seven things that are questioned, there is a growth of intensity—first, tribulation; then distress, persecution, famine, nakedness, peril to life, and actual martyrdom by the sword. "Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through Him that loved us."

Look at the ten things that follow. The universe has four kinds of development in the worlds of matter, life, time, and space. "For I am persuaded that neither death nor life," worlds material and immaterial; "nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers," worlds of intelligence, of being, in earth and hell; "nor things present, nor things to come," worlds of time, stretching over all duration; "nor height, nor depth," worlds of space; and, as if anything else could be added, nothing in the whole creation "shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. viii. 35-39).

The price of our salvation is the death of our Saviour; the sphere of our safe keeping is the life of the Keeper; and the secret of victory is union with the victor.

* Notes of an address.

Natives in the Transvaal.

FAIR CONTRACTS AND NO DRINK.

IMPORTANT alterations have been made in the native laws in the Transvaal, with a view to rendering the existence of the aborigines less that of slaves. The full extent of the changes is revealed in a Blue-book issued last week, and the general spirit animating the Imperial Government may be gathered from a despatch from the Colonial Secretary to Lord Milner on August 17 last, in which Mr. Chamberlain stated:

In considering this question you will doubtless bear in mind our conversations on this subject, and the strong desire which I expressed that the laws affecting native labour in the Transvaal should be assimilated as nearly as possible to those in force in the West Indies.

Both Lord Milner and Sir Godfrey Lagden, the Commissioner for Native Affairs, set forth the difficulties which legislation touching natives presents. The former, in forwarding a series of proclamations issued last autumn, outlines the policy which he and his colleagues are following. He expresses his agreement with the Aborigines Protection Society, "that native institutions should not be unnecessarily interfered with; that their existing system of communal tenure and of tribal government, and their traditional customs, so far as they are not in gross conflict with civilized ideas, should be respected; that they should not be compelled by force or induced by fraud to leave their own country for service with white men; and that their taxation should be in proportion to the services rendered and the benefits bestowed upon them by our Government. Finally, I think—though this is not a point specially touched upon by the society—that much more should be done for the education of the natives than has ever yet been attempted in the Transvaal."

Lord Milner points to the evils of administration under the former Government, and calls attention to the proclamations which ensure:—

1. Labour agents and overseers must be licensed by the Government, so as to abolish the "irresponsible labour touts" and end "the unscrupulous proceedings of compound managers intriguing to steal natives from one another."

2. Freedom of contract and full knowledge of its contents by the natives, inspectors being appointed to redress grievances, and the Government issuing passports after satisfactory evidence that the native knows the terms upon which he proposes to sell his service.

3. A simplified method of tracing natives.

4. The abolition of all deductions from the wages stipulated in the contract.

5. Contracts, with rare exceptions, will be for only one year instead of for an unlimited period.

6. Flogging for desertion or any offence under the Pass Law is abolished, thus ending the "harshness" on the part of the employer and the "unscrupulous trickery" on the part of the employed.

7. Total prohibition of the drink traffic is enforced, and the penalties for supplying natives are rendered more severe, there being no option of a fine. Remarking on this, Lord Milner says: "There is no doubt that the new administration has before it a severe struggle with one of the most powerful, as it is one of the most degraded, agencies for making money by the corruption of one's fellow-creatures."

8. The Commissioner for Native Affairs may exempt from the Pass Law coloured persons of a higher degree of civilization than the mass of the aboriginal natives.

After entering into detail upon these enactments, the High Commissioner states: "Generally speaking, I claim for the Native Code which we are trying to introduce, and of which these proclamations are the first instalment, that it is conceived in the best interests of the natives, and that any restrictions imposed on their personal liberty do not go beyond what is necessary, not only for the protection of the white population, but for the good of the natives themselves. Moreover, the control which it is proposed to exercise over the natives is so devised as to improve and not to degrade them."

The Famine in India.

THE condition of certain districts of India is shown by the latest intelligence to be increasing in gravity, and to call for the practical sympathy of Christian people. The responsibilities of missionaries for famine orphans are already very heavy, but the sad burden is increased by the recent recurrence of famine conditions.

Gujarat, in particular, is in a most distressful state. Relief operations are extending, although slowly. A correspondent of the Bombay Gazette, writing from Ahmedabad, says:—"Already a few test works have been opened, and preparations are being made to open others and provide for the numbers of labourers and dependents who are shortly expected to be in need of assistance. Crops which might have otherwise fared well have been destroyed by rats and insects, and the cultivator is in a bad way. There is, however, no lack of fodder for the cattle, and this it is which differentiates the present situation from that of 1899. It is estimated that by April there will be 50,000 people on relief works." This number would undoubtedly have been much greater had not the loss of life in the last famine diminished the possible extent of distress in this one. The census returns show a decline of 125,500 in the population of the district.

SAVING FAMINE WAIFS.

Among other institutions which have been of service in ministering to the needs of orphans is "Our Saviour's Orphan Home," describing which Mrs. Harriet Tytler writes: "The Home is now to be located in Juggodlee, about twenty-five miles from Umballa, where the children will have their farm."

Mrs. Tytler goes on to speak of the improvement in the physical condition of the famine waifs who have come under her care, and looks forward to the time when the institution will be self-supporting. "Much, of course, has to be done. The temporary home has to be erected for the children." Anxiety has been caused by the action of a strongly anti-Christian sect, whose members have succeeded in enticing away one of the inmates, a bright, promising child. The matter is to be fought out in the courts of law.

OFFICIAL HAIRSPLITTING.

It is gratifying to find that, in submitting to the Governor-General of India the report from the Indian Famine Commission, Lord George Hamilton sets on one side to a great extent that miserable tendency of the purely official mind to look at things from the cheeseparing point of view. The Commissioners not only recommended the abolition of the minimum relief wage, irrespective of task, a reduction in the wages scale, and a restriction of admission to labour work to persons "selected after local inquiry," but they also deeply deplored the fact that the sum expended in relief was in excess of previous ones and was "excessive," due partly to the increased tendency to accept relief "owing to the demoralising influence of the previous famines."

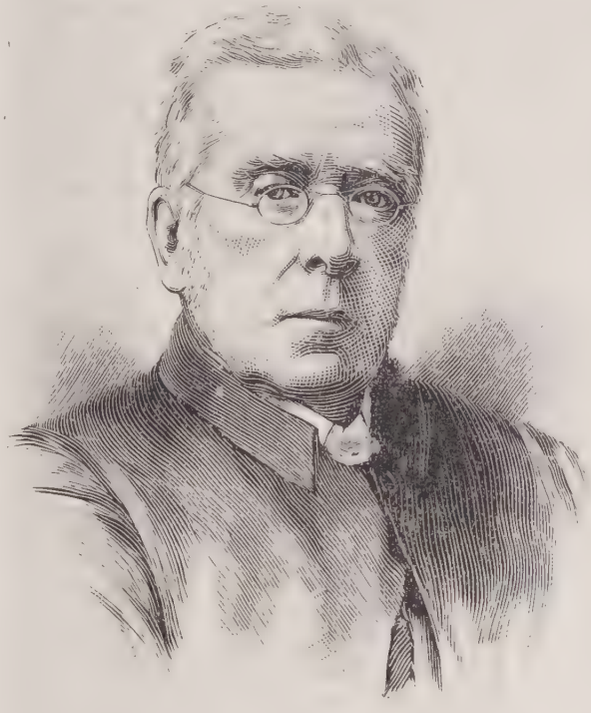
The Secretary of State for India, however, suggests to his Chief that the famine was without parallel in the history of modern India, that it fell upon a population already reduced in resources and staying power, and that the exceptional circumstances called for and condoned an expenditure beyond precedent in the relief of distress. He also ventures to express his agreement with the Commissioners' opinion that the excessive mortality which resulted from the famine "cannot in all cases be dissociated from privation." All this hair-splitting over a few handfuls of rice more or less seems very pitiful in face of the terrible facts, and certainly portions of the correspondence afford a striking commentary upon our government of the great dependency.

A Long Pastorate.

Rev. T. M. MORRIS, of Ipswich.

A LIFE of three-score years and ten, of which fifty-six have been spent in strenuous labour for Christ, and forty-three as minister in one town, is a noble record for any man to look back upon. In retiring from active public work, Rev. T. M. Morris will be followed by the good wishes, not only of local friends, but of many who have come into contact with him in the wider sphere of service in connection with the Baptist Union and the Baptist Missionary Society.

It is true that Mr. Morris' name will be best known and honoured amongst his Baptist brethren; but he has ever been a man of generous sympathies, and although, as pastor of a large church in the county town of Suffolk, he has had an abundance of demands upon his time and energy, he has always been ready to render any help within his power to weaker churches, whether belonging to his own denomination or to any other section of the Church of Christ.



REV. T. M. MORRIS.

Strangers to Mr. Morris would gain a good insight into the spirit of his life and teaching by perusing the two addresses he delivered from the presidential chair of the Baptist Union, in 1893, and a volume of sermons he issued some time ago, under the title of "The Mystery of the Burning Bush." The spring address was entitled "Our Greatest Need," and therein Mr. Morris observed that: "The number of conversions is small, the tone of piety is low, the distinctions between the Church and the world are obscure, prayer-meetings are neglected, a large proportion of professing Christians are apparently insensible to their obligations so far as active service to the Master is concerned." In view of all this, and of the large masses of people unreached by the Gospel message, Mr. Morris defined the "greatest need" as "a Pentecostal effusion of the Holy Spirit, a revival of true spiritual religion in our churches"; and he pointed out that the Holy Spirit is needed for (1) the origination and sustentation of the Christian life; (2) the ascertainment and realisation of Christian truth; (3) the maintenance and manifestation of Christian unity; and (4) the rendering of effective Christian service. The autumnal address dealt in the same practical manner with "Our Proper Work," which was set out as "to carry on Christ's work in the world, to be his representatives, agents, and witnesses."

Bearing in mind Mr. Morris' long ministerial career, it is interesting to note that his father also was a minister, and that Mrs. Morris is a grand-daughter of a minister. The subject of our sketch was born at Portsea in October, 1830. At the age of fifteen, under his father's ministry at Southampton, he came to the great decision of life, and was baptized on profession of his faith in Christ. Resolving to devote himself to the Gospel ministry, he entered Horton (now Rawdon) Baptist College, and, when he had completed his studies there, proceeded to Edinburgh University, where he attended the classes of Sir William Hamilton, having as a fellow-student Dr. Oswald Dykes, Principal of the Westminster Presbyterian College, Cambridge.

After a brief pastorate at Romsey, Hants, Mr. Morris, in the autumn of 1858, was invited to undertake the charge of Turret Green Church, Ipswich. His work here met with much success, so that by 1875 the membership had doubled. Feeling, however, that the time for a forward movement had come, and the church being divided upon the matter of a site for a new chapel, Mr. Morris, with the view of building up a strong church in another part of the town, resigned the pastorate at Turret Green, and accepted the charge of a smaller church in Burlington Road. In a fraternal spirit many of the members and a large part of the congregation of Turret Green followed Mr. Morris, and in 1876 a handsome building was erected, at a cost of nearly £7,000, capable of accommodating 1,100 people. Here a vigorous and influential church has been gathered of between 400 and 500 members, together with a Sunday-school of 800. Two mission stations are under the charge of the church, and the usual organizations are in full and useful operation. The missionary spirit is strong at Burlington, an illustration of the axiom, "Like pastor, like people." Mr. Morris has served upon the Committee of the Baptist Missionary Society for many years, and about eleven years ago, accompanied by Rev. Dr. Glover, of Bristol, he visited the stations of the Society in China. An account of their experiences and impressions was subsequently published in a volume entitled, "A Winter in North China." Rev. Sidney W. Ennals, who laid down his young and promising life in the recent uprising in China, was a member of Burlington Church, and two other members are at work upon the foreign field.

To the interests of his denomination in the villages and towns of Suffolk, Mr. Morris has rendered yeoman service as secretary of the Suffolk and Norfolk Baptist Home Missionary Union; while as a member of the Council (and in 1893-4 as president) of the Baptist Union, he has helped forward the work of the Church in a wider sphere.

In the midst of his many and varied duties in relation to distinctively religious matters, Mr. Morris has found time to give attention and labour to most of the organizations in Ipswich for the social and moral welfare of the townspeople, especially the School Board and the East Suffolk Hospital. Up till a short time since he had happily been blessed with excellent health, but during the last year he has been subject to nervous attacks, and has thus been unable to attend fully to his pastoral duties. He accordingly tendered his resignation, which the church regretfully accepted, and the tie so long binding pastor and people was severed at the end of last year. It is specially pleasing to note that at the Communion Service on the first Sunday of the present year, Mr. Morris, who presided, received forty-three persons into church fellowship. H. J. C.

A Sound of Rain.

Mr. JOHN R. MOTT IN CALCUTTA.

By the Editor.

NOTHING has impressed me more, during these few weeks in India, than the highly successful endeavour of Mr. John R. Mott to influence the educated young men of this country. I have in a previous letter alluded to his addresses during the anniversary Convention of the Y.M.C.A. in Allahabad. He has now spent a week in Calcutta, where he gave a series of addresses from January 7 to 12, to which the students in the various colleges were specially invited.

These meetings were held in Overtoun Hall, the audience room of the College Branch of the Y.M.C.A. This building was erected as one of the Lady Dufferin hospitals; but, proving too publicly situated for high-caste women, it was sold to the Y.M.C.A. The purchase money was raised by Mr. Campbell White, brother of Professor W. W. White, whose Bible lectures and diagrams were so highly appreciated in London three years ago. Mr. Campbell White visited Great Britain and America, and received so liberal a response to his appeal that the building became the property of the Y.M.C.A. The name of the audience-room speaks for itself.

The average attendance at Mr. Mott's six meetings was 650. On the last evening the subject announced was "The Battle Ground for Young Men," and the attendance 800. After-meetings were held on three evenings, and 230 men signed cards signifying their sense of sin and desire to be freed from it. Cards were signed by 111, stating that they wished to follow Christ up to their present light. About twenty others made a similar statement in a qualified way. Many of these men are earnest inquirers, and it is hoped and expected that not a few will give effect to their convictions by baptism, which is the Rubicon separating the believer in the Lord Jesus, whether Jew, Mohammedan, or Hindoo, from his past and from his relatives. This explains more clearly than is often apprehended at home the words of Christ, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved."

Active and organized plans are in progress to follow up the work of Mr. Mott, by inviting these men into Bible classes, having private interviews with them, providing them with literature, asking them to the Y.M.C.A., and in whatever other ways may be available.

One of the largest and most interesting meetings was that on "Purity, Social and Personal." Mr. Mott said he would rather carry his audience with him a little way, than go a longer way without them. He therefore put before them a series of propositions, which were self-evident and unquestionable—such as that (1) Impurity injures the body. (2) It pollutes the mind. (3) It mars a man's prospects in whatever career lies before him. (4) It robs him of self-respect. Terrible illustrations of these and other truths were cited, to which the men listened with close and eager attention. It was evident that the arrows were sharp, and that they pierced many hearts. After this meeting was closed, more than half remained to hear some further words, and then the Gospel was clearly and pungently declared. Then another sifting took place, and those who tarried heard how the Saviour could be personally appropriated as a Deliverer from the guilt and power of sin.

No such student meetings have ever previously been held here. Mr. Mott's very straight talks were not cast in the mould of evangelistic address or of philosophical lecture. He did not read a chapter nor take a text. His first speech was introductory, and the men were invited to return the next evening and hear what was to follow. They responded in undiminished numbers, and the speaker piled fact on fact, and clinched his facts by argument in a convincing and convicting way. The men stayed as such an audience in Calcutta had never stayed before. Able men, with world-wide reputation, had, on previous occasions, drawn young and educated men together; but half, and more than half, had disappeared before the close of the address. On one occasion not a score remained. But Mr. Mott, without exordium or peroration, without studied elegance of speech, without a touch of humour, and without an illustration beyond those of his own observation, held those men from night to night in earnest attention, by facts which appealed to their inner consciousness; for the secrets of many hearts were made manifest.

Much prayer was offered during the week. Some of the praying band observed that there had been in the early addresses no distinct reference to Scripture, and asked that if it were God's will his servant might be led to refer directly to the written Word. Probably it was his purpose to do this as the work progressed. However this may have been, the next address contained thirty-five distinct references to Scripture. Then prayer was made that the Atonement might be definitely stated, and in the following meeting four passages were quoted clearly setting forth that foundation truth. And so they could sing:—

> We believe God answers prayer;
> We are sure God answers prayer;
> We have proved God answers prayer.
> Glory to his Name.

In addition to these for educated Hindoos, &c., some meetings were held for Christians. Seventeen men signed the Declaration Card of the Student Volunteer Movement, saying, "It is my purpose, if God permit, to devote my entire life to Christian work."

On Monday evening, January 13, a reception of Christian workers of all degrees was held at Union Chapel to bid farewell to Mr. Mott, and to hear his last message before he left by the night train for Bombay on his way home, viâ London, to America.

It was an earnest, searching, hopeful, encouraging statement of facts and call to prayer; a confident assurance that as the holy city, New Jerusalem, shall descend out of heaven from God, so there shall be a new Calcutta and a new India, if his people will lay hold of his strength, and turn to Him with all their hearts. This was enforced, on the one hand, by the consideration of the activity, skill, energy, and persistence of the powers of darkness, and on the other by a remembrance of the years of the right hand of the Most High; his exceeding great and precious promises; and the mighty workings of his Spirit in our own day; and in recent years in Uganda, China, and Japan, which two latter kingdoms Mr. Mott has just visited. In the Northof China there were 15,000 native Christians massacred, and not two per cent. recanted. The following brief account of this inspiring meeting is from the Indian Witness:—

> An unusually large number of missionaries gathered at a special meeting of the Missionary Conference to meet Mr. John R. Mott and to hear an address from him on "The Secret of a Spiritual Awakening." It was a searching, powerful, and inspiring appeal to the missionary force to endeavour to realize the need of a great spiritual awakening in this city, in which the forces of evil are so powerful; to believe in the possibility of a time of reaping, in view of the vast amount of faithful seed sowing and the great volume of prayer that has been going up for this city through a long period; and self-denyingly, humbly, and yet boldly, to take hold upon the power of the Holy Spirit by whose energizing alone can a work of grace be wrought.
> Forcible emphasis was laid upon the absolute necessity of earnest, united, and persistent prayer. If God's working is to be witnessed, the servants of God must come together in brotherly love, differences must be sunk, denominational ambitions must be resolutely laid aside, and an agreement of faith and purpose be reached. The inner circle of praying believers, quickened by the Holy Spirit, is the heart of all truly pervasive revivals from which pour forth the streams of gracious influence to the concentric circles of needy ones.
> Seldom have we listened to an address of the special character of that delivered by Mr. Mott that more clearly and forcibly set forth the principles and conditions upon which God's saving power is manifested through his servants. We doubt not the address made a powerful impression upon all who heard it, and we are glad that others besides missionaries had the privilege of hearing it; and we rejoice to believe that it strengthened the faith and purpose of all who heard it in view of the impending campaign.

Since our beloved D. L. Moody was translated I have heard no utterances so like his unpretentious but effective preaching as those of Mr. Mott. And as in that case so in this, the people of God have been moved to effort on a larger scale and with an intenser spirit than heretofore.

During the second half of February a Simultaneous Mission is to be held in Calcutta, preceded by a universal house-to-house visitation, carried on by the earnest men and women, who it is hoped will numerously volunteer for this honourable if onerous service. Prayer is being made, we trust, very generally, for God's rich blessing on this endeavour.

Mr. MOTT IN LONDON.

Advantage was taken by Lord Overtoun on Tuesday of the fact that Mr. John R. Mott and Mr. David McConaughy were passing through London to gather a number of friends of Y.M.C.A. work at Exeter Hall, for the purpose of hearing something of what the Lord has been doing by their means in the East. A most cordial greeting was extended to the two brethren, accompanied by an assurance of the deep and prayerful interest in which their movements had been followed by Christians in this country.

Of Mr. Mott's address we hope to give some account next week. His words were full of apostolic fire as he called to remembrance the scenes through which he had passed in recent months, with the Holy Spirit working in such marvellous fashion that he could scarcely trust himself to speak on the subject. With deep gratitude he testified to the sense that had been with him all through the tour of being backed by the sympathy, intelligent appreciation, and fervent prayers of not a few now gathered before him.

After twelve years of service in India, Mr. David McConaughy brought back a good report of the work of the Lord in the land to which he had been sent. "A dozen monsoons have not been enough to damp the ardour with which I set out. I come in no pessimistic spirit, but with an invincible optimism. Never in all these years have I doubted that the shekinah of God's glory was pointing towards India." Turning to the story of the development of Association work in India, he compared the figures of 1895 with those presented at Allahabad last month, showing that the eighteen Associations had become 150, with over 7,000 members instead of 1,451, while instead of a solitary secretary giving his time to the work, there are now twenty. "Yet the figures and the buildings that have been erected are only the scaffolding of the real work which is going on among the young men of India."

Referring to the deep-seated idea among natives, that the burden of Christian work lies on the salaried staff of the various missions, Mr. McConaughy was able to bear witness that, though slowly, the thought that God's work rests rather upon the rank and file, and that the laymen of the country have a great work to do, has been pressed home.

The World's Student Christian Federation was represented by Dr. Karl Fries (Stockholm), while Count von Moltke brought from Copenhagen the greetings of the Danish Y.M.C.A. Among others who took part in the proceedings were Messrs. H. W. Maynard, W. H. Seagram, F. A. Bevan, Howard Williams, and Eugene Stock.

Notes from Peru.

By W. H. NEWELL, Cuzco.

THE new century was ushered in by the erection of a huge cross on the high hill crowning the city. Mass was celebrated at its foot, and according to a Fiez friar it was to flow with blood. There was no donbt that the Catholics meant to signalize the occasion by a desperate attempt to drive us out of the city.

The air was heavy with threat and plots. The prefect was a Catholic, and apparently made no attempt to check the rabid preaching that went on. But the new year came in, and the blood did not flow, neither was the house burnt; the zeal evaporated, or was bottled up till Easter. As this season drew near we began to feel the effect of the confessional, and to realize that the Catholics had not forgotten our presence in the city. "Lunes Sento" was to be the climax of the activity against the "Ingleses Protestantes." We felt led to ask the guarantees of the country, but our true hope was in God. Just before the huge procession, the prefect, sub-prefect, his secretary, and personal military attendant all came in to be photographed. This was providential—God was in it. We got some fine negatives of the group, and found all most friendly. We were assured of all necessary precaution being taken.

Some 8,000 Indians, perhaps, were in the Plaza, but soldiers abounded, and a patrol passed backward and forward in front of our little house; the critical moment passed, and still the blood had not flowed. The following significant paragraph appeared in the Lima paper shortly afterwards:—

"At the procession of the Lord of the Earthquakes, 12,000 people were present. The police had to take great precautions, as the populace had made preparations for a hostile manifestation against the English Protestants."

I am now convinced that owing to the lack of religious liberty the quickest and most effective way of reaching these people is by some such indirect method as ours, and I believe that Brother Peters, who first conceived the idea, and prayed and worked it into fact, was divinely led to take the steps which resulted in the Depôt Inglese at Cuzco.

Limited though our evangelizing efforts still of necessity are, we bless God that we can report much to interest and encourage. Our building possesses a fine large room capable of seating 100 to 150 persons, and we have now set it apart for the Gospel. On Sunday nights at our Gospel meeting we get a fair attendance. On Tuesdays I conduct a most interesting little class for believers, which before we separate becomes a prayer-meeting. My Wednesday Bible class continues most encouraging, and the Gospel has reached many young fellows by its agency. Some are really interested in the Word, and belong to the I.B.R.A., which my wife has recently started here. My wife's sewing class has at last assumed more encouraging dimensions, and she and Mrs. Peters are now joined by some nine or ten others. It may be that some home friends would like to send us out some material, flannels, &c. We give the garments made to the poor; this not only relieves misery, but breaks down prejudice, and makes a way for the Gospel. My little Sunday-school, or rather Sunday afternoon Bible class, is being recruited from this sewing class, and is a source of great joy to us.

This year Mr. Peters, Mr. Derry, and I are teaching in the College of Sciences, where 100 to 150 boys come under our influence. It will be remembered that when Mr. and Mrs. Jarrett came here to open a school in 1896, it was necessary to have a guard of soldiers in the house to protect them from the violence of the mob. Our college is very liberal (here "liberal" means generally anti-priest and rationalistic), thus the opening. On Thursdays we take the boys down to our field, and teach them rounders, cricket, and football.

In an attractive booklet, PERU—THE INCA LAND (3d. R.B.M.U., Harley House, Bow, E.), Mr. John L. Jarrett has given an interesting account of the aggressive work done by himself and his colleagues.

Progress in the Philippines.

FOLLOWING up a visit paid last summer to the Philippines, Mr. E. LUND has received a letter from the island of Paray, in which Mr. Manikau (the native pastor) says:

"The work continues to be favoured by many blessings, for to-day the chapel which you (Mr. Lund) built is not sufficient to contain the poor people from the villages who come to our meetings. Every Sunday since you left over five hundred persons of both sexes and all ages have come together to the worship. (The chapel only holds some 200, but the others can hear through the windows which are always open.) Besides this we have received invitations from many villages of the interior with which we cannot comply now on account of the roads, which are little less than impassable, owing to the heavy rains. Nevertheless, we have the intention of making the round of these villages.

"El Heraldo (little Gospel newspaper) counts now 800 subscribers. Two editions of 'lecciones' (Biblical passages for use of the Sunday-schools) have been very quickly distributed, as has also a small edition of hymns in Viscayan, and the people are always on the watch for some newly-translated hymn."

Another correspondent (Mr. Briggs) writes from Negros:—"The 'teniente Alcalde' (resident magistrate) of J—— came to Bakolod before I went to say good-bye to you. He came one or two nights whilst I was ill, and V—— fully declared to him the Gospel. One Sunday evening V—— preached on repentance. This gentleman was present, he heard, and accepted the Gospel. The following Monday he wanted to be baptized, as he had to return to J—— that afternoon, saying that he was going to preach to the people of his town. We gave him tracts and an 'Ayuda del predicardor' (help of the preacher) by Arboleda, and he bought a Bible for himself. He returned to J——, and, wondrous thing, began to preach to the lowest people as well as to other persons. He preached repentance, the new birth, abandonment of Rome, baptism, and Christianity in general. Like the early Christians, he 'turned the world upside down,' and a great multitude surrounded him, and daily there were added those who were being saved. Then the friends of the friars girt up their loins and began persecution; they made the free air dangerous for the magistrate, and now he is confined in his house with two hired municipal guards at its gates day and night to protect him and his property."

Barcelona Protestant Hospital.

FOR the first time in the twenty-one years' history of this hospital we have closed the year with a deficit, and, moreover, we have been obliged to borrow almost the whole fund of the proposed Home for the Aged. Several causes have contributed to this, chief of all the serious falling off of help from England during the last two years, although the number of patients has been the same as in 1900—sixty-six, of whom eight were Germans, six English, three Swiss, and one Belgian—several of the cases were of very long duration. I will gladly send the report to any friend wishing to know more of this work.

Several years ago we were obliged to close the hospital for a time for want of funds, but through the generosity of a friend it was reopened after six weeks. We are now confronted by this question: Shall we close it again, thus depriving many of their only refuge in time of sickness, and compelling them to seek the merciless shelter of the Roman Catholic hospital, where they are neglected as "condenados," unless they conform to the idolatrous rites of the Church of Rome? There is much unrest and distress through want of work just now at Barcelona, making it more difficult to tide over times of sickness. Shall our brethren in Barcelona, Spanish and foreign, look in vain for the oft-proved generosity of the Evangelical churches of England, who used to take the keenest and most practical interest in the work of evangelization in Roman Catholic countries?

We hope to be enabled to make good the deficit without delay, also to refund the money from the fund of the much-needed Home for the Aged. But any gifts, great or small, also foreign and English postage stamps of the new issue, will be gratefully received and forwarded by me. ANNA VON MIELECKA.

"Memories of Moody."

PRECIOUS to Mr. IRA D. SANKEY is the memory of his great co-worker, and he has of late given, in the form of an address, some fragrant reminiscences of their partnership, under the suggestive title of "Memories of Moody."

At Brockton, Mass. (a town in which, it is stated, "more boots and shoes are made than in any other place in the world"), Mr. Sankey spoke twice on Lord's Day, January 19. The afternoon meeting was described by a local paper as follows:—

Mr. Ira D. Sankey — greatest of living Gospel singers, and a man whose songs are sung in every clime—was in Brockton yesterday, and spoke to 1,200 men at the quarters of the Young Men's Christian Association. Such a great outpouring of the men of the city has not been witnessed since Rev. C. L. Jackson urged men to cast aside the garment of sin for the robe of Christ, in City Theatre, years ago. Every seat was filled, the aisles were crowded, men hung about the corridors, loth to miss a single word.

"Memories of Moody!" That was the theme; and it was when the great Gospel singer spoke of his erstwhile leader that the immense gathering waited breathlessly for every word. Many in the audience had heard Moody. They said that the great evangelist seemed to be at the meeting in spirit, and seemed to inspire Sankey with something of the fire and consecrated passion that made him a power. Some brushed away tears while Sankey spoke, and when he sang some of the songs that Moody loved, heads were bowed as if in prayer.

At the evening service, held in the First Church, many were unable to gain admission. Several of the old familiar hymns were also rendered during the evening, the speaker several times breaking into his story with lines of familiar hymns which fitted the particular portion of the story.

In the address, Mr. Sankey referred to the manner in which he became associated with Mr. Moody, told how the man worked on one principle: "Stand by Your Colours, Stick to the Cross," and of his friend's ability to grasp a situation quickly. Mr. Moody, he said, seemed to fathom a person's mind, and oftentimes would pick out one who had asked for prayers and arranged to meet the person the following day. Individual conversions in this way were frequent.

Particularly interesting was the story bearing on their trip to the Holy Land, and of Moody's manifest interest in the country made famous in Biblical history by the visits of Christ. Pathetic tales of the conversion of different people under varying conditions were interwoven, and the immense congregation was swayed from smiles to tears at the will of the speaker.

Reading for our Troops.

MAY we, through THE CHRISTIAN, thank your readers for their continued interest in the Camp Homes for our troops in South Africa, and for the help of many in sending literature to the men in the blockhouses?

The number of blockhouses is greatly increased. They now extend over 3,000 miles, and are in some districts only 600 yards apart. The demand, therefore, for more literature and more helpers is pressing.

By the kindness of one friend we were able to send out a supply of letters and cards published by the Christmas Letter Mission. These were distributed at Christmas by our superintendents among the wounded and sick, who sent us many appreciative messages.

As most of the blockhouses are inaccessible by post, the packets are conveyed to them by troop train, ration train, or by convoy, across the veldt. I shall be very glad to forward information to those who will help by sending a packet of good reading for one blockhouse or for more. (Mrs.) M. S. OSBORN HOWE.

Christmas in India.

BEING far away from home, we did not expect to be remembered by Santa Claus this year, and therefore omitted to hang up our stockings in the drawing-room, as requested by our kind host and hostess, Rev. and Mrs. Lawson, of the American Methodist Episcopal Mission, at Aligarh, N.W.P.

Early the following morning, however, there was a knock at the door, and a tray was brought in with two new stockings bulging with sweets, besides other things pretty to the sight and good to the taste. Surely Father Christmas was very mindful of us!

Later in the day, wishes for a merry Christmas were exchanged. Everybody looked so happy and bright and contented, even "Old Lala," our Hindu servant, for whom the day could not have the same significance as it had for us. Christmas is coming more and more to be regarded by the people of this country as a day of joy—the "Big Day," as they call it.

We had the day before been to see a Mohammedan College, the only one in India. A gentleman who was the captain of the students' cricket club, after showing us round, presented us with a very pretty Christmas card. Several friendly Hindu families sent their greetings to the Mission, and others, such as the postman, &c., presented themselves for Christmas-boxes.

At 9 a.m. there was a service in the church, which holds 700 people. On the previous day, the girls had decorated it with garlands of mango leaves, with flowers and branches of nim and pippal trees. Above the pulpit was, in illuminated letters, and in three languages, the text: "Unto us is born in the City of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord." Oh, how eagerly the big and little folks seem to listen to the old, old story, which is ever new.

There being over 900 people on the Mission premises, the widows of the Industrial Home had their service apart; the others filled every available room in the church, singing in honour of the new-born King.

At the close a special collection was taken in aid of the anticipated and dreaded famine which threatens again this fair land of India. No plates were passed round, but the givers came forward and deposited their offerings in the front of the platform—boys and girls, men and women, and mothers with their toddling little ones, whose wee hands were hardly able to keep the coin they held. The latter reminded us of the mothers in Israel, who brought their little children to Jesus that He might bless them. How beautiful to know that He loves the little children just as much now as He did then!

A letter was read from a number of young women, who asked permission to do without their portion of meat, which they get twice a week with their curry, until they have contributed the value of three rupees—four shillings—to the special offering. None of the ladies-in-charge knew anything about it. It was their freewill-offering. This time we thought of the poor widow's mite, and that the poor are the most generous givers in the world, because in giving they often part with what is most necessary for themselves. I have heard of girls who would go without their dinners once and twice a week, in order to be able to support some famine-child. Those I am just thinking about, did not even need to fast. Their companions would come forward and, by giving each a thimbleful of their own food, provide for them sometimes larger portions than they would get on their feast days.

I have also seen little boys at Poona, who by the same method had bought their Bibles; only that the missionaries, Rev. and Mrs. Fox, instead of letting them go without their food entirely, as their request was, put them on half-rations on certain days. Other boys in Industrial Homes would work hard for the same object.

Now, it is not easy for boys to earn much as long as they are in training. They are like apprentices. In order to encourage them to thrift and economy, the missionaries at Aligarh, and, I daresay, in other places, give them 2 annas (2d.) a month, and a little more in special cases. Half of the amount goes into the savings bank, against "a rainy day," as we would say; but to them it means a "dry day."

The other half is for their little current expenses, and for the collection. How they manage never to miss the latter I cannot tell; but I am told that they never do, and that some of the boys even buy their own trousers. If you want this puzzle explained, write to Mrs. Lawson, M.E. Mission, Aligarh, who will perhaps be willing to give you better information through these columns.

In some places where the children cannot earn anything, they bring a handful of meal, taken from their dinner-portion, to the Sunday collection. The offering-plate is then in the shape of a wooden pail. Native Christians, who have no money to give, bring parts of their field-products, not seldom chickens, and even little pigs!

But to return to our Christmas Day. To the great delight of the young people, two native bands came unasked to play for a while in the grounds. At our appearance they quickly changed their lively tune, greeting us with "God save the King." In the afternoon there was swinging, racing, and playing at leap-frog under the shade of beautiful trees. Mr. Lawson and his boys, also Mr. Lavalette, the assistant missionary, joined heartily in the open-air games. The boys' eyes flashed. The girls, though only appreciative spectators, looked as if they would like to take part in the fun. Little by little the merry laughter ceased. Before leaving, they received their Christmas presents. What do you think it was? A handful of parched rice and ditto of sweets. It seems to us very little; but to provide even this for over 900 people cost a few pounds. So you may imagine what it must cost to provide such a number with food all the year round!

We have heard lately that the A.M.E. Mission in India has over 6,000 orphans, for whose maintenance there is no proper provision made. About £3 would keep a child for a year. W. M.

Jumna Dasi's Conversion.

THE work of the Zenana Bible and Medical Mission is being greatly blessed in many ways. The little Cottage Hospital at Ajodhya has beds for twelve patients, but at one time corners have had to be found for eighteen. Poor women and children pass away in agony, because it is impossible to give them that attention which Christian love desires. The Society could easily place skilled lady doctors and nurses in many centres, if funds allowed. One of the missionaries sends the following narrative:—

"SERVANT OF THE JUMNA."

The above is the name of a young girl who died last July in our Cottage Hospital in Ajodhya, one of the sacred cities of India. I wish our friends could have seen her when she first came to the hospital—such a picture, dressed in the yellow-ochre garment worn by one sect of religious devotees, matted hair, face covered with ashes, beads round her neck, little idols in a small bag, and a curious wooden bowl into which people put offerings of rice, flour, &c. She had been married when a child, and left home almost directly to go with her husband on pilgrimage from one sacred city and river to another. Very footsore and weary must the young feet have often been.

When she came to our hospital, she was so terribly ill that our kind hospital assistant (a trained Indian Christian girl) hardly thought she could recover. But loving medical care and nourishing food little by little told on her exhausted frame, and after three months there was a marked improvement. Was it only an improved state of body? Praise God, no. During her stay the Holy Spirit had been working in her heart, and the daily teaching both from doctor and Biblewomen made a great impression. Very great was her eagerness to listen, especially to hymns, and the Gospel story was first of all more often sung than read to her.

Every week I saw her, and I shall never forget how she begged me to sing "just one more hymn," and when that was sung as the very last, how she coaxed me by saying, "Only one more." It was so difficult to get away from her bedside! When the time came for her to leave the hospital, she said she could never go back to her heathen life, but wanted to become a follower of the Lord Jesus. She had given up her idols and beads, and asked to be sent to our Mission House. She told me her husband did not care for her, in fact would be glad to be rid of her! We sent her to a school where she received daily teaching, and was prepared for baptism. Dear Jumna Dasi soon made progress in reading, and was very happy in the school.

After a couple of months, to her great joy, she was baptized. Just before I left India in March she came to see me, and was so proud to show me the progress she had made in reading; she talked of the time when she would be able to go about the villages teaching her heathen sisters. But God willed otherwise. All she had suffered had left great bodily weakness, and after three months the sad news came to me in England that the dear girl had gone back to the hospital where she first heard of Jesus, and had passed away. She is buried in the Fyzabad cemetery, where more than one Indian sister is waiting for that bright day when the Lord returns to make up his jewels. Out of what a dark mine of ignorance did He bring this dear Hindu girl!

13. Luke vii. 37, 38.
14. In both cases it was a woman; in one case his head was anointed, in the other his feet.
15. She had sat at his feet and heard Him speak (Luke x. 39).
16. Give Me thine heart (Prov. xxiii. 26).

Brick Lane Jewish Mission.—The anniversary of Mr. Dornbusch's work amongst the Jews in the East End was held at the L.C.M. Hall, 160, Brick Lane, last week. In the absence through illness of the local superintendent, Colonel Hayne, Rev. A. Bernstein, of the London Jews Society, presided. Addresses were delivered by Revs. F. L. Denman, Marcus Bergmann, J. Deutschberger, and others. The missionary gave a short account of the work.

The College by Post.—In connection with the Bible and Prayer Union, founded by the late Rev. Thomas Richardson, correspondence classes for Scripture study have been at work for some years. They are open to both men and women over the age of sixteen, and form a branch of the well-known College by Post, which has now a membership of between 5,000 and 6,000 students. Questions are set, and the answers to them corrected by experienced teachers, who also prepare comments and explanations on the subject-matter of the daily readings. Steady, earnest work for half an hour every day is the main condition of membership, but there is a small subscription to cover working expenses, postage, &c. Names of new students for the term beginning February 1 are now being entered, and all further particulars may be obtained by application (enclosing a stamped envelope), to Miss Robinson, B.A., Oak Hill Lodge, Frognal, Hampstead, London, N.W. The Pathway of Peace (Isaiah xxvi. 3; John xiv. 25-31).

In the Hebrew of Isaiah "perfect peace" is rendered "peace, peace." It reminds me of the double windows in city offices, which effectually shut out the noise of the street. It is impossible without them to prosecute one's work with comfort. And when the mind is stayed upon God, and the heart trusts in Him, this double attitude of the inner life constitutes the double window of peace, behind which the soul is able to pursue its unbroken course, undisturbed by the hubbub of a world in arms. Only be right with God, keep on his plan, do his will, hand over the responsibilities and worries for Him to deal with, and you will know this perfect peace.

Peace depends upon these conditions—(1) Have no will but God's. (2) Continue where He places you until He clearly indicates that He desires you to move, and then the door will close behind you as well as open in front. (3) Hand over all the responsibility of choosing your way and doing his work to Him. (4) Believe that He accepts what you give, and keeps it in unutterable faithfulness.

In this paragraph from his last discourse our Lord gives us further instruction in the way of peace.

It depends upon the advent of the Comforter, the Dove of Peace that nestles down on quiet, lowly, loving hearts, and who teaches, as no human voice can teach, by giving us the things of which He speaks, so that we know them not by description, but by possession (v. 26).

Peace is the distinct gift of the pierced hand. The first salutation of Jesus to his disciples on the evening of the resurrection day was, "Peace be unto you"—the old Hebrew salutation—and He breathed on them (v. 27). Open your heart to Christ, that the soft zephyr of his breath may waft the music of his own heart to fill you with unutterable joy. Just as the air within the diving-bell keeps out the water that lies under your feet, with no apparent barrier to keep it from invading the bell in which you sit, so does the peace of Christ, filling the heart, prevent the invasion of trouble and fear.

The revelation of the Father is another element of our peace (v. 28). To know that our life is determined not by fate, but by a Father's loving will; to believe that all evil which reaches us is permitted to come by One who loves us individually, and who knows that in some way evil is to promote our true well-being—this is the secret of happiness.

As our Lord speaks the sacred words which seem to contain the very essence of his own earthly life, we are admitted to stand on the margin of the sea of glass mingled with fire (v. 31). When the soul loves the Father, and is not ashamed that the world should know it; when the believer does even as the Father has given commandment; when we are able to tear ourselves from the upper room, with its beloved circle, and venture forth into the night air, where Gethsemane, Judas, and the Cross await us, the peace of God that passeth all understanding, as a sentry, keeps both heart and mind.

"Arise, let us go hence." The Master is always saying it. Arise to new lessons, to new experiences, to new duties, to new sufferings, to wider spheres of service; but remember, in all your goings forth, let them not be apart from Him. Notice, He says distinctly, "Let us go hence." He desires to go first. He offers Himself as our companion. Whatever awaits us, He desires to share in it, and as we follow in his company, with a smile upon his sweet, strong face, He says to us, "Do not fear the things that you shall suffer; I am with you alway." "In the world ye shall have tribulation," but "these things have I spoken unto you that in Me ye may have peace." (John xvi. 33).

C.E. NOTES.

In the Jamaica C.E. Union there are 194 Societies and 9,000 Endeavourers.

* * *

Rev. H. G. G. Hallock, D.D., of Hangchow, China, has recently spent nearly a month in Korea in the interests of Christian Endeavour. Several new Societies have been formed, and in time the Korean churches will doubtless find Christian Endeavour Societies indispensable.

* * *

Dr. and Mrs. Clark have already started on the journey that will lead them to the next National C.E. Convention, to be held in Manchester at Whitsuntide. They will spend six months altogether extending Christian Endeavour in European countries. The Endeavourers of Boston gave them a fine send off. The climax of the good feeling that pervaded the meeting was an offering of pledges and money amounting to over £250 for Christian Endeavour work in foreign lands.

International S.S. Lesson.

Sunday, February 16, 1902.

Subject—"The Second Persecution" (Acts v. 25-42)
Golden Text—Matt. v. 10.

To-day's lesson opens with the familiar scene of the Apostles standing in Solomon's porch, preaching Jesus Christ to the worshippers assembling for the early morning Temple service. Their usual calm self-possession and absolute fearlessness are more apparent than ever; and little wonder, for they have just now been re-commissioned for their work by an angel from heaven. At the same early hour, the "high priest," "the council," and "all the senate of the children of Israel" have met to pronounce sentence on certain prisoners whom they have secured by lock and military guard in the common prison (vv. 18 and 23).

1. What effect had been produced by the judgment of God on Ananias and Sapphira?

(a) On the Church—"great fear." (b) On the Apostles—increase of power, "signs and wonders," and greater popularity. (c) On the sick—the afflicted from other cities healed. (d) On the people—multitudes of believers added to the Lord. (e) On the high priest and elders—"filled with indignation." (f) On the Apostles again—an angel sent to deliver them and to bid them "Go speak in the Temple."

2. What prevented the officers from using violence towards the escaped prisoners? Or the council from asking why and how they had escaped? "They feared the people" (v. 26) (Isa. viii. 10).

3. What were the charges brought by the council against the Apostles?

Disobedience. Blasphemy. Zeal. Malice.

4. What defence did Peter make?

Disobedience—admitted. "We must obey God" (R.V.).

Blasphemy—denied. Matt. xxvi. 65; John x. 36; Acts v. 30, 31, 32, and ii. 36.

Zeal—admitted. Chosen to witness (John xv. 26, 27).

Malice—denied. Rather preached (Acts iii. 25, 26).

"Liberty of Conscience." The first note was struck when Peter asked that unanswerable question of the Sanhedrin (Acts iv. 19, 20). The second note sounded with fuller tone when he was arraigned the second time before the same tribunal and commanded not to preach the doctrine of Jesus and the resurrection. Reformers have rung out the same notes again and again down to our own day, and the sound will never die out as long as the Gospel of Christ is preached on the earth.

5. How can we describe the feelings of the rulers, in contrast with those of the Apostles, when the court closed?

The rulers—indignation and contempt (vv. 17, 28), consternation and terror (v. 24), fear of the people (v. 26), perplexity and (Matt. xxvii. 25) accusation of conscience (v. 28), and lastly, fury and murder (v. 33).

The Apostles, as they appeared before the Sanhedrin under arrest—unfaltering loyalty to Christ their King, and unflinching courage in his service, such as could be manifested only by men who were conscious by the indwelling Spirit of the Lord's near presence with them (Matt. x. 16-20). As they passed out, after the scourging, "rejoicing," not that they were released, and their lives spared, but "that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for his Name" "whose they were, and whom they served" (Acts xxvii. 23; Matt. v. 11, 12; Rom. v. 3-5; 1 Pet. iv. 12-16). They went forth with confirmed determination to teach and preach Jesus Christ, declaring Jesus, the Saviour, to be the true Messiah and King (1 Cor. ii. 2).

Gamaliel touched the spring that seldom fails, self interest (v. 35), worldly wisdom founded on study of sacred history. Caution covering timidity, or perhaps cowardice, for he had courage enough to stand up and counsel moderation for their own sake, but not boldness enough as a Jew to demand proof of the Messiahship of Jesus Christ, the theme of the Apostles' preaching.

"Scourge"—"A whip with two lathes knotted with bones or heavy indented circles of brass, or terminated with hooks." (In which case it was called a "scorpion"—1 Kings xii. 11.) Later on, when the Jews became more particular about keeping the law to the letter, three cords terminating in leather thongs; thirteen strokes amounted to forty save one (2 Cor. xi. 24). A whip of small cords used in the synagogue as a legal penalty rather than a shameful correction (John ii. 15).

Lessons.

Be out and out for Jesus (Matt. xii. 30; John xv. 14).

It is vain to oppose God's will; surrender to the Conqueror now (Psa. cx. 1; Eph. i. 17-23; Heb. i. 8-14; and x. 7, 10, 12, 13, also 18-25).

Remembering Mark viii. 38; 1 John ii. 28, and iii. 2.

In time of persecution for his sake (Heb. ii. 18; 1 Pet. ii. 9).

"God is able" (Jude 24).

The Christian Temperance Campaign.

NOTTINGHAM AND DUBLIN MEETINGS.

DR. HENRY'S meetings in Nottingham continued to be well attended from Tuesday evening of last week. The interest of the people steadily grew; and there is reason to believe that an abiding impression was made upon all who were privileged to attend. The splendid and convincing orations awakened serious thought and conviction on the part of all who, whether as moderate drinkers or slaves to alcohol, had complicity with an unscrupulously selfish traffic.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, of Langley Mill, presiding on the Tuesday, said that England, being on trial as to industrial supremacy, needs to become sober. Dr. HENRY described the magnificent opportunities which women have of furthering temperance work. The liquor traffic, he said, has a mortgage upon every cradle in the Christian world; and thus a great responsibility rests upon mothers as regards the training of children. Young girls can make no greater mistake than to marry men addicted to the beverage of hell. While women are waiting for enfranchisement, they are not fully using their influence with the men who have votes. If the people of Great Britain really had an opportunity of saying whether they want the drink or not, they would do away with it at once. While the people said "No," last year, the Government said "Yes." Dr. Henry thanked God that governments are not unchangeable.

Dr. Henry's lecture on "Saloon Life in New York," was arranged for afternoon as well as evening on Wednesday, in order to give country people attending the market an opportunity of hearing it. Bishop HAMILTON BAYNES presided over the earlier meeting. Believing that the mission was making use of the best of all temperance methods, by seeking to bring the Lord Jesus Christ, with all his love and saving grace, with new hopes and a new purpose, into the hearts of people possessed by the drink demon, the bishop was there to wish the work all success, and to heartily welcome the efforts of Dr. Henry in Nottingham.

In a spirited and interesting address, Dr. Henry compared the legislation, habits, and customs in regard to drinking in Great Britain and in America. In his native land the children are better protected from the scourge, no woman is allowed to stand behind a drinking bar, and in every State and territory except two there are Sunday-closing laws. It is the rule for the people to abstain and the exception for them to drink.

On the closing day in Nottingham (Thursday) another extra meeting was arranged in view of the half-holiday for shopkeepers and their assistants. The last gathering in the evening was a very crowded one. Dr. Henry's full and comprehensive review of "Expert Testimony Against the Drink" adduced a powerful argument from the relation of total abstinence to physical well being. He cited the witness and example of men and women of the highest rank in every department of public life, together with the incontrovertible statistics of life insurance business as regards the strikingly different results in the respective cases of abstainers and drinkers. "God be with you till we meet again" was heartily sung by the great audience; and Dr. Henry had to stoop down below the rail of the platform for many a handshake with new friends as they left the hall. In all, about 500 pledges were taken during the Nottingham mission, and there has been a general quickening of gospel temperance enthusiasm and purpose in that city.

On Saturday last the Dublin Campaign opened with a well-attended reception in the Metropolitan Hall, Lower Abbey Street. Mr. WM. FRY, jun., J.P., was in the chair, and many ministers of various denominations, and other influential Christian friends, were present.

After a brotherly prayer by Rev. S. Pronter, M.A. (Presbyterian), for Divine strength to Dr. Henry, and for blessing upon his coming work, the CHAIRMAN expressed the hearty and enthusiastic Irish welcome which all present desired to give to the man whose labours, in a city with an enormous and growing need for temperance effort, had been anticipated with much prayer and faith. Five-minute speeches followed by Revs. A. L. Elliott, M.A. (Church of Ireland), J. Stewart, B.A. (Presbyterian), and Wm. Crawford, M.A. (Methodist), recognising the necessity for uniting in a fight against gigantic forces, as well as the need for deepening a sense of individual obligation on the part of all church members to share in the good work, also pledging hearty co-operation by the speakers.

DR. HENRY then declared his conviction that God is calling the Christian Church to accept the primary responsibility for temperance reform, and that every believer in Christ is bound to exert a pronounced, definite influence which will tell for sobriety and righteousness.

At the evening meeting, Dean DICKINSON, of the Chapel Royal, spoke hopeful words from the chair concerning the temperance outlook; and Dr. Henry's appeal on this occasion dealt with the threefold law of opportunity, service, and self-sacrifice, as involved in Gal. vi. 9, 10.

On Lord's Day afternoon the meeting was very crowded, and the partition separating the minor from the larger hall had to be removed to secure the seating of all who came. Rev. W. J. MCCREERY, B.D. (Irish Episcopal Church), presided; and prayer was offered by Rev. W. CRAWFORD, M.A., Principal of Wesley College. In the course of a powerful address Dr. HENRY said that if London and Dublin were Christianized the influence of that condition would beneficially affect the remotest parts of the countries.

The evening meeting was intended to be for men only; but the gallery was open to women. Rev. J. KENNEDY, rector of St. Andrew's, presided. Dr. HENRY enforced weighty lessons from the story of Hadad and his sayings in 1 Kings xi. 22. The songs of the Jubilee Singers have been an acceptable feature of all the meetings, and the Mission, which promises to be very fruitful, will be continued over Lord's Day next.

In the course of an interesting letter to Mr. Robert Scott, Mr. J. Barker Wells writes of the Campaign: "A marked feature of the meetings is that very few rise to leave until the close. The pledges taken include some from all the Protestant denominations, as well as Roman Catholics. You wrote very highly of Dr. Henry; but after hearing him, the friends here do not think that your words were strong enough. He speaks eloquently and with great power, and we are looking for much spiritual blessing. The pledges that have been registered have been signed without any pressure being brought to bear upon the people other than Dr. Henry's appeal."

FUTURE MEETINGS.

Till Feb. 9, Dublin; 11-12, Limerick; 14, Holyhead; 18-20, St. Albans; 24-25, Chelmsford; 28-March 1, 2, Ipswich; 4-6, Walford; 14-21, Leicester; April 1-3, Macclesfield.

Forty Years' Testimony to the Jews.—For forty years Mr. Herman Ehrlich has laboured with untiring energy and devotion in the interests of the Jews in East London. At the Hebrew Conference Hall, Old Montague Street, Whitechapel, which Mr. Ehrlich founded, the all-important work of preaching the Gospel has been pursued, and the testimony of Christian workers has been followed from time to time by encouraging results. Not the least significant of the agencies is the Bible class, which continues to be well attended. It is a great delight to the leader to witness the eagerness with which the men drink in the Word of Life. Another hopeful agency is the work among Jewish women—a much-neglected class, and in need of a little kindness and sympathy. A new feature of the Mission is the medical branch, which promises to be a means of reaching many who would otherwise remain untouched. The experience of the first few weeks amply justifies the effort, and by the visitation of the sick in their homes (particularly children), many opportunities for witnessing for Christ have been used. Friends of Israel wishing to have fellowship with Mr. Ehrlich in his labours may address him at the Hebrew Conference Hall, Old Montague Street, Whitechapel, E.

Temperance Notes.

CULTURED WOMEN AND DRINK.

Preaching on Sunday week the Bishop of Liverpool, in referring to the growing evils flowing from the drink trade, urged that intemperance is spreading frightfully amongst women not only of the poor, but of the cultured and well-educated classes. Undoubtedly much of this painful development is due to Grocers' and Confectioners' Licences, and it is desirable, in the interests of sobriety and religion, that everything possible should be done to strengthen the hands of the Licensing Boards and other bodies who are endeavouring to urge the Government into bringing forward a repressive measure.

JUSTICE TO IRELAND.

In a recent Note and Comment it was suggested that if the people of Ireland only would shake themselves free from their self-imposed burden of the drink traffic, the land questions soon would settle themselves. The Roman Catholic Archbishop and Bishops of that country have apparently come to the same conclusion, and at a recent meeting in Dublin on the subject of the growing intemperance, they appealed to the licensing authorities to take every legitimate opportunity of reducing the number of existing licences. An appeal to the priests also was made to co-operate in season and out of season in creating a healthier public opinion. It is significant of the power in Ireland of an utterance of this kind that already in one district all applications have been refused, and that stringent regulations have been framed in regard to renewals. A campaign of the kind cannot but be potent in good results, for, outside the agrarian causes, most of the chronic distress in Ireland, so persistently kept before the public mind, is undoubtedly due to drink.

A NEW LICENSING BILL.

An important Government Temperance Bill is promised during this session. Mr. Ritchie, in introducing it, explained that it aimed at providing for the registration of clubs, and for the amendment of the law relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors. It provides larger powers for the police in apprehending drunken persons in public places, and enables a wife to apply for protection against a drunken husband, and a sober husband against a drunken wife. A record of all convictions passed on licence-holders is to be kept, which should be brought up at every renewal of licence, and the date of all licensing meetings is to be uniform. Temperance reformers will heartily accept these important provisions, and if the Bill is not wrecked by the enemies of all temperance progress in the House, it will mark a great step in advance. Past efforts during this Parliament have not been brilliantly fruitful of results. The eminently sane and reasonable provisions of this Bill should ensure for it a happier fate.

It is seldom that so frank a criticism of our licensing courts is made in Parliament as that by Mr. Ritchie on introducing the Bill referred to. As the law now stands the justices have no power to renew a licence after three convictions for breaches of the law have been endorsed on the certificate; but the provision thus made for driving unprincipled licence-holders out of the trade has been defeated, as Mr. Ritchie points out, because "justices would not exercise the power which was given to them of endorsing a licence the effect of which would be to deprive the man of its value."

The new provisions which it is proposed to substitute would apparently admit of renewal even after five convictions in as many years, though in that case the court would be obliged to record the reasons for doing so, while the police authority would have the right of appeal. Referring to this as an effort to deal with the least desirable class of licence-holders, The Times says that "a fairly drawn provision with this object in view ought to be supported by the great body of the liquor trade." But as far as the Christian public is concerned, the principle underlying all efforts for temperance legislation is that the liquor trade is a force for evil, calling for unqualified restriction.

Amid West London Squalor.

"A GREEN isle in a sea of misery" is Miss Meredith Brown's work in the notorious Lisson Grove district of the metropolis. Commenced in 1886 with an evening Home for factory girls, it has developed in many directions until the well-known Shaftesbury Institute in Bell Street, W., has become the headquarters of a large number of useful operations for the spiritual and moral benefit of the poorest classes.

It is interesting to look back from the present orderly and attentive gatherings of girls to the opening tea, sixteen years ago, when at an assembly of 200 shouting young women all the cake and bread and butter quickly and mysteriously disappeared almost as soon as they were placed upon the table, and "no one had taken it, and no one had been served!" With order has come organization, and the weekly meetings are many and helpful. An outstanding feature is the Wednesday Bible Class, at which the numbers are as large as on any of the educational or social nights. On Thursdays musical drill has taken the place of the noisy, romping games once so dear to the heart of the Lisson Grove factory girl. "Yus, miss, we'll come, but we loikes noise. Mary'bone roughs is noisy," was the original expression of taste, but the sobering, Christianizing influences of the Institute have changed all that.

PERSECUTION AND THE BIBLE.

A few weeks ago seven of the girls wrote a little note to the Deaconess-in-charge, saying they wished to lead another life, and asking her if she would meet them half-an-hour before the class assembled to help them. They knew the persecution which awaited them, they said, but by God's grace they meant to make a stand. All these girls have now come boldly out, and they asked that they might have Bibles to use in their own homes. This is a wonderful change, as hitherto they would not be seen with a Bible.

The claims of both sexes and of all ages are carefully regarded at the Institute. The younger girls have their section, and in the working lads' branch many have been gathered in. To some of these life is a stern struggle. "The boys," writes Miss Meredith Brown, "are very rough, and at times difficult to manage, but when one knows something of the hardships of their daily life, one realizes to the full their kindness of heart. One mother told us her boy, a lad of seventeen, earned ten shillings a week; he brings it all to her, seldom asking for any of it back. A boy of fifteen, himself in bad health, works hard to keep up the home for a consumptive father and mother and four younger sisters and brothers. Another lad of fifteen pays for the rent of the room in which the whole family live."

The night shelter for women, and the labour home for men, may be regarded as moral dredges; they reach the poorest outcasts, and by their means many pearls have been brought from the depths of the tempestuous ocean of sin and misery. The training-home for girls is a necessity in such an undertaking as the Shaftesbury Institute, where, as well as in the deaconesses' visitation work, the need of a preventive home was constantly felt.

SAVED IN TIME.

Typical of many who have been snatched just in time from positions fraught with moral danger, is the case of a poor child who, although she gave her age as sixteen, seemed to carry the weight of years upon her shoulders. She had a wretched home, for both parents drank. "Father was the worst, 'e banged mother somethink cruel; 'e'd say, 'e'd pound the life hout of 'er. He put me hout to beg, then 'e would knock me abaht in the evenin's. Mother left him, but she kep' me and my sister, and 'e took my brother, just turned five, and left him alone in a lodging-house. The people in the house gave him bites, 'cos they thought father would come back. Then he was found by the p'lice wandering on London Bridge, and they put him in a 'ome. Mother took me and my sister to a lodging-house, where there was men as well as women, but the 'School Board' (Lodging-House Inspector) came in and he said children wasn't allowed in them houses. Soon after, mother was put in the asylum, and I got half-a-crown a week for mindin' a baiby, and I got a bit o' scrubbin', so me god-mother said as 'ow she'd keep me and give me clothes ef I'd give 'er the money." The girl was living in this disreputable fashion, and almost in rags, when a district visitor found her. Later, in reply to a question, the girl said she did not know who the Lord Jesus was till she came to the Training Home. But now, not only does she know about Him, but she knows Him as her Saviour.

By evangelistic services in the grimy kitchens of common lodging-houses, by the gatherings for poor mothers, in finding employment for out-o'-works, and in many other helpful ways, Miss Meredith Brown and her devoted helpers are doing much for the Gospel cause in the terrible slums of West London. There are, of course, many financial responsibilities resting upon the superintendent in her labour of love for the poor. It is hoped to make some necessary improvements in "Jane Barclay House," the modest residence where, in the midst of noise and unrest, the deaconesses have their home.

N.E. London Gospel Mission.

THE Gospel work, which has its headquarters at Earlham Hall, N.E., under the superintendence of Mr. William Chorley, has many useful agencies at work for the evangelization of the people, while in its social institutions timely succour is given to the suffering and distressed poor.

"In the Home for the Aged," says Mr. Chorley in his annual report, "are found the frail and lone, whose whitening locks crown the deeply furrowed features from whose eyes the light of other days is fading quickly away." In this useful institution a number of aged Christians are tenderly cared for. A large amount of philanthropic work, too, is undertaken by the visiting staff in some of the poorest districts, and many a sad heart has been cheered by the timely aid in periods of dire necessity.

"The work in London," Mr. Chorley goes on to say, "means always—at least, outwardly—a more sombre aspect, and to the eye might be far from attractive. The little crowd of listeners grouped around the band of preachers, with portable harmonium and lamp-stand, in the side turning, within touch of the surging crowd upon the main street, may be neither imposing nor poetical. The mission service in the bright Gospel hall itself would need a sympathetic spirit to catch the warmth and comfort it gives the weary ones who fill its benches; while to go round from room to room, upstairs and down, and follow our visitors in their oft wearing and depressing 'calls,' listen to the tales of anguish of varying intensity, but all telling the old, old story—sin and suffering, alternating with misfortune, affliction, and penury—such experiences would not lend themselves kindly to other than those whose heart goes out to human woe and man's deepest needs! Very much the same could be written about the 'lodging-house kitchen' work, workhouse visitation, and the rough lads' night school, while even rougher to many might seem the factory-girls' classes at Bromley-by-Bow.

MEETINGS FOR WAIFS.

"Attractive evenings of a bright and instructive character have been commenced, which are continued during the darker evenings. Crowds of poor children, including Sunday scholars and 'waifs and strays' from the cheerless streets, are thus brought under influences that can only make for good, and be, we trust, a link to lead many to the Saviour. Our lantern greatly helps in this service."

Encouraging accounts are likewise given of the Homes of Rest at Lancing-on-Sea. "We make no guess when we express our conviction that it is the atmosphere of the Homes, set up and maintained by the evangelical exercises consistently followed, that gives Lancing its attraction to the larger number of the poor ones who enjoy its opportunities."

Mr. Chorley's address is 6, Clephane Road, Canonbury, N.

Open-Air Workers' Rally.

AT the invitation of Sir Henry Bemrose, a large number of members, contributors, and friends of the Open-Air Mission assembled at Exeter Hall on Wednesday of last week. The occasion was the customary winter reunion, and the proceedings were marked by much enthusiasm. In the earlier part of the evening, the social element was largely in evidence. It reigned in parlour and gymnasium, where tea was served, and an opportunity was afforded for mutual intercourse. The companionship was that of brothers and sisters in the Gospel, conversing on common joys and interests; the fellowship was that of kindred spirits, for all were ambassadors of the same Master, and entrusted with the same Gospel, who had come from scenes of toil and sacrifice, not for pleasure, but for earnest discussion, allowing experience to shape counsel, and counsel to determine plans for future efforts.

The meeting which followed was presided over by Lieutenant-Colonel F. Roberts, in the absence through indisposition of Sir Henry Bemrose. In the course of his remarks, he gave it as his own experience that never before has there been so earnest a disposition to hear the Gospel from open-air preachers. A brief statement was made by Mr. Frank Cockrem, the energetic secretary, to the effect that last year evangelists were sent to 882 places, including fairs, regattas, race-courses, &c., holding over 3,000 services. Forty-eight counties have been visited, as well as 147 districts in London, three in France, and three in Germany.

Some timely and thoughtful words were spoken to the workers by Rev. S. A. Selwyn, on the promise—"Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end." He emphasized the need for being cleansed and filled with the Holy Spirit in order to be effective witnesses for Christ and successful winners of souls. Several evangelists followed with cheering testimony concerning the campaigns which have been conducted, and the numbers who have heard the Gospel to the salvation of their souls. The South London auxiliary was represented by Mr. George Arkell. This branch of the Open-Air Mission has 160 members, of whom 120 are open-air preachers. Besides the regular services in Brockwell Park, twenty outstations have been visited. Mr. W. Witty spoke of the work at Finsbury Park, where services were held during the summer months with encouraging results. Another centre of aggressive activity is Harlesden. The labours of the missioners here have been owned of God, and some cases mentioned by Mr. Sealey go to show that a deep and lasting work has been accomplished.

The Flower Girls' Mission.

THERE are now some seventy inmates at the Homes of the Watercress and Flower Girls' Mission in Sekforde Street, Clerkenwell, E.C., where crippled girls are received and trained in artificial flower making.

As they are precluded by their physical disabilities from undertaking domestic service, or, indeed, any kind of labour needing bodily strength, it is a happy and helpful arrangement to employ them in an industry at once so light and interesting as this. An extension of the work has now become a necessity.

The skill of the girls is often remarkable, many being gifted above the average, and showing much aptitude, patience, and determination. In about two years proficiency is attained, and during that period they are lovingly watched over and cared for, their spiritual welfare being sought in every possible way by godly matrons, whose delight it is to act a true mother's part to these afflicted ones.

At the end of their apprenticeship the girls are enabled to earn from 10s. to 15s. per week, and if they have no friends they are boarded out with foster parents, and work is provided for them.

The girls can maintain the Clerkenwell Home by their flower making if a ready sale can be obtained for their work. The season for selling is a short one, and there is apt to be an accumulation of stock. The council is desirous of arranging sales, and will be glad of the co-operation of friends who may be able to organize floral exhibitions and sales in their own homes. The address of Mr. John Groom, secretary, is 8, Sekforde Street, Clerkenwell, E.C.

Evangelistic.

Mr. Henry Thorne at Brightlingsea.

A HELPFUL ten-days' mission has just been brought to a close at Brightlingsea by Mr. Henry Thorne. Numbers of those outside the churches were attracted to the services, and not a few of these were led into the inquiry-room. The preaching was effective both among the young men and women, and the older members of the congregation. Under the influence of Mr. Thorne's earnest words large numbers came out on the Lord's side. The spiritual life of the church has been quickened and deepened, and its strength increased by the influx of new life into its fellowship.

W. F. P.

Gunhouse Wesleyan Church.

In connection with Epworth Circuit, a fortnight's mission has been concluded at Gunhouse Church. From the first the missioner, Mr. R. S. Bradbrook, secured the loyal co-operation of all the officials and workers.

The Bible readings were a great help to God's people, and the gatherings grew in interest and numbers. All the meetings, indeed, have been well attended. Busy farmers left their farms and encouraged their men and women servants to go to the meetings. Several of these, for whom their employers had earnestly prayed, were hopefully impressed and sought the Saviour. There is rejoicing in many a home by the banks of the Trent. At the closing meeting the church was crowded and grateful testimonies were given in acknowledgment of God's goodness.

Mr. Henry Collins at Copford, Essex.

A united Gospel mission of an inspiring character has been held by the Society of Friends and the Wesleyan Methodists of Copford, near Colchester, and surrounding parishes. The meetings were held in the Friends' Meeting House and the Wesleyan Chapel, from January 5 to 19, the evangelist being Mr. Henry Collins, of the Evangelization Society. The attendances at the various meetings were large on the week nights, while on the Lord's Day some were unable to obtain a seat. The quiet and earnest attention of the audiences showed with what eagerness the message was received. Many received blessing. After the services had closed it was difficult to get the people to leave. When, in the after meetings, liberty was given for those to leave who wished so to do, but few left, and on some occasions none moved. The results of the mighty working of the Holy Spirit have been witnessed in many cases.

Mr. Leonard Weaver's Meetings.

The mission conducted at Dartford by Mr. Leonard Weaver concluded with a meeting in the large Conservative Hall, High Street, on the Saturday evening. The hall had been booked by a travelling theatrical company, but owing to their fear of small-pox they decided to postpone their visit, and thus a splendid opportunity was given to preach the Gospel to a large crowd of those seldom found in places of worship. It has pleased God to answer the prayers of the workers by blessing many precious souls.

On Lord's Day, February 2, Mr. Weaver spoke afternoon and evening at that glorious centre of so much definite Christian activity, "The Conference Hall, Stratford." The subject of the afternoon's discourse was very appropriate, "Snow," the lessons drawn from numerous passages from the Word of God brought cheer and comfort to many hearts. At night Mr. C. Boardman took the chair. Mr. Weaver spoke with power from Luke xvii. 14, "As they went they were cleansed." Several accepted the Lord Jesus Christ as their Saviour.

Mr. W. R. Lane at Gateshead.

The increasing unity of the Free Churches for aggressive work has been evident during the ten days' mission just concluded by Mr. W. R. Lane under the auspices of the Gateshead Free Church Council. Those actively interested in the work were most energetic in the arrangements. Within a few minutes of his arrival from London Mr. Lane met about 200 Christians of various denominations, mostly men who had already prepared the way by a good deal of visitation work and a week of united meetings for prayer. Mr. Lane was delighted with the heartiness of his reception, and, although very much run down in health, he "picked up" wonderfully in a day or two. His week-night audiences increased steadily from about 500 to 900, while on his last night the large Wesleyan church, in which all the services had been held, was more than comfortably filled by a congregation of over 1,300. A meeting for men only was also largely attended.

Mr. Lane set forth the main truths of the Christian faith with intensity of conviction, and his virile manner of speech carried him to the hearts of his audiences. In the large industrial community of Gateshead and district he has done (and could do still more) invaluable work, and his departure was accompanied by the prayers and earnest interest of the many hundreds who had listened to his voice. Mrs. Baeyertz at Church Street Baptist Chapel, N.W.

In what has so often been designated "a difficult neighbourhood" Mrs. Baeyertz has held an inspiring sixteen days' mission. What every other means has failed to do, the faithful and earnest preaching of the Gospel of the Cross by a simple converted Jewess has gloriously accomplished. The church was crowded more than once—a thing unknown for many years—while upwards of 150 souls sought the Saviour. The absence of anything like clap-trap or sensationalism with Mrs. Baeyertz is most marked. Our church has been set on fire of the Holy Ghost, we are feeling the gracious influence, and shall do, we trust, for years to come.

Something like twenty-two churches are represented by the converts, beside mission halls, so that the tide of blessing has reached to almost all the churches in the neighbourhood. Not the least gratifying and important feature of the mission has been the reviving and strengthening of the spiritual life of God's children by the heart-searching and helpful Bible readings in the afternoons. These were well attended from the first, the gallery of the church being in use towards the close. Mrs. Baeyertz, we feel, is a gift of God to the churches, and we are deeply grateful to Him for sending this much-used servant among us. We shall not soon forget her loving ministry and sweet fellowship.

F. J. Dawson, Pastor.

Castle Cary, Somerset.

The Free Church Schools at Castle Cary, Somerset, have been holding united services in connection with the National Mission to Children and Young People, from January 13 to 25, and that the services were appreciated was shown by the large gatherings and their close attention to the speakers. This was especially the case in those meetings addressed by Miss F. M. Reid, who has worked for ten years or so in the China Inland Mission at Chefoo and Nan-k'ang-fu. On Thursday, Friday, and Saturday evenings, Miss Reid gave very clear Gospel addresses, and it was felt that God spoke, through her, to both children and parents, words which they will not forget. As so much interest had been shown in the mission, it seemed right to carry the meetings on into the next week, and this was made possible by Miss Reid consenting to stay on till Thursday, January 30. The Lord's Day afternoon address on the work in China was a fitting preparation for her exposition of Luke xi. 32 in the evening, which was most searching and solemn.

A large gathering of Christian Endeavourers and friends assembled on Tuesday night. The last meeting was on Wednesday evening after the annual tea of the women's adult classes, and it was good to see the women, old and young, drinking in the wonderful story of the gift of God.

The Great Assembly Hall, E.

Deep interest was maintained to the close of the boy preacher's mission at the Great Assembly Hall, Mile End, E.

The great building, although accommodating nearly 5,000 persons, was filled almost every week-night, while on the Lord's Days the police, who had difficult work to keep away the crowds, said that, in their opinion, as many had been sent away as would fill the hall over again.

Saturday last was the final day. At six p.m. there was a rally of converts who had been invited by circular letter to take a cup of tea with Mr. Cooke. Although some were precluded from attending by the circumstances of their employment, the area of the large hall was filled, no fewer than 900 out of the 1,250 converts whose names had been registered up to that time accepting the invitation. Stirring words of counsel and encouragement were given by Mr. Cooke, Mr. Coutts, and Mr. F. N. Charrington, while Rev. J. F. Hobbins, of Christ Church, Stepney, prayed that God's blessing might rest upon the young converts.

For the public service which followed, the hall was filled soon after seven o'clock, and was crowded by the time fixed for commencing the meeting. Mr. Cooke gave a closing appeal to the unconverted, and there were many responses, the total number of seekers during the mission amounting to 1,325.

Perhaps the most remarkable gathering of all was that on the concluding Lord's Day. In order to accommodate as many outsiders as possible the Christians in the congregation were invited to vacate their seats. Some hundreds did so, and, adjourning to the smaller hall, spent the time in prayer and supplication for the meeting which was being led by Mr. Cooke. The gathering was marked by great fervency and liberty in prayer.

A remarkable scene was witnessed after the final meeting on Saturday last. Outside the hall the police had to make a way through the interested crowds to Mr. Charrington's house, and there the road was so blocked with people that Mr. Cooke, unable to get away, had to remain for the night. Mr. Charrington and his workers are full of praise and thankfulness for the mission.

Rev. John McNeill at Stirling.

The simultaneous mission at Stirling of the United Free Church has been in the strong hands of Rev. John McNeill, whose visit to the City of the Rock will be a green spot in the memory of not a few who have found peace in believing under his vigorous appeals.

The time chosen was not the best for evangelistic work, but those who organized the mission had to take the evangelist when he could come. There was another able man in the field dealing with another question of supreme importance, viz., temperance. Rev. Leonard Isitt, of New Zealand, came to Stirling a week in advance of Mr. McNeill. His meetings were small to begin with, but after Mr. McNeill's first meeting the tide set in the direction of the temperance propaganda. The two men had much in common, and one helped the other.

By-and-bye the place got roused up to hear the stirring appeals of the New Zealand Methodist minister, whose whole soul was on fire with his subject.

Meanwhile Mr. McNeill went on with his own work. The addresses given were plain, homely, spiritual, intensely practical, and when the audience learned to know what to expect they continued to wait on a ministry which was unconventional, fresh, stimulating, and profitable in the highest sense of the word. Some might mock and turn away; but others heard the word gladly, and felt their hearts warmed and stirred by the manly earnestness of a preacher who speaks out of a warm heart a message of good cheer, which is like cold water to thirsty souls.

All along the line the evening meetings kept up. They were not so large as on the first occasion, ten years ago, to begin with, but they never fell away. On the two Sabbath evenings hundreds were turned away from the door. During the last week the large hall was filled night after night, and those who met got something to do them good.

During the second week Mr. McNeill seemed to grow in tenderness and in power. Throughout the whole mission he kept in close touch with the regular ministry. He preached in the pulpit of the largest Established Church, and had always a kindly word to say about the ministers and the regular work of the Christian churches.

Already there are signs and tokens that the mission has done real and solid good. God's people have been quickened and stirred. And not a few who were weary and out of the way have looked to Christ and been lightened.

Obituary.

MR. G. H. LORD, BUCKHURST HILL.

MANY friends will hear with regret of the departure of Mr. G. H. Lord, of Buckhurst Hill. He was a well-known worker, always willing to render help, and in much request as a teacher. Since his visit to Palestine a few years ago he frequently spoke on things seen and learned there, always endeavouring, with high purpose, to throw light upon the sacred Word. Mr. Lord's ministry of love will be greatly missed.

MR. RICHARD SPRAGG.

The news of the death of Mr. Richard Spragg will come with a sense of shock to many who esteemed him for his unflagging zeal and devotion. Only a few days prior to passing to his reward, he had commenced a mission at Hope Hall, Kilburn, N.W., with signs of blessing.

Mr. Spragg had remarkable gifts as an evangelist. He was both powerful and unconventional, ever ready to adopt the means which seemed likely to awaken the people. Yet he was no sensationalist in the ordinary acceptance of the term, for behind his ready wit and happy faculty of retaining the attention of a crowd, there was true spiritual fervour. Convicted of his need of a Saviour under an address of Mr. W. R. Lane, some twenty-five years ago, Mr. Spragg soon set to work for the Master. With characteristic energy, he set out in the streets of Kensal Town, ringing a large bell, and, when a crowd had gathered, preached Christ to the people. He was also much given to personal work, "button-holing" strangers in a way that disarmed opposition, and was never happier than when, on gaining admission to St. Mary's Hospital, Paddington, he was enabled to converse on spiritual topics with patients. His ready and pungent oratory rendered him popular, and he quickly attained a wide reputation as a weighty and effective speaker. The demands upon his time were many, and ultimately he was led to devote himself entirely to the work of evangelism. He laboured in various parts of the country with much acceptance, and his death, the cause of which was pneumonia, will cause mourning in the humble homes of many who owe their first spiritual impressions to the telling words of "Dick Spragg."

Christian Union for Social Service.

SIR,—Will you allow me on behalf of the Christian Union for Social Service to make known to young men among your readers, who have some practical acquaintance with farm labour which they are willing to consecrate, that there is room and need for them as house brothers in connection with our two training colleges in Surrey and Westmoreland.

In these we have about eighty men and lads who are learning to till the soil, and so to gain or regain independence. The hardy and earnest man, who is willing to share their circumstances, with but small remuneration, in order to convey his own manhood to them, by sympathy, example, and instruction, will do some of the best and hardest work of to-day, and, whether he continues in the service one year or ten, he cannot fail to enrich his own life by the exercise of such a ministry. Those who are inclined to engage in it should address, "The Director, Training Colony, Lingfield, Surrey."—I am sir, yours faithfully,

J. F. B. TINLING,
Liverpool. (Hon. Gen. Secretary.)

Peter's Pence.—For some years there has been a deficit in the Papal budget, and it has now become so serious that, although the revenue was set down last years as £280,000, piteous appeals have been made to various countries for assistance. Part of the deficit is attributed to failing generosity in France, but in well-informed circles it is said that the Papal speculations in money lending, and in the building craze in Rome, have proved unfortunate, the Pope and a prelate named Folchi having acted independently of the three cardinals who are supposed to have a consultative voice in matters of finance. Large sums certainly were withdrawn from English investments, and laid out elsewhere. Pilgrimages to Rome are being pressed, as a source of revenue to the Vatican, and already Cardinal Vaughan has appealed on behalf of the proposed one from England, a country, he says "ever the first in generosity and loyalty."

About Books.

"THE BEST BOOK OF ALL."

WE welcome another book in the excellent series edited for children and young people by Mr. Stanley Martin—The Best Book of All; and How it Came to Us. By Rev. F. J. Hamilton, D.D. (Paper, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d. Morgan & Scott.) This is a very readable account of the Holy Bible, the origin and transmission of the various portions being outlined in simple language, with an abundance of excellent illustrations. For the most part, the pages deal with our English version, and some of the greatest heroes of the Christian era are given their mead of praise. The book is primarily intended for young people, and it should be in every Sunday School Library. If all Church members of maturer years had good command of the facts of the story, there would be a deeper intelligence regarding Christian standing and privilege, and a sterner determination to advance and defend the teaching of "the Best Book of all."

THE TEACHERS' COMMENTARY.

MANY will receive with genuine satisfaction the second volume of the great work which Dr. F. N. Peloubet is producing for Sunday School workers—The Teachers' Commentary on the Acts of the Apostles (5s. Oxford University Press). Prepared on the same method as its predecessor on St. Matthew's Gospel, this is a singularly useful work. The Sacred Text combines both versions, Authorized and Revised; the references are those lately prepared for the Revised Version; the Chronology followed is in the main that given in Dr. Hastings' great "Dictionary of the Bible." The notes are ample and clear, and written in the light of the most recent contributions to sound exposition. The student is much assisted by the analytical arrangement and references to illustrative material. There are also directions as to quarters in which further information may be sought on points of special importance. The engravings have been selected with practical judgment, and the indexes of subjects and Greek words are very valuable. The Sunday school teacher who consults Dr. Peloubet's handsome volumes will find himself richly rewarded.

Mr. C. J. Thynne issues a sterling booklet, Saving Gospel Truth, by Canon Christopher, of Oxford. (1d.) The pages are a powerful statement of glorious teaching.

The first number of The Shorthand World (4d. net. Guilbert Pitman) gives much promise of usefulness to phonographers. The printing of the shorthand pages is especially excellent.

The new volume of the Century Bible is The Acts, edited by Professor J. Vernon Bartlet, M.A., of Mansfield College, Oxford. (2s. T. C. & E. C. Jack). Students will find this a very useful book. The series, excellent as a whole, has so far given us nothing more thorough than this.

The popular penny edition of Scenes of Scottish Life, which Mr. Joseph Wright (5, Duncannon Street, Charing Cross) offered to all who wrote for it, is an interesting booklet, containing the pieces formerly published in "Janet Hamilton" and "Laird Nicoll's Kitchen," with a new series of sketches.

Those who know Mr. B. McCall Barbour's Boys' Series of booklets, and, indeed, all who are seeking the highest interests of schoolboys, will extend a cordial welcome to the first issue of Bits for Our Boys (1d. monthly. 37, Chambers Street, Edinburgh). It is bright and attractive in matter and get-up, and strikes a truly spiritual chord in just such a way as will appeal to boys.

Many to whom the subject has endeared himself during his missions in different parts of the country, will give a cordial welcome to Newton Jones; his Life Story and Service for Christ, by Rev. J. Miller Hamilton (1s. Sunday School Union). The narrative is interestingly written, and in addition to personal and other photographs, its attractiveness is enhanced by reproductions of two of Mr. Jones' illustrative lecture charts.

The annual volume of Rest and Reaping (2s. 6d. Morgan & Scott) contains much that is calculated to be helpful in the upbuilding of believers in their faith. In addition to a large variety of articles on Scriptural topics, Rev. Alexander Hislop's "The Two Babylons" is summarised in a series entitled "Popery and Paganism," while under "Latter Day Outlook" the signs of the times are pointed out for those who have eyes to see. There is wealth of poetry that will stimulate and strengthen Christians in the battle, with a serial story of the religious struggles in the seventeenth century.

By giving to the world his Reminiscences of a Long Life (6s. Hodder & Stoughton), when in his ninety-sixth year, and a few weeks before his death, Rev. Dr. W. D. Killen (president of Belfast Presbyterian College) placed on record many interesting side-lights on the religious history of Ireland during the nineteenth century. He was a deputy to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland in the year of the Disruption (1843), and has much also to say of the Revival of 1859.

The February number of The Protestant Woman contains many items worthy of attention. Among these are a second telling article on "The Jesuit Plague," and a luminous paper on "The Reformation in Bohemia," treating of the witness of John Huss as a preacher. Under the heading "Among our Branches and with our Workers," most encouraging accounts of successful gatherings in the promotion of the cause of Protestantism.

The Bible unfolds new beauties to every faithful seeker; and by putting on record in The Book Wonderful (4d. Marshall Bros.) "an indication of the point of view in which the Bible stands to one who was, for nearly ten years, an unwilling but most uncompromising Freethinker," Mr. Avary H. Forbes has laid the Church under deep obligation. It is good for believers to have the wonderful features of the Book of God clearly stated.

From the Curate to the Convent. This very readable and useful book by Rev. S. A. Walker has been reprinted (3s. 6d. Kensit). It traces the insidious influence of priestism upon a Church of England curate, and through him upon his parishioners. The characters are well drawn, the story well sustained, and a fund of important information is given incidentally throughout the book. It is a fair representation of what is going on in our midst from day to day, and is a most interesting and instructive book for young people.

Teachers and Bible students will find much to guide them in forming a true estimate of the twelve disciples in He Chose Twelve, by Rev. Dr. J. Elder Cumming (2s. 6d. Drummond's Tract Depôt, Stirling); and will be grateful for the fresh views which has been advanced on several points, whether agreeing entirely with the author or not. The chapters on John and Paul are specially valuable for the way in which the teaching given through these Apostles is summed up. In an interesting appendix the true unity of the writings of John is deduced from peculiarities of language. The book has been written in a devout spirit, and will be a source of strength and upbuilding in the faith to those who read prayerfully.

Of making many books there is no end, but the Bible is the one that lasts. Every class of person and condition of pocket is provided for by Bible publishers nowadays, and we wish God-speed to every effort made to bring his Holy Word before the people. Wonderful strides have been made of late years in binding and general style of production. The London Bible Warehouse have just issued a new edition of the Variorum Bible (overlapping edges, superior morocco, silk sewn, edges red under gold). It has central references with footnotes giving various readings from all sources, and select renderings from the best authorities. There is also a compendium of teachers' matter, and the volume will form an acceptable present at a very reasonable price. (10s. 6d.)

The bulk and expense of the four volumes, entitled "The Lord's Dealings with George Müller," prevented a really popular circulation; and a useful service has been performed by A. E. C. Brooks in the compilation of Answers to Prayer from George Muller's Narratives. (1s. and 1s. 6d. Morgan & Scott.) The selection has been made in the same gracious spirit as the writing, and the fragrance of the original narrative is with the reader all through. To the world these testimonies must be marvellous, if not incredible; to the child of God they will bring a deep sense of shortcoming in faith. Yet the book has a message of encouragement and hope to those who are tempted to faint by the way. To many young believers it must come as something little short of a new revelation in the grace and goodness of the Lord.

A volume calculated to stimulate deepened interest in the missions of the South Seas is—Savage Life in New Guinea: The Papuan in Many Moods. By Charles W. Abel, of Kwato, New Guinea. (2s. 6d. London Missionary Society House; and Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.) The pages will specially appeal to boys and girls, and there are seventy illustrations. There is a world of difference between the first chapter, in which the Papuan appears as a heathen, and the last chapter, in which he is delineated as a Christian. The intervening pages tell of his habits and mode of life, his superstitious beliefs, and domestic relations. There are some welcome reminiscences of the late James Chalmers ("Tamate"). We trust this handsome book will be widely circulated among the young and their friends.

Personalia.

Friends in many parts of the world will learn with pleasure that after six months' abstention from preaching under medical advice, Pastor David J. Findlay has now resumed his ministry at St. George's Cross Tabernacle, Glasgow.

Dr. Colin Valentine, of Agra, the esteemed medical missionary, is returning to this country for good on account of the serious condition of his health. He was to sail from Bombay on February 8, and on arriving in England his address will be care of Major-General Oldfield, R.A., Westwood, Battledown, Cheltenham.

Rev. R. C. Ward ("Man Sukh Lal"), of the American Methodist Episcopal Mission, Godhra, India, has been suffering for some time past from a severe attack of rheumatism. Before the famine came on he was one of the healthiest men among the missionary force in that part of India, but the extraordinary strain of the famine rescue work left him badly broken in health. He needs a long rest.

The retirement has just taken place of Rev. Robert H. Wheatley, who for nearly twenty years has represented the British and Foreign Bible Society in Egypt. Mr. Wheatley, soon after his ordination in 1859, started for Constantinople, and established, in spite of much opposition, the first mission to the Turks in connection with the Church Missionary Society. Mr. Wheatley first entered the Bible Society's service as agent for Sweden, afterwards exchanging it for the post at Alexandria.

Mrs. C. H. Spurgeon, writing in the February number of Sword and Trowel, says, "All readers will be delighted to hear that my son Thomas has been prevailed upon to accept the sole editorship of the magazine, and that he hopes next month to enter on his new duties. I gladly relinquish my part in its guidance, for I know that I am placing it in hands far abler than my own; but I hope, if my health will permit, to continue my occasional contributions to its pages."

Rev. R. Wallace, of Marchmont Home, Belleville, Canada, is again in England, and expects to return with a party of boys and young men in the early spring. He reports that the demand for these lads is as great as ever, and good opportunities are offered in Canada at the present time for any number of good boys who are fond of an out-door life. Communication may be addressed to Mr. Wallace, care of China Inland Mission Home, Newington Green, N.

American missionaries in India have been greatly pleased to welcome to their midst Mr. John Wanamaker, of Philadelphia, so well known, not only as one of the leading merchants of the United States, but more especially as a Christian philanthropist and Christian worker. Mr. Wanamaker is, of course, superintendent of the great Sunday school in connection with Bethany Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, which has an attendance of 3,000. The funds for the erection of the splendid Y.M.C.A. building in Madras were contributed by him.

From Mr. Montagu Beauchamp.

AFTER long and prayerful consideration, I have decided to return for a while to China, and should be glad of the prayers of all readers of The Christian. Mrs. Beauchamp will accompany me as far as Toronto at least, but she cannot be away from the children more than a few months.

We sail (D.V.) by s.s. Teutonic, from Liverpool, February 12, and shall be in Toronto for C.I.M. annual meeting, February 21; and the great Students' Conference in the same city, February 26 to March 2. How near it is to the seventeenth anniversary of our departure in 1885! But how much harder now than at that time when perfectly free. Thank God for all his faithfulness. He has given us here a small, but very happy, home for the children, and he will continue to care for us and for them.

Letters to the address at foot will always be forwarded. Letters to Toronto may be addressed to China Inland Mission; or later, after next month, to China Inland Mission, Shanghai, China.

May we hope that this short letter may stir up fresh prayer and praise. "Everything by prayer."

Montagu Beauchamp.

The Limes, Cheltenham.

London Tent Campaign.—The reports of the London Tent Campaign, which have just been issued, contain many and convincing accounts of the extensive operations that have been carried on in various parts of the metropolis. At many centres a glorious work broke; there were large numbers of inquirers. It is to be regretted that, as the financial report shows, there is an adverse balance of £500. The committee express the earnest hope that the deficiency may be speedily cleared. The hon. treasurer is Mr. A. Garstin, 12, Queen Square, Aldersgate Street, E.C.

The Churches.

 The Editor will be glad to receive "post-card" notes for this page, of spiritual progress and effort in the Churches. They must be prompt, reliable, and not trivialities; and be accompanied by sender's name and address.

Church of England.

The Simeon Trustees have appointed Rev. F. E. Murphy, vicar of St. Andrew's, Upper Holloway, to the vicarage of Walthamstow.

The Poole Trustees have appointed Rev. D. C. O'Connor, curate of St. Matthew's, Kingsdown, Bristol, to the living of St. Paul's, Poole. Mr. O'Connor, prior to coming to Bristol, was for three years curate of St. Thomas', Edinburgh. He is a decided Evangelical.

The appreciation of the poor women in Bermondsey who benefit by the establishment of the C.M.S. Medical Mission in their midst was illustrated recently by the remark of an old woman who had been attending the Mission as an out-patient for some months. In reply to a question from a lady visitor as to whether the women and children of Bermondsey were glad that the Medical Mission ladies had come to live amongst them, she was met with the answer, "Glad? Why, miss, we calls them the 'Bermondsey angels.'"

The Bishop of Newcastle presided recently at a meeting of the Northern Christian Union—an association founded during the Church Congress of 1901, for the promotion of Christian feeling amongst local churches—and introduced the Bishop of Durham as chief speaker. Bishop Moule, who was very cordially received, said that if the urgent needs of the community are to be adequately met by those who name the name of Christ, it is manifest that this can never be rightly done while one atom of their strength is being expended on mutual friction or rivalry that may be directed against evil.

Congregational.

Rev. Dr. A. Guinness Rogers has accepted the pastorate of the South Cliff Congregational Church at Scarborough, and will commence his duties in April. Dr. Rogers is one of the sons of Rev. Dr. J. Guinness Rogers.

The Historical Committee recently appointed by the northern division of Devonshire churches, has commenced its work, and gathered much information from the different Congregational Churches. The intention is to secure a reliable list of the sources of the history of the churches, and a record of the facts that can be gleaned.

Rev. F. L. Cater, of Oundle, in a pastoral letter to his church, says:—"I venture to think there is much in the past six months for which we should be profoundly thankful to God. We have eschewed all sensationalism, and have had manifested in our midst the quiet working of the Spirit. All our organizations are in a healthier condition, more interest is evoked, congregations are much larger, and there is a beautiful spirit of fellowship in our midst.

Baptist.

Missionary anniversary services were celebrated on January 26 and 27 at Rochester, when Rev. J. Stubbs, from Patna, N. India, was the deputation. The congregations were large, the collections good, and the occasion was of an inspiring nature.

The manual of the Devonshire Square Church, Stoke Newington Road, N. (Rev. G. J. McKay, pastor), sets forth a very encouraging condition of things. The membership stands at 782, some eighty-five persons having been received in the course of the year. In support of the various funds, £2,427 was raised.

Rev. Dr. Joseph Angus (who is now the oldest living Baptist minister save one) lately celebrated his eighty-sixth birthday. He is in good health, and has so far stood the winter well. Dr. Angus was president of the Baptist Union as far back as 1865, and for thirty-five years he was Principal of Stepney (later known as Regent's Park) College, London.

An important step has been taken by the Lake Road Church, Portsmouth, in deciding to build a permanent chapel on the site of the London Road Mission Chapel. The handsome and commodious edifice which is to be erected will meet a need which has been felt and often expressed during the past few years, as the district in which the mission chapel is located is growing rapidly.

Rev. Dr. McLaren continues to receive a very large number of replies to his appeal for a simultaneous collection on March 23 on behalf of the Twentieth Century Fund. Nearly all are not only cordial but enthusiastic. Many rejoice to have an opportunity of showing their love and esteem for Dr. McLaren by helping to complete a task in which he has taken such deep interest. The total receipts to date are nearly £150,000.

Methodist.

In connection with the transfer to Ilkley of the Wesleyan Deaconesses' Institution, negotiations which have been in progress for some time have just been completed for the purchase of property in every way admirably suited and situated for the purpose. The building, which was originally intended for a school, possesses ample accommodation.

The Finchley and Hendon Wesleyan Circuit has felt the effects of London expansion, and in its three churches has striven to meet the pressing need. The picturesquely-situated church at Mill Hill has been unfortunate through defective construction, and works are now in progress to strengthen the fabric, and if possible increase the vestry accommodation, at a cost of over £300.

Canadian Methodism claims to have the oldest living Methodist in the world in the person of Mrs. Mary Ann Mills, who is now in her 114th year. She is of Irish descent, having emigrated to Canada in 1837, and is represented as a bright Christian, whose mind is richly stored with Scripture and with Wesley's hymns. Mrs. Mills has seen three centuries, and has lived under five British Sovereigns.

The inaugural meeting of the Wesleyan Soldiers' and Sailors' Homes Fund, the object of which is to raise £50,000 during the Coronation year to supplement the grant from the Twentieth Century Fund for providing additional soldiers' and sailors' homes in various parts of the King's dominions, was held on Thursday last at the United Service Institution. Among the speakers were Sir H. Fowler, M.P., and Major-General Sir H. Trotter. It was announced that £7,372 had been subscribed.

The theatre services being held at West Bromwich by Rev. Josiah Mee are not taking the place of any meeting, neither are any of the usual means of grace in the slightest degree neglected because of them. The congregation of every church and chapel in the town is dispersed by eight o'clock, while the theatre service commences at 8.15. The first eight services have been attended by at least nine thousand people, of a class unreached by church influences. An interesting feature is that the entire congregation reads the Scripture lesson, which is printed in large type on the back of the hymn-sheet, upon which also is the request that the hymn-sheet be taken home.

It certainly would be well if all church and chapel buildings and extension could be carried out without heavy debt being incurred. Meanwhile, however, it is gratifying to find from a circular issued by Rev. Thomas Mitchell that, so far as British Methodism as a whole is concerned, out of every pound expended in building and in enlargements 17s. 6d. have been paid, the proportion paid reaching 18s. 9d. so far as the Wesleyan Methodists alone are concerned. The cost of the places of worship now reaches £24,000,000. So far as mere figures can be depended upon in evidence, the statistics given by Mr. Mitchell, in regard to the Primitive Methodist body, are eminently satisfactory as showing remarkable growth, the chapel building during the past thirty years having cost £3,000,000, or six times the amount expended in the previous half-century. What is, perhaps, more remarkable still, a sum of £61,000 was raised during 1901 for chapel building, and debt to the amount of £71,000 wiped off.

Presbyterian.

The church at Wigan has had a year of continuous prosperity. The effort made the previous year to clear off the debt of £500, together with expenditure of an exceptional nature, left a considerable deficit at the beginning of the year just closed. At a recent meeting the treasurer made a gratifying statement regarding the financial state of the congregation, showing a respectable credit balance for the year. Out of this a sum was set aside for structural repairs.

Society of Friends.

At Newport (I.W.) George Cooper, of Brighton, was present on First Day, the 12th inst., and took an acceptable part in the adult school, morning meeting, women's Bible class, and evening mission meeting. Next day he visited the convict prison. In the evening the first annual meeting of the adult school was held, George Cooper presiding, and encouraging addresses being delivered.

William Hobson has paid an acceptable visit to Exeter Friends. He commenced a series of meetings on the 18th ult. with a lecture on "Stephen Grellet, French Nobleman and Quaker Evangelist." Alderman H. B. Varwell, J.P., presided over a well-attended meeting, and the subject was dealt with in an interesting manner. On the 20th, "William Penn, Christian Colonist and Statesman," was the subject of an instructive discourse, the lessons drawn from the story of his life being felt to be very applicable to present-day needs.

The Bishop of Hereford addressed, on Tuesday of last week, a crowded meeting of Yorkshire Friends, at York, on "The Duty of the Church of Christ at the Present Crisis." The Bishop said that 250 years ago if he had come among the Quakers it would have been as Saul of Tarsus; he now came after the conversion. The Dean of Durham last year addressed them on the foundations of national greatness, and now he (Dr. Percival) proposed to speak of the duty of the Church to the public life of the nation. National greatness really consists of the individual character of the men who constitute the state. We hear much just now of the need for efficiency in the conduct of public affairs, but is it sufficiently considered that a still greater need in our English life at the present moment is that prophetic insight or vision—the spirit so instinctively and so nobly embodied in the patriot prophets of Israel?

The annual meeting of the United Nonconformist Sunday Schools of Harwich took place on Lord's Day afternoon. Mr. S. Brown presided. Lieutenant Morris (Salvation Army), Revs. D. Morgan (Congregational), and J. Kemish (Primitive Methodist), and other friends took part. Five schools were represented, and the proceedings were highly encouraging to all concerned.

At the Slade Mission Hall, Plumstead, S.E., a ten days mission conducted by Mr. Frank Penfold, has just concluded. The place was so crowded that an adjoining hall had to be used. The workers were encouraged by many interesting cases of blessing. This special effort was immediately followed by the anniversary celebration, Colonel Tuck presiding. Great need is felt, and was expressed at this meeting, for extending the premises, the now available room in all branches of the work being quite inadequate for the densely populated district. The hon. superintendent is Mr. D. Carnegie, Eltekon, Plumstead, S.E.

Fallen Asleep.

Rev. C. A. Keightley, vicar of St. Paul's, Dorking. He had been for a long time in very poor health, and only a few months ago exchanged livings with Rev. H. C. Sturdy, vicar of St. Paul's, Dorking. He had been an earnest and consistent Evangelical all through his ministry, and a strong supporter of home and foreign missions.—Rev. Anthony J. Ward, Wesleyan Methodist, who commenced his ministry as a missionary in the West Indies, and for some thirty years subsequently did good service in leading home circuits. He became a supernumerary in 1894, and for the last seven years assisted Highgate Circuit.—By the decease of Mr. Henry Propsting, on the morning of his ninety-first birthday—December 16 last—the Society of Friends in Tasmania has lost the last surviving member of the little group that joined the Society during the visit of James Backhouse and George Washington Walker to Hobart in 1837.—The death of Caleb Stansfield Wilson, of Sunderland, at the ripe age of nearly eighty-one years, removes a well known member of the Society of Friends. His interest in the Y.M.C.A. was keen, and for nearly thirty years he had been actively associated with its working, keeping in sympathetic touch with the juvenile members. For many years he was a regular visitant of the cells at the Central Police Station on Sunday mornings, and did his utmost to turn the prisoners to a higher way of life. He was at all times warmly interested in the business of the Society of Friends.—Rev. David Thomas, Baptist minister, of Cwmbach, Aberdare.—Dr. G. B. Arnold, the well-known organist of Winchester Cathedral.—By the death of Mr. Charles Robottom, at the age of seventy-two, Leytonstone loses a prominent and earnest advocate of Sabbath schools. For several years he was one of the hon. secretaries of the Sunday School Union.

Requests for Prayer.

For the United Evangelistic Campaign in Calcutta, February 15-28.

For blessing on services at Kingsland Mission Hall, Castle Street, N., February 9-16.

For blessing on the fortnightly Bible Reading held at Mount Prospect, Waltham Market.

For services being held at the Baptist Chapel, Twynwdyn, by Rev. A. T. Jones, of Newport, Mon.

For blessing on a sixteen-days' Gospel mission at the Baptist Chapel, Poulner, Hants, by Mr. Ralph Williams, of the Evangelization Society, commencing February 9.

For a mission to be conducted by Mr. G. H. Roberts, Evangelisation Society, at the Mission-room, Hazelbury Plucknett, February 9 to 23, inclusive.

The Christian.

☞ To avoid delay it is requested that all letters relating to business matters should be addressed to the firm, Messrs. Morgan and Scott, and not to its individual members. Letters of a personal nature should in every case be so marked.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

☞ The Publishers request that all orders for The Christian by post, and remittances for same, be addressed to

"The Christian" Postal Department,
Bouverie House,
Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

Cheques and Post Orders to be made payable to Messrs. John Haddon and Co. at that address. (For Subscription rates, see Page 1 of Cover.) Postcard or stamped envelope should be enclosed if receipt is desired.

Notes & Comments

Missionaries and "The Christian." We are continually receiving requests from workers in the foreign field for The Christian to be sent them, and we place the matter before our readers, who themselves find the paper helpful, in the hope that many workers will, as a consequence, have copies sent them. Missionaries specially request that such kindness should be shown with regularity; and subscriptions received at our Postal Department (Bouverie House, Salisbury Square, E.C.) will have prompt attention. The foreign subscription is 8s. 8d. per annum.

In Continental Hotels. From time to time we also hear of the pleasure with which English travellers have found copies of The Christian in Continental hotels. A correspondent who has travelled much writes:—

> Many English-speaking visitors at hotels gladly welcome such papers. I would suggest that copies should be sent as soon as possible after publication, and that senders be careful in the matter of adequate stampage. It would be well to address "Salle de Lecture," as this would make clear the destination and object of the paper.

We need hardly say that we shall be glad to do all in our power to give effect to the wishes of any of our readers along these lines. As showing the high appreciation in which The Christian is held both on the Continent and in the mission-field, we give extracts from four letters taken from many which we have received:—

> Just a word of thanks for your esteemed paper, which I see nearly every week. Often has the Lord given a word of cheer by it, when the knees were a trifle feeble.—From Ceylon.
> We are very grateful for The Christian. It is a great boon to us, isolated from Christian intercourse. My sister and myself much appreciate the "Notes on Daily Readings."—From France.
>
> I very often see The Christian in missionary homes in India. It does far more good than its promoters will ever know on earth.—From Calcutta.
> Is is indeed a pleasure and blessing to read The Christian. May the Lord bless you, and cause you to prosper in all your work for Him.—From Norway.

Lent. "The great penitential season," as it is called, commenced yesterday. How are devout Evangelical Church people to observe it, guarding themselves from an extreme which challenges the heart of a simple faith? It cannot be too earnestly insisted upon that the "special days of grace" of which the extremists speak, and to which so many pin their confidence, are not days of special grace over and above others. All are equally days of grace in a dispensation of grace, excepting when the Holy Spirit powerfully operates upon a community. But it is useless to try and attach grace to a time-table made by men. The whole spirit of Lent needs careful watching lest external observances and omitted luxuries should be mistaken for internal grace. Self-denial is something infinitely more profound than the omission, for a time, of certain delicacies. But as a leading teacher points out, Lent may be used by devout people in the best way, in the securing of a pause in the midst of life's rush and pleasure. Anything that leads the soul to quiet communion with God, should be a means of grace, whenever the opportunity comes.

A Vital Distinction. "My kingdom is not of this world." This is one of the last lessons that the followers of Jesus Christ seem able to master. It is not merely in its political aspects that the meaning of this utterance is to be found. It applies equally to every attempt to materialize the spirit of Christianity. The world stands for the external—the Kingdom of Heaven is within; the world is for compromise between incompatible principles—the Kingdom involves the complete dominance of the spiritual over the material ("Ye cannot serve God and Mammon"); the world advocates expediency, self-interest—the Kingdom is righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost; the world follows convention and precedent — the Spirit moveth "where it listeth." The world is ever trying to form an "alliance" with the Kingdom, with a view to stifle and defeat it through its friendship—the subjects of the Kingdom must be faithful to their King, who never compromised, never temporized, was never enslaved by expedient, but found his meat and his drink in doing the will of his Father who is in heaven.

The Lesson of the Gore Case. The judgment delivered last Monday by the Lord Chief Justice, on the objection raised by representatives of Protestant associations to the consecration of Canon Gore as Bishop of Worcester, has brought out the fact that those who are anxious to prevent the preferment of Ritualists are not supported by the law of the land as it stands at present. It has been ruled that questions of heresy or ecclesiastical offence cannot be raised in the Confirmation Court; and this simply means that they cannot be raised at all. Canon Gore's consecration will now be proceeded with, and should protests be made in similar cases in the future, the Archbishop or Vicar-General will have ample support in treating them summarily. More or less, however, it must be admitted that the agitation has been in some sense an attempt to gain spiritual ends by the use of carnal weapons; and it will be well if, by this decision, Protestants are driven back on the preaching of the Word, which—as Rev. W. R. Mowll showed at the great Protestant Demonstration (page 19)—is the only weapon which will be effectual in the fight.

The Significance of the Reformation. The pulpit of Westminster Abbey is rapidly becoming renowned for its out-spokenness upon the burning religious questions of the day. Hardly have the words of Canon Henson on Reunion ceased to echo, than the same intrepid preacher commences a new series of sermons, which go to the root of things. The first of the course on "The Significance of the Reformation" will certainly be unacceptable to the so-called "Catholic" party, which never loses an opportunity to belittle the work of the Reformation; but for all that, much good will be done by the trenchant words of Canon Henson, who shows most conclusively how God, at that critical time, brought Europe to judgment—"arraigning the mediæval system before the bar of the human conscience and the New Testament"—and how the nations who have accepted His judgment have advanced and prospered, whilst those who rebelled against it have declined, and now show everywhere signs of social dissolution.

What Constitutes Schism? There is no word that carries a graver charge than the little word schism. Literally it means a division or separating. As applied by Sacerdotalists, it means all those who decline to submit to their exaggerated claims as to apostolic succession and the value of sacraments. The true schismatic spirit, however, is not that which denies those claims, which are derived not from Scripture, but from the traditions of the Roman Catholic Church, but which declines to commune in brotherhood with those who conscientiously disclaim them. They who deny the churchmanship of true believers outside their own communions are the real schismatics. Schism is bigotry, narrowness of sympathy and love for those who are in Christ Jesus. It is embodied in the disciples' attitude when they said, "Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy Name, and he followeth not us; and we forbad him, because he followeth not us" (Mark ix. 38). The answer given to John by Jesus is the final condemnation of the schismatic spirit.

Ultramontane Ireland. A remarkable paper in the current number of the Fortnightly Review, from the pen of Dr. Johnstone Stoney, F.R.S., certainly is one of the most striking contributions which have been made to the history of the demand for a Roman Catholic University. This writer exposes the secret machinery behind the movement, and shows clearly that the agitation is based solely upon a desire to shift to the shoulders of the State the cost of training and feeding the peasant lads in the seminaries who are now "educated" for the Irish and foreign priesthood upon subscriptions and donations. The statement that the Roman Catholic population of Ireland is three times as large as the Protestant, is explained by the fact that the excess is in the peasant and labouring classes, who, except in the direction indicated, would not in any way be interested in the University. The paper is, however, perhaps of the greatest value as a revelation of the way in which, since the days of Bishop Doyle and others who were in favour of the education of Roman Catholics at Trinity College, Roman Catholic Ireland has been deprived of her few shreds of religious liberty. To-day, in the hands of the "Delegate of the Apostolic See in Ireland," and the so-called "intruding Bishops" (appointed by the Vatican, instead of being, as formerly was the case, nominated in Ireland), she is completely under the control of a few ecclesiastics at Rome. Under such circumstances, as Dr. Johnstone Stoney points out, a Roman Catholic University in the Sister Island would simply be "a cage for the laity, and a seminary for its foreign missions."

Science and the Soul. To those who watch the swing of the pendulum of modern thinking, nothing is more interesting than to observe the change of attitude on the part of many scientists towards religious questions. The old, hard, bare materialism, so popular a few years ago, has been abandoned by leading spirits. A book just published containing the last words of the late John Fiske, the Evolutionist, treats of Immortality from a scientific standpoint, and shows how thoroughly untrustworthy is the old absurdity that "mind is the product of material forces." It is remarkable that an Evolutionist should take up the position that the soul is an emanation from God, which during its temporary imprisonment in our bodily nature uses the brain as its instrument of expression. Exactly the Christian position. This change of front on the part of scientific men ought at least to teach others the lesson of modesty, and to prevent them from boldly contradicting as absurd what at the moment may seem so to them.

On Behalf of the Little Ones. The Lord Chief Justice has an important Bill in hand for the amendment of the Act for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, which he "piloted" through the Commons in 1894. The working of that Act has, on the whole, been excellent, and the lives of thousands of innocent children have been sweetened and made more endurable through the watchfulness of the S.P.C.C. But there are gaps in it which the new Bill proposes to fill. If passed, it will make it illegal to endanger the lives of little children through "overlying," or leaving them unprotected in rooms with a fire, or under the charge of intoxicated persons; to imperil their morals through promiscuous sleeping arrangements; to injure their physique by prolonging their labours in domestic work; and to bring them up as tramps. The defence of children from parental or adult tyranny and thoughtlessness is one of the most laudable functions of the State. We trust that this beneficent Bill will speedily become law.

The Secret of Failing Trade. England's growing inability to compete successfully with other nations may be traceable to several causes, more or less potent, but undoubtedly the drink habit is one of the most powerful. Speaking recently in the House of Commons, Mr. Caine furnished a striking illustration of the evil influence in this direction of our national intemperance:—

> The whole question of our competition with America depended upon the improvement of the condition of our workpeople. He knew of a village in Connecticut where they manufactured shoes, which were sold at a shop in Regent Street, and in that village every working-man occupied a house of six rooms, with a quarter of an acre of garden, and, what was very important, there was not a single liquor shop. In a shoemaking town in the Midlands, of similar population, there were twenty-six public-houses, and the principal manufacturer there told him that £60,000 per annum of the workpeople's money went to those liquor shops. In the American village that sum went into the homes of the people, and that made all the difference.

Capital and Labour. Mr. Ralph Neville, K.C., in an admirable article in the Monthly Review on "British Industry and the Wage System," summarises recent controversies on the relations of employers and employed in a way that must appeal to both sides. While acknowledging that trades-unionism has done great things for the welfare and defence of the working-classes, by fixing and maintaining a fair wage and reducing unduly long hours, he shows that the equality of wage insisted on necessarily tends to an equality of output based on the capacity of the least efficient, and that great harm is done to industry by this limitation. Employers, however, are plainly told that their frequent selfishness and shortsightedness have accentuated the hostility of labour to capital. He advocates the system of profit-sharing, as tending to identify the interests of masters and men. Well-paid labour is the most remunerative in the end. Those employers who show the greatest attention to these points are the most successful in business, and are least troubled by slovenliness in the work and by trade disputes.

Behind the Dividend. In the face of such facts as those given to the Press by Mr. Bell, M.P., who is endeavouring to obtain further legislation in regard to the Hours Act, the wonder is, not there are so many, but so few railway accidents. Mr. Bell states that he has brought under the notice of the Board of Trade that in a period of only ten weeks there were forty-one violations of the Act, involving 125 cases of duty ranging from 14½ to 30¾ hours of continuous duty on the part of engine-drivers, firemen, and guards. The question naturally arises whether Christian shareholders are sufficiently alive to the conditions under which, in only too many instances, their dividends are built up. Some years ago, the question of ill-paid Sunday labour upon one of our leading lines was made a shareholders' question, and the evils were soon remedied. The example might well be followed to-day in respect to some other sections of railway labour in which no regard is shown to the material and spiritual welfare of the workers, whose toil is so potent a factor in the dividends.

The Outlet for Super-Population. The article by Mr. Holt Schooling in the current Contemporary, on "The Increase of Three Populations," will probably surprise the majority of people because of its revelation of an unsuspected state of things. Cold statistics show that both France and England are not increasing their populations with recuperative power—though, of course, France is really going backward, which we are not—and that Germany alone is doing so. This revelation contradicts the oft-heard opinion that we are increasing too fast. The truth is that we are too thickly planted within given limited areas; but so far as the country and the empire beyond it are concerned, we are not progressing as we should. Mr. Schooling pleads for a wider distribution of the population in the way of colonizing. With the new sense of empire which has seized the imagination of Englishmen, there must come a diminution of our insular notions. It will be remembered how the Prince of Wales, after his return from the Colonies a few weeks ago, emphasized the facts of "boundless tracks yet unexplored," and "the want of population in our Colonies." There is a healthy exchange for our overcrowded cities and the pitiful struggle for existence which so many have to make.

The Poverty of India. The short debate in the Commons upon the poverty of India unfortunately leaves us where we were in the matter of understanding the real reason of India's dejection. Most foolishly, the question is treated in a party spirit, and the leading articles in the papers simply represent the views of their particular party. Recrimination can serve no useful purpose in so serious a problem. What Lord Curzon desires is evidently some practical suggestions which will help him in dealing with the cause of the chronic poverty of India. The recurring famines—and there have been eight since the year 1857—with the terrible loss of life involved, make it imperative that the whole question shall be faced. We are afraid that the majority of people at home do not comprehend the importance of Indian affairs, either politically, socially, or religiously; if they did, surely there would be less indifference to them.

The "Poppy" Once More. Attention is being drawn to the unquestionable and increasing cultivation of the poppy in India. The Society for the Suppression of the Opium Trade has memorialized Lord Salisbury, pointing out that this is in direct contravention to his promise in 1876, and of the resolution of the House of Commons in 1893, instructing the Indian Government to diminish the area of cultivation. Instead of this being done, we find that, whereas in 1897-8 this amounted to 539,885 acres, it rose in 1899-1900 to 627,311 acres. The memorial contends that this increase is the result of a deliberate policy on the part of the Indian Government, which desires to make up for the lessened profit due to Chinese competition. This is a fresh illustration of the peril of permitting governments to benefit through the cultivation of industries that are deleterious to the moral well-being of the community. To lighten taxation by such means, is a policy that must bring disaster in the end both to Government and people.

And Who is My Neighbour? The Registrar General's complete statistical tables for the county of London, just issued, throw a lurid light upon the conditions of life in large sections of the Metropolis. Some of the facts evidenced by the figures are as startling as they are painful—a population of nearly 67,000 occupying the workhouses, lunatic asylums, hospitals, prisons, and reformatories on the night when the census was taken; and 406 persons sleeping in barns and sheds, &c., 4,001 "one-room tenements" having five, and 11,279 having four persons each in them. This is a sufficiently pitiable state of things, but it is intensified by the fact that there are thousands of single rooms occupied by various numbers up to twelve. Is it not only too evident, therefore, that in much of our social reform the beginning is made at the wrong end, that the labour is, in fact, expended upon the cause rather than the effect?

The Sin of Suicide. The Spectator deals thoroughly and indignantly with the mischievous doctrine of Euthanasia, or glorification of painless suicide, which is being increasingly advocated in some irreligious circles as, under certain circumstances, justifiable. This doctrine stands or falls with a godless creed. The sanctity of human life as such is inextricably interwoven with its Divine origin and destiny. That it is permissible to "flee the ills we have" by suicide, is only rational on the basis that there is no personal God, and no hereafter for the soul. Periods of atheism have always been signalized by epidemics of suicide. Christianity has always proclaimed life to be a sacred trust, and the attempted escape from outward evils by self-destruction to be a crime against man, and a sin against God.

On "GOD'S RESERVES."

SADLY, morbidly, the spirit broods over the wreckage strewn upon the shore of life. It had hoped against hope, and hoped in vain; with what intensity deliverance had been longed for! But it had not come.

The disciples of our Lord had been reduced to this. They had built great hopes upon the presence of the Messiah in their midst; visions of a glorious kingdom floated before their imagination; fancy soared aloft, to gain a bird's-eye view of a realm of power, a foremost place in which they vied with each other to obtain. Ever and anon would our Lord give, on the other hand, a suggestive glimpse of the real purpose of his dwelling among them—to be "delivered into the hands of men," to suffer and to die. "Be this far from Thee, Lord!" cried Peter, in impetuous disappointment; but slowly, surely, as the days wore on, the Master's prediction was fulfilled. Gethsemane was bedewed with his tears; the judgment-hall claimed Him as its prisoner; the cross held Him as its prey.

Shocked and dismayed, the disciples, who had forsaken him and fled, gathered one by one to the scene of the final tragedy, and heard his dying words—expressing his anxiety for his mother and for his enemies; and his own unspeakable anguish, as his Father hid his face from him.

But this was not all. Had it been so, we were yet in our sins. The inspired prophet, seven centuries before, had declared that the Messiah should be "with the rich in his death." Yet here were only the poor adherents of Him who had laid aside his eternal riches, and assumed poverty for their sakes. Was prophecy to remain unfulfilled? Was the God-given promise to come to nought? Was this to be an hour of unparalleled triumph for Satan and his host? Nay. There was a rich man, whose home was in the country, in whose heart the Saviour's love had found a dwelling-place. Drawn by an irresistible impulse, he had hastened to the scene, in obedience to a command that had not reached his mortal ear. Pilate was pacing his palace, troubled by a guilty conscience and a fearsome dream, when Joseph of Arimathea, "a rich man and an honourable councillor," stood before him, and begged the body of Jesus. "And Pilate gave him leave" to take it down from the cross, and lay it reverently in his own new tomb.

A man who had not figured among our Lord's disciples, who had no seat at the Last Supper, but upon whom, perchance, the glance of the Man of Sorrows had rested, as He stood, bound and buffetted, before the council—this man God summoned from the background of his seclusion to the forefront of the crowd, to fulfil his foreordained purpose, and to rob the devil of the victory he had coveted and seemed about to win.

Joseph was one of God's reserve forces, concealed from human view until He called him forth. And by-and-by, when the stone was rolled away, and the Easter sun rode gloriously in the heavens, the disciples "were glad when they saw the Lord" again.

* * * * *

Elijah, the man of God, flushed with victory over the priests of Baal, indomitable in his resistance to the most headstrong and wicked king that Israel had ever known, lay despondent in a cave at Horeb, requesting for himself that he might die. "I, even I only, am left; and they seek my life to take it away!" (1 Kings xix. 14)

But again the reserves of God are seen—pictured to the prophet's disordered mind, as the Lord assured him of 7,000 in Israel who had not bowed the knee to Baal, nor had kissed him with their mouth. Then despondency fled, with new hopes chasing at its heels.

* * * * *

Traversing the road from Jericho to Bethel, after the Lord had taken his master from him in a chariot of fire, Elisha is met by a ribald crowd of young people, who (imbued with that spirit of enmity which dominates the human heart in all ages against God and those who serve Him) deride the new prophet with cruel mockings and unseemly jeers. What is one among so many? Elisha stands a sorry chance for safety in the midst of so turbulent a mob. But the reserves of God are nigh, and at the crucial moment "there came forth two she-bears out of the wood," and executed judgment upon the scoffing throng (2 Kings ii).

* * * * *

Once again was the life of Elisha in peril—this time when the Syrians besieged him as he dwelt in Dothan. His servant, afraid, cried out, "Alas, my master! how shall we do?" But the godly prophet knew no fear. He was "not afraid of evil tidings." His heart was "fixed, trusting in the Lord" (Psa. cxii. 7), as he answered, "Fear not; for they that be with us are more than they that be with them!" Then he prayed and said, "Lord, I pray Thee, open his eyes that he may see." And the Lord opened the eyes of the young man, and he saw; and behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha (2 King vi. 15-17). How soon, then, was the servant's despondency dispelled!

* * * * *

Concealed in the wood; scattered among mountain and valley; dwelling in the city, or in provincial seclusion—it matters not—God knows where to lay his hand upon his reserves when the time comes for them to do his bidding. To mortal eye it seems that the battle is lost to the believer, that triumph is assured to the foe. But no. Take heart, despondent child of God; though the "enemy come in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord shall put him to flight" (Isa. lix. 19, marg.); though "the blast of the terrible ones is as a storm against the wall," you shall yet find a refuge (Isa. xxv. 4). Hidden though his reserves may be, yet they are surely nigh at hand; for—

> Right is right, since God is God;
> And right the day must win.
> To doubt would be disloyalty,
> To falter would be sin.

Real and vivid though your trial may be; shattered your desires, and thwarted your plans; dark your circumstances, and hemmed in your way; deferred your hope, and sick your heart—yet will God marshal his unseen forces in battle array for your deliverance, and you shall yet praise Him, who is the health of your countenance. and your God.

Like Moses, you may be set upon the waters of adversity in a fragile bark, ill provided against the perils of the way, and with less than a day's supply in your scanty store; but rest in peace: the Divine love that placed you there provides, too, a Miriam in the rushes by the water's edge, ready at the appointed time to step forth to your relief, and to minister to your needs for many a day to come.

Remember that Jesus in Gethsemane knew there were "more than twelve legions of angels" held in reserve within his call. Pray God to open your eyes; first, to see if there be any cause in you why help delayeth its coming; then, when such cause is removed, that you may detect the relieving force advancing to aid your beleaguered soul. "Therefore will the Lord wait, that He may be gracious unto you" (Isa. xxx. 18). It may be that He has seen it well to stand aside awhile, until you have found it vain to rely upon the help of man. Then, hear the assurance, "In a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment; but with great mercies will I gather thee" (Isa. liv. 7); the mountain passes resound with the tread of God's reserves, and the armies of the aliens are put to flight.

> Judge not the Lord by feeble sense,
> But trust Him for his grace:
> Behind a frowning Providence
> He hides a smiling face.
>
> Blind unbelief is sure to err
> And scan his work in vain;
> God is his own interpreter,
> And He will make it plain.

Perhaps you are one of God's "hidden ones," secluded by affliction or by the narrowness of your allotted sphere. Do you yearn for activity, or for a wider range of influence? Do you chafe and wax impatient because you may not go forth for Him to battle? Be of good cheer, you belong none the less to the army of the Lord, though you yourself be one of his reserves. He may call you forth at any moment to be a means of encouragement to some desponding soul who, like Elijah, is weary of the conflict; or who, like his successor, is beset by harrying foes. By your prayers, by your patience, by your sympathy, by your counsel, by your submission to his holy will, you may become a vision of hope to more active ones around you; and your reward shall be no less than theirs at the Great Review. Bear faithfully your earthly cross to-day: you shall wear the Victoria Cross of Heaven by-and-by. G.

"Colonist and Native."

By Mr. F. S. ARNOT, late of Garenganze.

THE writer of the article in the Rhodesian Herald, referred to in these pages a fortnight ago, is doubtless pandering to to the taste of the more ignorant of his fellow-colonists. It is instructive to see how quickly men can forget the conditions that prevailed in the country they lived in but a few years before; for in the country we now call "Rhodesia," the natives had the government entirely in their own hand up to within fifteen years ago, and the few traders, hunters, and missionaries lived in comparative peace and safety by the goodwill of the native chiefs. To-day the white men of the same stock—according to the Rhodesian Herald—would deny to their former hosts and protectors the most elementary justice!

With the break-up of the Boer centres of government, the Native Question will come more prominently to the front in South Africa. The Boers dread above all things the extension of the franchise; and many of the colonists would be equally opposed to any proposals in that direction. To awaken strong feelings at present over the franchise question would be no benefit or blessing to the natives as a whole; certainly the plan of admitting the native to rights of equal citizenship upon his coming up to a certain educational standard has elements of great danger about it at present, for in that way a great many inflammable, ambitious young men would become eligible, to the exclusion of the older members of the native communities, who are often men of weight and wisdom. It would be better, in my humble judgment, if magistrates were empowered to give, as a mark of honour and confidence, a certain number of free citizenships in proportion to the native population.

A REFERENCE TO HISTORY.

On the other hand, if those interested in the protection of the native South African races were to encourage the study of their histories, their customs, &c., and so lead the colonist to look at things occasionally from the natives' point of view, much might be done to foster human sympathy. The lazy habits of the men (say, in Rhodesia) that the young colonists find so trying, cannot, of course, be excused, but they can certainly be accounted for by a reference to the recent history of these countries. A few years ago the men lived a soldier's life from their boyhood to old age, either raiding and campaigning hundreds of miles away, or staying at home, always with their weapons in their hands, ready to defend families and cattle at a moment's notice. The uncertain rainfall, too, all over South Africa is discouraging to field work, and has changed agricultural tribes into pastoral and nomadic peoples.

When we hear to-day of tens of thousands of Kaffirs being employed in mines, and know that they knew nothing about the craft twenty years ago, the marvel is that they should have taken to it so quickly; here no doubt the African's cupidity has done the colonists good service.

A COMMON OBJECTION REFUTED.

Many in this country are often surprised to hear the colonists denounce the "Mission Kaffir" even more heartily and emphatically than the "raw" and unsophisticated son of the African soil. That there is some ground for this general outcry against the nominal Christian Kaffir is only too true, and none are more deeply conscious of these evils than the missionaries themselves. I once met, however, a large employer of native labour on board a steamer off the Natal coast, and hearing him hold forth to the passengers on the dreadful "Mission Kaffir," I broke in on the conversation, and asked him what he did when he wanted a really reliable man to oversee or act as paymaster? By his unwillingness to reply at first, I saw that I had gained my point, and this colonial gentleman afterwards had to acknowledge before the whole company that he "usually applied to the nearest missionary for such a man," and that he "had always been able to rely on men recommended to him by missionaries."

MISSIONS AND GOVERNMENT.

This fact, no doubt, is one that the African in general has been "cute" enough to trade upon, claiming to have come from a certain mission station when seeking employment. But surely the employer of labour ought to be "cute" enough not to be taken in by such professions. Few colonists can understand what it meant for the early missionaries to settle in South Africa, and what it means to those who are patiently breaking ground in Central Africa to-day. For while in one sense "souls" are their only hire, and for these they labour, yet in other ways their work tells, and by them countries are being prepared for commerce and good government.

Referring to the work of Mr. Schindler, Dr. Fisher, and others in the far Upper Zambesi, Major Colin Hardy, C.M.G., in his Report on the Administration of Rhodesia, 1898-1900, page 104, says:—

"It is impossible to estimate the full extent of good work done by this little band of workers in the heart of Africa. The missionaries are most popular with the natives, obtaining respect and order by moral influence and example."

Is Church Attendance Declining?—II.

By Rev. J. GUINNESS ROGERS, D.D.

THAT there is not only a widespread indifference to public worship, but also a definite and, in many cases, contemptuous hostility to the Gospel and its preachers, it would be useless to deny. But in this there is nothing really surprising, still less is there anything contrary to experience. The New Testament distinctly anticipates the hostility with which its message would be met: "The carnal mind is enmity against God." "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him."

It is in perfect consistency with such a verdict that the natural man should assume an attitude of hatred and scorn. Had he more of the breadth of view which he is assumed to possess, he might recognise that his judgment is not absolutely final, that dissent from it is not a conclusive evidence of intellectual weakness or inferiority, and that before a final decision is given it would be wise to consider the facts.

We are not, it must be remembered, in the position of the Apostles, when they entered upon their great work of converting men by preaching. A preacher with the aims and message of Paul was certainly a new figure in the earth, and it might well seem the most Utopian of dreams that such a man would by such an instrument really affect the thought and conduct of the world. Take Paul as he stood and preached on Mars Hill at Athens. He was there in the very metropolis of culture. Rome did not rule the world by her legions more completely than Athens swayed the realm of thought by her schools. Their representatives were all there—Stoics and Epicureans alike—to hear this Jewish preacher. The audience was made up of precisely the same elements as we might find in a congregation which prides itself on being intellectual to-day.

There were among them men of brain, with philosophical subtlety and force, as there were others who hoped to win the same reputation by aping the style and using the catchwords of these leaders. There were the elegant triflers anxious to pose as scholars; there was a class, numerous then as now, whose one desire was to be up-to-date, who went about ever inquiring after something new—hero-worshippers, lovers of sensation, leaders of the intellectual section of society. They were there to hear Paul; but one question expressed the state of mind in which they heard him—What will this babbler say? As they began, so they ended. They were not convinced. At the end they scoffed, as at the beginning they had laughed. But neither laughter nor mockery silenced the preacher. To-day the very names of these objectors, who probably were of local importance in their time, are all forgotten; but the preacher and the message which he preached are living forces yet.

SCEPTICS—ANCIENT AND MODERN.

This is the point which makes the difference between the sceptic of those times and his successor to-day. The former could at all events plead that experience was all on his side. But that can no longer be urged. Improbable as it might have seemed at the commencement, the preaching of the Cross has been, and is, a mighty force. I heard recently of one of the modern intellectual cult quietly asserting that the pew of to-day was in advance of the pulpit. What it really meant was that preachers cling to a faith which the speaker had renounced, he himself being the representative of the pew. His assertion was a sweeping one, and for it no evidence was adduced. The impression intended to be conveyed was that the pulpit preaches doctrines which the pew holds to be exploded. Of course the underlying thought is that the pew is in the right, otherwise how could it be said to be in advance? In using such a term the speaker was betrayed into a petitio principii. If the preacher and his hearers are not in agreement, the one question is, who is on the side of the truth? But here this is quietly taken for granted.

The pulpit, however, has to learn lessons even from such suggestions as this. The preacher can only hold his own by impressing his hearers with a deep sense of his own reality as well as intelligence. A lady, speaking to a friend of mine in approval of a preacher to whom they had been listening, said that he impressed her because she felt that he meant what he said, and this was what she did not feel with all preachers. It is possible that men who turn aside from preaching which, for any reason, does not touch them—preaching of the type which Tennyson has described in the "Northern Farmer"—would never have neglected the ministry of one who had proved himself able to get at their hearts as well as their heads. Doubtless, there are some whose neglect is the fruit of a definite Agnosticism, but I believe they are in a small minority, and that any falling off in church attendance is mainly due to causes of a different kind.

THE CHURCH AND THE WORLD.

Among these, perhaps the most potent that can be named is the growing materialism of the age. I use the word because it covers so wide an area. The feverish pursuit of wealth, and the excessive value attached to its possession, the ostentation of luxury attendant upon this greed of gain, the gradual loss of simplicity of manners and life, the thirst for amusement, and especially amusement of the most sensational kind, are all covered by this general term of materialism.

Of course, it means alienation from the Church of Christ at every point. The Apostle marks out the vital distinction between the Church and the world, in the memorable sentence—"We look not at the things that are seen and temporal, but at the things that are not seen and eternal." That line of division is just as clearly marked to-day as it was twenty centuries ago. Various causes have contributed to increase the power of this world, as through the senses it influences the heart. The necessary tendency is to weaken the power of faith, and faith must ever be at the root of all vital religion.

I am very unwilling to say a word which may be used to the disadvantage of men who are earnestly endeavouring to do their duty. But I confess I doubt whether some of the methods of the pulpit in our own day, are adapted to meet the actual difficulties of the case. It must always be remembered that the great object of the preacher is not to attract crowds merely for the sake of having a large congregation. Success in such an ambition is, after all, not the great achievement which some seem to suppose. Our Lord's pointed and simple appeal to the multitudes who had gone out after John is very suggestive on this point: "What went ye out for to see?" The answer to that question determines the whole value of the movement. It was because they had gone to see a prophet and more than a prophet, that the presence of the multitude was a sign of true power. In our day, the gathering of crowds seems in certain quarters to have been developed into an art.

One of our monthly magazines recently published a curious article on the devices employed by preachers for this purpose. It was not a very edifying piece of reading. But at least it may serve as a warning against an extremely dangerous form of ambition. A man may be an idol of the crowd, and yet not an able minister of the Gospel. What a preacher should desire is to gather men for purposes which cannot be better defined than in the words of the Prayer Book—to set forth His most worthy praise, to hear His most holy Word, and to ask those things which are requisite and necessary, as well for the body as the soul. It would be infinitely better to have a small company who were intent on these spiritual aims than a great multitude thirsting for sensation.

"I charge thee in the sight of God, and of Christ Jesus, who shall judge the quick and the dead, and by his appearing and his kingdom: preach the Word; be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all long-suffering and teaching." This exhortation remains as suitable for the preacher of to-day as it was for Timothy. His great business is to proclaim to men "the glorious Gospel of the blessed God."

Samuel and Saul.

The Victory of Faith.

(1 Sam. vii. 1-14.)

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

AFTER twenty years of quiet and unobtrusive toil, Samuel had led his people to desire both to feel and manifest the old unity, which had made them one before their enemies, and there was a distinct yearning after Jehovah. The sacred writer tells us that all the house of Israel "was drawn together" after Jehovah (verse 2, R.V. margin). In being drawn to God they were drawn towards each other, as the spokes of a wheel centre in the hub. If the Lord Jesus is the centre of our heart-life, we must inevitably be drawn into fellowship with all those to whom He is severally first and best.

In verses 3 and 4 we probably have the substance of innumerable exhortations which Samuel delivered to all the house of Israel. From end to end he traversed the country, urging the people to return to Jehovah; to put away the false gods and Ashtaroth, and to direct their hearts to the God of their fathers and serve Him only. Wherever he could find a group of willing listeners, he poured forth his prayers and tears, his rugged denunciations of sin, and his fervent exhortations to a true repentance. Now he would stand upon the historic site of Jericho; then he might be found on the ancient heights of Carmel, Shiloh, Nob, or Hebron, witnessing to vast gatherings of deeply-moved and repentant people; and finally, as the result of all that he had said, there was a great turning to God. On every hand idols were cast from their pedestals, and the vicious orgies were brought to an end in the groves and valleys. It was as though the spirit of spring were breathing over some wintry waste, and through the thawing snow the grass and flowers began to appear. Oh, that Samuels by the score might be raised up to induce the Church of God to put away what grieves Him, with the assurance that when she has arrayed herself in the beautiful garments of humility and purity, God will deliver her out of the hands of the Philistines.

I. The Convocation at Mizpeh.—The movement to which we have referred at last demanded a public demonstration, and Samuel summoned all Israel to Mizpeh—which means watch-tower, and is evidently that commanding summit in Central Palestine, rising some 500 feet above the surrounding country, and nearly 3,000 above the sea level. It is remarkable that on the summit of this hill, as at Shiloh and Kirjath-jearim, there is a level platform some five or six feet high, cut out of the rock, where doubtless some kind of building was erected to receive the sacred tent.

The day was devoted to fasting, as the law enjoined on the great Day of Atonement. The people confessed their sins, afflicted their souls, and humbled themselves before Jehovah. In addition, a somewhat novel rite was introduced. Water was brought from some neighbouring well, and solemnly poured out before the Lord, as afterwards at the Feast of Tabernacles. When that great festival had nearly run its course, as it was being celebrated in the Temple, it was the custom for the priests to go forth to the Spring of Siloam, accompanied by the Levite choir, and to bring thence water in a golden vessel, which was poured out at the foot of the altar at the hour of the morning sacrifice, while all around the white-vestured choir chanted Isaiah's words, "With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation." Whether this scene in the life of Samuel was the origin of that solemn procession, it is impossible to say. Such may have been the case, though it is generally assumed that, as used in the Temple service, the pouring out of water was a memorial of the flowing of water from the smitten rock in the wilderness, the type of the pouring out of the Holy Spirit (John vii. 37-39).

The pouring forth of water may have implied that they poured forth from their full hearts floods of penitence and tears; that they desired by the heaviness of their grief to wash their land free from the accumulated evil of the past years; or that the people realized their utter helplessness, so that they were as water spilt on the ground, which could not be gathered up. But whatever it may have signified, it must have been a very striking spectacle, when Samuel, as the representative of his countrymen, brought the whole nation back to true loyal allegiance to the God of their fathers. It was a worthy act for his manhood's prime, and we are not surprised to learn that, as by a sudden outburst of acclamation, he was appointed judge (verse 6).

Oh, who shall induce the professing Church of God to put away the evil things by which her testimony is now impaired! Sometimes in buildings connected with the Church we hear of fancy-fairs, raffles, full-dress soirées, dances, theatricals, comic concerts, and many other such like things, which indicate the corruption of the spiritual life as certainly as an army of fungi indicate the damp and unwholesome atmosphere in which they thrive. What would not be the blessed result if the children of God would come to another Mizpeh and confess, as Israel did, "We have sinned against the Lord!"

II. The Victory of Faith.—The tidings of this great convocation reached the Philistines, who looked upon it as an unmistakable sign of the returning spirit of national life, and "the lords of the Philistines went up against Israel" (verse 7). From every part the contingents of the great army were assembled, and there was every reason to fear that the terrible experiences of Aphek would be renewed. How could the national life, which was just reviving, after the discouragement and anarchy of years, withstand the onset of these bitter foes? "Cease not to cry unto the Lord our God for us," the people said, "that He will save us out of the hand of the Philistines."

Ah, soul! this is the only hope for thee. Thou hast been ground down beneath tyrant sins, which have held thee in subjection as the Philistines did Israel; thou hast groaned in the prison-house like another Samson shorn of his locks. There seems no help or hope of deliverance, because thy moral life is impaired by the permission of evils analogous to those which infected the Hebrew nation in the days of the Judges. Only put these away, and stand clear of them; in the name of God pour out all your self-confidence before the Cross where Jesus died, receive the forgiveness which is never withheld from the penitent and believing soul; and then, however many be the obstacles, temptations, and sins that beset thee, know that the Lord will save thee out of the hand of thine enemies.

The power of Samuel's prayers was already known throughout the land, like those of John Knox in the days of Queen Mary. The people had come to believe in them; they felt them to be the palladium of their liberties. If only Samuel would pray, they might count on deliverance. They knew that he had prayed; that he would not cease they now entreated.

But Samuel did more than pray. He took a sucking lamb and offered it as a whole burnt offering to the Lord, symbolizing thus the desire of Israel to be wholly yielded to the Divine will. There must be consecration before there can be faith and deliverance. It is not enough simply to put away sin; we must also give ourselves absolutely and entirely to God. There must be the wholeness in the offering, the yielding ourselves—spirit, soul, and body—to be whatever God would have us be. Failure in the walk always denotes failure in the heart-life. If you are perpetually overcome by the Philistines, be sure that there is a flaw in your inner consecration.

While the smoke of this offering was rising in the calm air, and the eyes of tens of thousands were fixed upon the figure of Samuel, who, as a prophet of the Lord, was within his rights in superseding the Levitical priests in this solemn function, and while his piercing cries for help were striking upon the ear, the Philistines drew near to battle against Israel. Can you not see them creeping up the mountain slopes, and encircling the defenceless crowd which had no might nor power to resist? But suddenly the voice of God answered the voice of the Prophet. "The Lord thundered with a great thunder (Hebrew, voice) on that day upon the Philistines, and discomfited them." The sky was suddenly black with tempest, peal after peal broke forth, the heart of the foe was stricken with terror, and though Israel drew never a sword, the heathen turned in dismay to flee. Then at a signal from Samuel, the men of Israel flung themselves upon the flying foe. Down the steep they fled, catching up the arms which were cast away in flight, and stripping the dead of their weapons. Josephus tells of another circumstance that added to the horrors of that irresistible onslaught. "God destroyed their ranks with an earthquake; the ground trembled under their feet, so that there was no place whereon to stand in safety. They either fell helpless to the earth, or into some of the chasms that opened beneath them."

The pursuit only stayed when the Philistines came beneath the shadow of their own fortress of Bethcar, the Well of the Vineyards as it is now called.

This is the great message of the whole story for us. If only the Church of God would put away the evils that grieve his Holy Spirit, if only we would ourselves come out and be separate, not touching the unclean thing, and cleansing ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh, the Spirit would interpose for us too. The Lord would deliver us, fighting on our behalf against our foes, so that we should have to do nothing but take the spoil.

III. The Stone of Help.—"Then Samuel took a stone, and set it between Mizpeh and Shen, and called it the Ebenezer (the stone of help) saying, Hitherto hath the Lord helped us." This was the same spot upon which Israel had suffered the great defeat which led to the capture of the Ark (iv. 1). How wonderful this was, that the story of the victory should be told upon the plain which had been the scene of defeat! Does not this carry sweet encouragement? Is it not true that when we turn to God, the disgrace of our failure is blotted out in the glory of our deliverance, so that we talk no more of our sins and their fatal consequences, but only of God and his almighty succour? Yes, child of God, be sure that the place of defeat may become that of victory, sublime and glorious. Think how, in the generations that succeeded, fathers brought their children to look at that great stone, and read the inscription, "Hitherto hath the Lord helped us," arguing from it that what He had done He would do; that the forgiveness and grace which He had shown upon that site would be renewed and repeated in all after years.

From that moment Samuel's supremacy in the country was established. The Philistines came no more during his judgeship within the border of Israel. The hand of the Lord was against the Philistines all his days. The alienated cities which the Philistines had taken from Israel were restored to Israel, from Ekron even unto Gath. The very Amorites, who had taken part with the Canaanites, found it to their advantage to side with Samuel, and abstain from hostilities (verse 14). As Dean Spence, in "Ellicott's Commentary," says: "This success at Ebenezer was no mere solitary victory, but was the sign of a new spirit in Israel, which animated the nation during the lifetime of Samuel, and the reigns of David and Solomon and the great Hebrew kings. The petty jealousies had disappeared, and had given place to a great national desire for unity. The old idol worship of Canaan, which degraded every nationality which practised it, was in a great measure swept away from among the chosen people, while the pure religion of the Lord of Hosts was established, not only through the care and guardianship of the tribe of Levi, but by the new order of the Prophets."

What cannot prayer do? It can not only open and close heaven, but will give the soul that prays an undisputed supremacy over his times, so that men will acknowledge that the saviour of the city is not so much the politician, the man of intellect, or the man of affairs, but he who has learned how to walk with God, and by his character and intercession to be the palladium of the national liberties and existence.

Other Lands.

The Needs of Egypt.

By Mr. C. T. HOOPER, North Africa Mission, Shebin-el-Kom.

HAPPILY we have not to pray God to open Egypt to the entrance of the Gospel—He has answered that prayer long ago. Neither have we to pray Him to open the towns and the villages, they are open to the messenger and the message. The people are willing to hear. We have thus a wondrous field of service. Our mission-station at Shebin-el-Kom is situated in the apex of the Nile, in the very heart of the population. Here we have rooms where men visit us, and a welcome is given to all who come. We have also a Bible depôt, where completed copies or portions of the Scriptures can be purchased, as well as tracts, &c. Services are held in Arabic for all who wish to attend. Day visits are made to the villages around as opportunity affords. Occasional itinerating journeys are taken which extend over three weeks or a month.

WHAT MIGHT BE DONE.

I. We need colporteurs to go through the towns and villages selling the Scriptures and tracts. For this we should require £3 per month for each man, including his travelling expenses.

II. We want to arrange weekly meetings for the preaching of the Gospel in the many villages around. This would cost 10s. per month for each village occupied for rent of building, in which the meeting would be held.

III. We want to organize a regular system of itinerating with the Gospel. Two missionaries can travel for a month for £5 each. We usually go in twos.

IV. We should much like to print, in Arabic, tracts and leaflets, such as "Safety, Certainty, and Enjoyment." The cost of printing here is much the same as in England.

V. We have been asked to open schools for boys and girls, and are anxious to do so. These schools would be of untold good, as the truth of the Scriptures would be taught, and a direct Christian influence exerted upon the children. It would, however, necessitate an initial expense of £50 each for the first year, as the schools must be separate, and about half that amount for the second year. After a time they would become self-supporting.

VI. We greatly need a native Bible-woman to visit amongst the Egyptian women in their homes, otherwise thousands of these, on account of their seclusion, will never hear the message of God's love. The cost of this department would be £25 per annum.

How Rome Writes History.

IN a book approved by the Hungarian Ministry of Education, and entitled, "First Instructor in Hungarian History: for the Use of Public Schools," the following account is given of the rise of Protestantism:—

In the reign of Louis II. it happened that Martin Luther founded a new faith in Germany. At the same time new creeds were proclaimed in Switzerland by Ulrich Zwingli, and later by John Calvin. The whole of Europe was soon seized by a faith-fever (Glaubensfieber). The new or Protestant faith also spread in Hungary, where, after the defeat of the Mohacs, sad times reigned. In that battle (fought against the Turks on August 29, 1526) seven bishops lost their lives. The villages which came under Turkish rule remained without clergy (priests). In their misery the poor people could only seek comfort in faith. They, therefore, gladly listened to anybody who would speak to them of God and eternity, neither knowing nor asking what creed the speaker confessed. At the commencement, the new faith did not differ much from that proclaimed by the holy Mother Church, the rites of which it conserved at first. Its adherents, therefore, could not know that they had changed their faith. If once it nestles in the souls of men, it is difficult to uproot.

A Strange Request.

COMING out of one of our meetings recently, I was accosted by a man who, with much feeling, asked:—

"You remember Teresa?"

"Yes, perfectly," I said, "and was very sorry to hear of her death."

"Precisely so," he added, "and this is why I have come to see you; she was my wife, and I want you to give me a certificate of my wife's salvation!" I suggested that possibly he meant one of death, in which case he had come to the wrong place; but, no, he was not to be put off, his longing desire was to know that she was safe. Needless to say, the opportunity was improved for telling him a little of the true security to be found alone in Christ, of whom he, with so many others, alas! in this so-called Christian country, knows so little.

But does not this simple incident reveal what is deeply rooted in the heart of man, the desire to know, to be sure? This is what Rome, with her wiles, has so determinately sought to extinguish by declaring that none can know, and that any daring to say they are saved are accursed.

The woman referred to is typical of many who have come to the chapel, and received blessing without doubt, and yet have not been numbered among the members of a Church; but we look forward to meet Teresa in the Lord's presence in that home where none of the redeemed shall be missing.

Such instances as this reveal, too, a great need, long felt by us, and which I would mention, hoping it may awaken interest; I allude to the services of a Bible-woman who, more easily than a man, could penetrate into the homes of the people and deal specially with the women. Our large day-schools, containing nearly 400 children, that have been carried on for many years in this district of Chamberi, afford almost unlimited opportunity for effecting this, and the conversions to God in past years are a standing testimony to their value, as one means to this great end.

The sum of £60 a year would be sufficient to meet this want, and were any led to help, I may add that a suitable labourer is at hand, one who for twenty-seven years has been a devoted teacher, and who, by her age and experience and practical knowledge of the Scriptures, is well adapted to the work. Sailors' Home, Buenos Ayres.

FIVE missionaries have gone from the Gospel Hall, Wood Green, N.: three to China (C.I.M.), and two to South America. The latter, Mr. and Mrs. Fellows, have been appointed to superintend the Sailors' Home and Mission at Buenos Ayres. I am much interested in them and their work, and shall be thankful that both are upheld by prayer and contributions. R. C. M.

It may be remembered that, in 1897, the British community agreed to build a Home on land obtained from the Argentine Government. In 1900, the committee, having added to their funds, were enabled to go on with the building, in the hope of opening the Home free of debt. Meanwhile the furnishing of the Home has to be provided for, including also electric lighting, and considerable expenditure not provided by the Building Committee; altogether about £1,500 will be required.

The Home has an open door for all nationalities, but specially meets the needs of the seamen of Great Britain, the United States, the nations of Northern Europe, and the Argentine Republic. As an indication of the noble work which is being done by the Home, it may be mentioned that since it was opened up to June of last year there had been 6,838 boarders who had paid their way. The missionary of the Home has visited some 7,838 ships, and at the religious services there have been present more than 25,000 men.

The treasurer is Mr. Alfred T. Drysdale, 465, Calle Cangallo, Buenos Ayres.

Disturbances in China.—As we go to press, telegrams from China announce the burning, by an anti-Christian mob, of the Berlin Missionary Society's premises at Faiyuen, Kwang-tung—Rev. Mr. Bahr having, however, arrived safely at Canton, with his wife and child. The perpetrators had professed a connection between the outrage and the followers of the French Catholic Missions, but this was believed to be merely a subterfuge.

A Castaway Bible.

IN a recent letter Mr. J. D. McEwen, pioneer worker in Brazil, relates some interesting incidents of the work of Christ in South America. He says:—

"Some years ago a Bible was given to a man who, after reading it for awhile, returned to his idols, and gave the Bible to another man. Some months ago, the first owner of the Bible tried to cross a river, but, being under the influence of drink, was drowned. This sad event awakened the second owner of the Bible, who had read it from beginning to end, but was now aroused to think more seriously of his need of life made sure for eternity.

"This man invited me to his house, where I found a family of twelve children, the husband and wife and a coloured servant. They were all ready to hear the Gospel, and now for the first time they had the opportunity. I preached from John xiv. 6: 'I am the Way'—the open way, the narrow way, the free way, the only way, the glad way, and the way home. Later, the man made up his mind to confess Christ, and return his idols to the priest; yielding to my advice, however, he broke them to pieces in the woods. He and the whole family have since given evidence of a changed life.

"They have given up dancing and carousals, have invited their neighbours to come and hear the Word, have won a brother and mother living near, and sent packets of tracts and Gospels some forty miles in the woods to relatives, who, in turn have sent word that they would like to have a visit from the missionary. One member of the little flock has taught her husband to read the Bible, he being forty-seven years old. He is growing in earnestness, and has shown himself strong to work with his neighbours and yet stand aloof from their gross ways."

There is eagerness for elementary education; the people want to read, and when they are able to do so, the visits of the colporteur will be more fruitful of results. Mr. McEwen's plans are along the lines of providing teachers and disseminating Gospel literature.

Zambesi Industrial Mission.

REPORTS from the Zambesi indicate that there is just at present much sickness among the natives of British Central Africa, and the energies of the missionaries are being directed for the relief of the suffering.

Mr. Galloway from Ntonda writes: "Smallpox is rampant in this district. There have been six deaths, but little has been done upon the part of the natives to stamp it out. They are most indifferent and careless. There is no attempt at isolating the affected ones, and it is only after much difficulty one gets to know about them. The fear of having their houses burned over their heads leads them to lie outrageously and conceal the fact as much as they possibly can. Some of the schools have been closed, but may shortly be reopened. The frequent deaths among the people do not have the sobering and chastening effect one would anticipate, but rather the opposite."

Mr. Miller, from Mitsidi, by same mail, reports that "smallpox is very prevalent over the whole country, especially in Angoniland. The Government practically does nothing, and one cannot wonder at the disease taking so great a hold of the country."

The Zambesi Industrial Mission has two hospitals, one at Mitsidi and one at Chiolo. Last year 10,000 attendances were recorded at Chiolo. Two additional nurses are badly needed just now, and £300 is required for their passage, outfit, and support. Last season's crop of coffee not being so good, only such workers as home funds can supply can be sent out. Prayer is asked that this sickness all over the district of B.C.A. may prove a means of spiritual blessing, and that the loving ministrations of the missionaries may become the touch of God's Spirit to quicken dead souls into life. The address of the Zambesi Industrial Mission is 6, Colonial Avenue, Minories, E.C.; secretary, Mr. Robert Caldwell.

The Y.M.C.A. in Germany.

THE Young Men's Christian Association, Berlin, recently celebrated its nineteenth anniversary, by a bright and interesting meeting. There was a very large and representative gathering of members, their relatives, and friends of the Association, in the spacious assembly hall of the Association's buildings at 34, Wilhelm Strasse.

Herr von Rothkirch mentioned special events connected with the Association, while Herr Kaufmann Pielstick described the working of the boys' and youths' divisions, as well as that of the Sunday-school; and Herr Hofkammer-assessor Eismauer that of the other divisions. The general secretary gave a description of "a day's work in the house" of the Association. Herr Pastor Berlin followed with a description of the work and organization of the East German Young Men's Christian Association, mentioning that there now exist 350 Associations, with 20,000 members, throughout Germany.

The meeting closed by the entire assembly singing "Nun danket alle Gott," and a short address—followed by prayer—by Count A. Bernstorff, the president, who spoke of the development and satisfactory extension of the work during the past year. Both he and Countess Bernstorff, who was also present, and received the friends of the Association at tea in the reading-room, take a very keen and active interest in the work of the Association, and it is mainly owing to their ceaseless and untiring efforts, seconded by the very able and energetic vice-president, Herr von Rothkirch, that such good progress has been made.

Progress in Brazil.

IN a recent letter, Mr. Reginald Young describes the missionary operations under his care in Brazil. He says: "We have concluded our first twelve months' labour in Sao Paulo, Santos, and Rio Janeiro. Our records show that we have paid over 21,000 house to house visits, distributed more than 26,000 tracts, and sold 784 Bibles, 145 Testaments, and 1,759 Gospels. Of the thirty-seven persons who professed conversion, thirty-two have been baptized, and these, with only three or four exceptions, have shown the reality of their faith by lives of obedience. The converts have helped very materially in the visitation work.

"My wife and I, with Messrs. Glass and Shiflersmith, commenced the work a year ago, and our numbers are now doubled. We have two meeting-rooms in this city, and have already had much fruit from a recently opened hall, where we have splendid audiences and the very best of order and respect.

"We have had a work in Santos, with a meeting-room, for about three months, and many are impressed. We find it easy to make proselytes from Romanism to Protestantism; but it is another matter to get the people converted from sin to righteousness, and from the power of Satan unto God; but this last is what we aim at continually.

"By licence from the Chief of Police, we have commenced street meetings, carrying our little organ to the front of the Public Gardens, and attracting large audiences. Of course, we are aware that we cannot thus preach the Gospel to a thousand people, under the shadow of the Romish seminary, without suffering persecution, but we purpose to push ahead. A third meeting room has now been hired to which to invite people after the open-air meetings.

"Out of voluntary offerings, and the receipts from the sale of books, our little band has been supported, and we have also done considerable tract-printing, in addition to meeting the rent and other expenses of the meeting rooms. It is a most expensive country, but we practise great economy. It is hoped to see the Sao Paulo work independent before the close of 1902, so that help from abroad may be used for extension."

Mr. Young's address is Rua da Liberdada 62, Sao Paulo, S.P., Brazil.

Notes from India.

By Rev. HENRY MONTGOMERY Belfast.

AN INTERESTING CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOUR SOCIETY.

A SHORT time ago a small party of us paid a visit to a Junior Endeavour Society connected with Rev. Edward Hume's Mission in Bombay. It consists of over 300 orphan boys. The meeting was in full swing when we arrived, and was conducted by a bright, well-trained boy of about thirteen years of age.

One committee reported regarding teaching the younger lads their Scripture lesson, and in order to show how they had done their work, the convener called on the juniors to repeat the verses. Eighty or ninety did so in concert, and evidently had them correctly committed.

The bathing committee told of over 140 boys having been washed and bathed by them during the week. Another report dealt with the cleaning and cutting of toe-nails, the finger-nails coming in also for attention, it is presumed, alternately with the toe-nails! Another told of visiting and reading to the sick boys, suffering chiefly from eye complaints and malaria. Mr. and Mrs. Hume are carrying on a most promising work in Bombay. They are connected with the American Board of the Congregational Church. Mrs. Hume has an orphanage of well-trained girls who sing sweetly and do beautiful embroidery work.

THE ORPHAN CHILDREN OF GUJARAT.

We have visited a large number of orphanages where the famine children are housed. Most of them who are alive at all, have got over that awful visitation, but there are still a few pinched and sad-looking, who bear traces of the hardships of that terrible time. At Surat, Borsad, Anand, Ahmadabad, Parantij and Broach there are hundreds of promising bairns being well fed and carefully trained. The Irish Presbyterian Church is working at all these stations, as well as in the Province of Kathiawar. It has made itself responsible for the support and education of about 1,600 of them. Rev. J. S. Stevenson, B.D., Parantij, Gujarat, son of the late devoted Rev. W. Fleming Stevenson, D.D., is the hon. sec. of the Orphan Committee, and is working on their behalf with untiring devotion. He will be glad to hear from any wishing to invest in this most hopeful work.

THE FAMINE AMONG THE BHEELS.

The famine shadows fell darkest upon the poor Bheels of Gujarat. In some parts far over 30 per cent. of the population was cut off. Indeed the shadows of that awful time have not yet gone from a recent visit to Jhalod, which is in the jungle, and over twenty miles from a railway station. A deputation waited upon the missionary, Mr. G. W. Blair, and said that they were on the point of starvation. It was a touching sight to see these fine-looking men, with their blankets flung over their shoulders, appealing for work to keep them alive. We promised to help them as far as we could, and now I hear that Mr. Blair has started relief works. Any funds entrusted to him will be wisely expended. His address is Jhalod, Pauch Mahals, India. The readers of The Christian have already helped the suffering Bheels. We visited one of their villages, and along with Rev. R. Boyd Anand spoke to them of the great salvation. They are poor beyond the power of words to tell it; but, like other aboriginals, their attitude to the Gospel is most friendly, and a number of them are, it is believed, sincere believers in the Saviour.

Romish Credulity.—Readers are accustomed to meet with narratives of alleged Romanist miracles at Naples and elsewhere, but it is somewhat surprising to find the (Roman) Catholic Times notifying that at Bergholt Monastery, Sussex, on the 3rd of each February "the feast of St. Blaise" water is blessed, "and then distributed for use as of special efficacy in throat affections."

British Columbia.—The friend who has sent The Christian to Rev. F. Palgrave on the Stickine River is informed that Mr. Palgrave has retired from the mission, and therefore is not now receiving the paper.

Doors Open as Never Before.

IN an interesting letter, the wife of Mr. Robert John Davidson, one of the Society of Friends missionaries of Chungking, Sz'chuen, West China, writes in December, 1901:—"We are now living in such times as we never had in China before. Years ago the people would crowd round us out of sheer curiosity; now they crowd around to ask about the doctrine, to be taught the truth, and to ask to have their names entered as inquirers. In the past we have had to give the people catechisms and Testaments and hymn-books; now they come to buy these, read them, and, moreover, know what they have been reading about. And such visitors come, not by twos or threes, nor by tens, but by scores and hundreds. Other missions in the Province have a similar experience; and we do not know whereunto this thing may grow. There may be breakers ahead; but at the present time we have such open doors for preaching the Gospel as we never had before."

Christian Endeavour in Syria.

THE work of Miss Procter and her colleagues in the schools at Schwifat, near Beyrout, progresses well. The following quotation will show that the work is deeply rooted:—"My heart rejoices most when I see one after another consecrating themselves to Christ and rejoicing in Him as their Saviour. Shortly after our school year began, a Christian friend visited us, and spoke of the Christian Endeavour Movement, and the result was the formation of a branch in the girls' school. He spoke to them of the solemnity of the promise to be made, and warned them not to undertake it lightly. After prayer, fourteen came forward as members. They have their weekly meeting, which they conduct entirely themselves; they have their consecration Sunday once a month; they use their leisure hours in making useful and fancy articles; by the sale of these they form a charity fund, out of which they are helping to support a famine orphan in India, besides other good works."

Conference in Rhodesia.

BISHOP HARTZELL arrived in New Umtali, also Dr. Richards and wife from Inhambane, November 13. On Friday the workers arrived from our mission station at Old Umtali, making a party of eighteen, including two native workers.

On Friday night a reception was given, to which all the people of Umtali had been invited, and about 200 were present. On Saturday morning a conference was opened in the drawing-room of the parsonage at New Umtali; and after an initiative session adjourned, to be resumed the following week at Old Umtali. Sunday was a great day. At nine o'clock was the conference lovefeast, after which Dr. Richards preached; and at the close the Lord's Supper was administered by the Bishop.

In the afternoon the Bishop dedicated the new native church, the first Methodist Episcopal church for natives in Rhodesia; and great was their pleasure when the Bishop spoke to them through the interpreter and told them that this church was built for them; and when they were asked to contribute to its support, they responded to the amount of £10. Dr. Hartzell preached in the evening to the white people from "Be not of doubtful mind."

On Monday the missionaries from Old Umtali returned in an ox-waggon. Later in the day, the Bishop followed on a donkey; and the next day the writer was carried in a macheela (or hammock).

Conference was resumed on Wednesday morning, when the native question was discussed. We have to face many difficult problems, of which those in the home-land have very little idea.

The Outlook in Asia.*

By Mr. JOHN R. MOTT.

ASIA is the great theatre of the twentieth century. That continent will probably witness the greatest movements, and it may be questioned whether any other continent has seen such things as we shall find unfold there. The three great nations where we shall witness the greatest triumphs of Christianity in our own generation are India, China, and Japan. As I went up and down in India—the wonderful country from which we have just come—I felt the great importance of that vast continent, with one-fifth of the human race, and practically one-fifth of the unevangelized world, with its many lines of cleavage—the most complex problem which confronts the Church of Christ. With its many forces at work, it is a great battlefield in itself. The situation is intense. There is a crisis at present, and the immediate future is going to witness a great forward or backward movement.

China has impressed me more than any other nation I have ever visited. There are numbers, but it is not so much because of that or of the great combination of difficulties. What impressed me most was the strength of the Chinese race—combining the characteristics of all the great nations of the world — patience, thriftiness, tenacity, vigour, independence, and conservatism. The Chinese possess these in a wonderful degree. That is not the China of the war with Japan or of the war with the European nations, which was the official China. The hope of the country is in the chain of modern colleges, founded by missionaries or in a few cases at their suggestion, in which are being trained the literati of the new China. Whether that be a dismembered China or a series of protectorates, what is the leadership of it to be? It must be a Christian leadership.

Japan is the most brilliant nation on the face of the earth. It moves with lightning-like rapidity. The nation has been going to school to the world, learning her lessons with facility, and then dismissing her teachers—learning the good of the new, and holding fast that which is good in the old. I have been stimulated and deeply moved by coming into contact with that race. Yet the Japanese are a race in peril, because they have not got at the real root of the matter.

There is a crisis in each of these nations, but that in Japan is more impending. In India, unless we pour in forces immediately, we are going to delay the whole movement. China is an open door. The key to each situation is the reaching of the young men. In Japan the nation is "run" by young men. Manifestly the China of the future will be led by the young men in the colleges. The key in India is in the cities and the universities. As go the cities and the universities, so will go the nations.

On my tour I went to centres where forces were united, and other evidence given that the time was at hand for a work for God. Among other features that impressed me were:—

(1) The remarkable attendances. I do not remember a time in China where the halls were not overflowing, and only one case in India. Time after time in Japan we had to open all doors and windows, to let as many men stand outside as could hear the voice. In Bombay, at the first meeting of students, more than a hundred men had to be turned away.

(2) The close attention. Everything in Japan was done through interpreters. After the first meeting there would be an after meeting, and men would sit for three hours with the process of interpretation going on. Nothing but the uplifting power of Jesus Christ would have held men for such a time. The same was true in China. In India there would come a hush as from heaven, and as Christ was being held up the men would sit listening breathlessly.

(3) The Spirit of the Living God was working. I am not saying these things with a personal reference. I have been asked to speak frankly about what I have seen. The Spirit of God was working with piercing, convincing power. I have never in the West had greater evidence that the Spirit of God was convicting men. When we remember how the movement was being prayed about, we had a right to expect that men would be led to take the step which means most in the doing. Hearts were being melted, lives were being changed, and minds closing in on this wonderful Christ.

(4) The results. I would have preferred not to talk of this for another six months. Where fourteen hundred young men decided for Christ in Japan in two weeks, the testimony is that nearly all will go forward to baptism. From other places the same holds good, and the testimony is that the great majority will be held for the Church. At one place the converts had themselves within two weeks led two hundred other young men to decide for Christ.

In China, thirty men who decided at a meeting in Shanghai, included the president of a college and three silk merchants, and twenty-seven of the company have stood fast. From Hong Kong and Canton we have similar tidings.

MR. JOHN R. MOTT.

I will give no figures from India until some more time has passed. We had long, unhurried meetings of Christian teachers, native and foreign, and these were most satisfactory. Careful plans were then laid to have each convert "shadowed"—watched, that is to say—not only when he is in a meeting, but in his hours of temptation, and instructed so that he may press forward to baptism. Special literature was arranged for, and I am still sending out books, as well as having others translated. Happily, throughout India we could use the English language, and the burden of conserving the results was laid upon committees of missionaries.

The impulse under which men decided was the impulse of the Holy Ghost. I have no doubt that the Spirit of God did this work, and I know there had been careful preparation.

(1) There had been an immense amount of seed sowing. My work was at the centres where there had been the greatest amount of Christian effort. The people had heard enough of the truth to be pressed to conclusive thinking.

(2) We laid down a few simple conditions under which we would accept an invitation. (a) That all forces should unite for a combined effort; (b) that adequate money should be available to secure the best halls and abundant printed matter; (c) that there should be continuous prayer. These were complied with.

(3) We were upheld by world-wide intercession. This tour was being remembered in thirty-three different countries, by men and women of faith. These did not sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for us.

(4) The law of self-sacrifice was at work. From the day on which Christ taught that "except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die it abideth alone," He has not ceased to observe this law. I refer to the missionaries and native workers who had been facing opposition and obloquy for years, and persevering in the work not as unto men but as unto God.

I want to bear testimony to God's great goodness, and to witness that he is a living God. He has called our Y.M.C.A.'s to a high and holy mission. This work has already been a blessing to the world. First evangelize the young men, and then make them an evangelizing force, for if these nations are going to be evangelized it is going to be by the sons and daughters of the soil. See that this present generation does not perish from the earth without the young men knowing that Jesus Christ died and rose again; and that He is a living Christ.

The following extracts from a report by Mr. Mott on his work in Japan will give a more adequate impression of of the spiritual movement now in progress:—

"One object of my visit to Japan was to hold a National Conference of the Young Men's Christian Associations throughout that Empire. This gathering was held at Tokyo during the first week of October, and lasted four days. We limited the number of delegates strictly to 100 Japanese and twenty-five foreigners. It proved to be the most representative and influential gathering of Japanese Christian leaders ever held. All parts of the Empire were represented. There were in attendance presidents and professors of all the Christian colleges, officers and leaders of three-fourths of the Associations of the country, leading pastors and Christian laymen from the large cities, and a group of missionaries selected with reference to their special influence with young men. Col. Buck, the United States Minister to Japan, and the Hon. K. Kataoka, speaker of the House of Representatives of the Imperial Diet, attended some of the sessions, and made speeches in commendation of the movement. Distinguished Japanese presided at all sessions, and directed the work of all the committees.

"I began first at Sendai, the largest student centre in North Japan, where within three days 142 young men were led to decide to become disciples of Jesus Christ. In Tokyo, the greatest student centre of the Far East, during three days 453 young men made the same decision. In connection with the work in Tokyo, I was invited to deliver an address upon 'The Influence of Christianity among Students throughout the World,' in one of the lecture halls of the Imperial University. This is the first time that the doors of this highest educational institution of Japan have been opened for such a purpose. Next I went to Kyoto, the head centre of Buddhism in Japan. It is said that there are no less than 10,000 Buddhist priests in the city. During the meetings 173 young men decided to become Christians; at Osaka (the commercial metropolis of the country, a city of nearly one million inhabitants), 275; at Okayama, 209; at Kumamoto, which is considered to be the most conservative student city in Japan, 211."

The Late Mrs. Robertson.

ASSOCIATION FOR THE FREE DISTRIBUTION OF THE SCRIPTURES.

A LIFE rich towards God makes the world poorer when lifted to a higher world, but still it leaves behind a heritage of blessing. My friend Mrs. Robertson was indeed rich according to heaven's standard. I first knew her in 1869, when, as the wife of Mr. James Hilton Hulme, she resided at Hulme Cliff House, about five miles from Bakewell. To the grace of Christ she added then the graciousness of a most perfect lady. Actuated by much more than a merely humanitarian zeal, with a strong instinct to win the souls of the villagers around her to God, she was accustomed to visit much among the poor, and not without considerable spiritual results. After her first husband died, she more than carried out his desire that the house which he left absolutely to her should be dedicated to the work of Christ. She wished to see the fulfilment of his wish in her own lifetime. Consequently, having paid off a very considerable mortgage which existed on the property, she, very shortly after Mr. Hulme's death, handed the whole over to trustees, "to see established and carried on there an institution for the training of preachers, teachers, missionaries, or missionary workers in any department, whether at home or abroad, of Christian service or philanthropy." It was thus that Hulme Cliff House became Hulme Cliff College, the country branch of Harley House—the London centre of the "Regions Beyond Missionary Union." It was under the direction of Dr. and Mrs. Grattan Guinness, and by their aid, that the great transformation took place, and an immense addition was made to the house. Greatly did Mrs. Hulme rejoice that she had commenced an institution which, in its ultimate development, has been the means of helping to fit hundreds of men for the foreign mission field.

In 1872, she went for a winter to Italy, and there conceived the idea of the "Association for the Free Distribution of the Scriptures." At Spezia, Genoa, and Milan, Gospels were obtained from the Bible Society depots, and given to wayfarers who would accept them. At this early stage, the late Mr. Samuel Morley was a liberal supporter of the work. "It was not all sunshine, however," wrote Mrs. Robertson long afterwards; "sometimes a Gospel was torn up before our eyes, or returned to us with an angry scowl. On one occasion a gentleman, to whom one had been given, came back and followed us, watching us in a most defiant and threatening manner, till we were driven to escape his attention by hailing an empty carriage. Even then he drew near to listen to the order given; but, not daring to mention our hotel, we merely told the driver to take us to the Colosseum." So strongly was it impressed upon her mind that multitudes who need the Bible most actually desire it least, and are not willing to pay even a few pence for it, that she never rested until she was able to form a society whose object might be the gratuitous dissemination of the Word of God. Thus many thousands of copies and portions have been placed in the hands of those who might never have purchased them.

In 1873, Mrs. Hulme married Rev. David Robertson, of Peterborough. Messrs. Moody and Sankey's missions in 1874-5 in various parts of England gave her great and continued opportunities of doing additional service in the cause of Christ. With her husband, she followed the work of the evangelists, from place to place, and she was indefatigable in the inquiry-rooms.

When about to leave for another tour in Italy, the circumstances of the former trip were narrated to Mr. Hawke, of the Crystal Palace Bible Stand, who supplied a large number of Gospels in French and Italian to facilitate the resumption of the distribution. The same pleasant experiences awaited the workers. At Florence, a gentleman whom they met in a railway carriage offered a twenty-franc gold piece to help. At Rome many were ready to accept. The custodian at Pompeii was not only grateful, but asked for four more New Testaments to give to his brothers. At the Naples Museum the custodian was delighted at receiving a copy, having tried unsuccessfully to obtain one in three other quarters.

The need for similar distribution at home was clearly brought home by Mr. Moody's meetings; but when a friend said pointedly,

THE LATE MRS. ROBERTSON.

From Photograph by Mr. Cromack, 80, Newborough, Scarborough,

"Mrs. Robertson, that is your work!" she felt crushed by the responsibility. "But one night," she wrote, "I awoke, oppressed with the thought of the many thousands who would so gladly read the words of life if put into their hands, but who were passing out of time into eternity without ever hearing the message of a Saviour's love. Tears would spring at this sad thought; and then, as from a voice, came the words, 'That is your work.' Wondering and amazed, I replied, 'Lord, if that is so, do as Thou wilt! I am willing to do anything;' and immediately came a great calm of spirit and I slept again."

A few friends who were written to responded liberally, and a letter inserted in The Christian elicited responses from a number of workers in different lands who were willing to undertake the distribution. All the necessary correspondence and book-keeping were gladly carried on by voluntary helpers, while printing, postage, and other inevitable expenses were privately defrayed, so that all contributions could go for Scriptures. Among other well-known workers, Dr. Baedeker has been supplied with Testaments for distribution in the prisons and mines of Russia and Siberia.

In 1880, Mr. and Mrs. Robertson removed to Hampstead, in order to make a home for their nephew, Dr. Horton, on his acceptance of the pastorate of Lyndhurst Road church. About six years later, the subject of our sketch lost her second husband, after long and slow decay from paralysis. From that time she began to lose her sight, and finally had to pass over the whole work of the "Association for the Free Distribution of the Scriptures" to Mrs. Pridham. Friends will note, therefore, that the work is still being carried on upon precisely similar lines.

One great outstanding feature of her life was her zeal to bring men to God. This triumphed over the infirmities of old age and the limitations of blindness. On Sunday mornings she was accustomed to meet the crowds coming to the Heath, hand her little books to people whom she could hardly see, and speak to them on the things of God, seldom receiving a word of rebuke or discouragement. During the last few years of her life it was my privilege to meet her each summer at Hulme Cliff College. She seemed to dwell in an atmosphere of perfect peace, which nothing could ruffle; and when, through physical feebleness, the active virtues were necessarily less in evidence in her life, the passive graces shone out as bright as ever. Affection, sympathy, delicate thoughtfulness for others, and appreciation of the smallest kindness, abounded in her character.

How dear to her was communion with God. She was always ready to pray, and with what intense fervour would she pour out her heart for the salvation of beloved friends.

As she drew near the heavenly world, she was visibly ripening for it. Her final dismissal was brief and gentle; and I for one would find it impossible mentally to locate her in any other realm than one dominated and blessed by the visible presence of that beloved Saviour, with whom on earth she held such constant fellowship.

J. F. T. Hallowes.

To My Larger Congregation.

St. Petersburg.

DEAR FRIENDS,—As often before, so again I ask your prayers and intercession on behalf of the fortnight of conferences which I am holding in this city. There are already signs of much blessing being about to break out, but the conditions are not at all easy. It would not be prudent to say more than this; or to detail the special reasons I have for great encouragement and thankfulness that I was brought here.

This is a beautiful city. Everywhere the pure snow, not contaminated by a smut-laden atmosphere as with us, but sparkling and lovely; the river solidly frozen, and spanned by an electric tram over the ice; the streets filled with sledges, moving swiftly, smoothly, and noiselessly; the broad and noble thoroughfares, the shops, the trees of the boulevards laden with exquisite frost-work, the signs of opulence and comfort on every side—all worthy of the most particular notice! The splendid cathedral of St. Isaac's, the magnificent royal winter palace, the striking public buildings—all bespeaking the greatness of this mighty people.

The Christians are warm-hearted, and many of them give evidence of the depth and genuineness of their piety.

Again I would say, Pray for me, and ask that I may make the best of my unique opportunities.

"Our Daily Bread."

SUNDAY, February 16. Genesis xxii.

GOD often sends great trials upon us without giving us his reasons. Our future melts as snow in summer, we lose in a moment the result of years of toil, men are stricken down when life is beginning to be most useful. It is "a bolt from the blue." So it was with Abraham. He had not been guilty of some special sin, which had brought him into such a furnace of affliction; but we can see, in his case, that God allowed the trial to come that he might have an opportunity of stepping up into such blessing as would not otherwise have been possible.

But how gloriously faith may conquer! Notice how Abraham promises the young men who accompanied him, that the lad and he would come again. He did not doubt it for a moment; nay, but when he had taken the knife to slay his child, he was strong in faith, giving glory to God, and believing that He would raise him up, even from death, to be the heir of the promises. Here was a spectacle on which the very angels might look with admiration.

But what an overflowing blessedness is stored up for those who endure even to the end. It seems as though the river of God overflows its banks as He speaks those marvellous words of commendation; and yet we may enter upon that wonderful heritage of blessing, after a spiritual sort. Are we not Abraham's children by faith, and therefore his heirs? May we not claim our share of his boundless estate in the promises of God? Let us not try to feel aught, but reverently, by faith, appropriate these marvellous promises, all ordered and sure, each a doorway into the abundant life.

MONDAY, February 17. Genesis xxiii.

We know little of Sarah, except that she was beautiful in face, hard on Hagar, curious to overhear conversation through tent curtains, and the mother of Isaac. The Apostle Peter tells us that she obeyed Abraham, calling him lord, and the writer to the Hebrews says that she received strength to bear the child of promise. Surely we all sympathize with her in her long and weary waiting for her child, but at last he was given. You may have waited long for some blessing, but do not shut yourself up with your grief, as though it were hopeless. God shall yet make you laugh.

Abraham felt her death deeply. It could not be otherwise after so long a pilgrimage together. When such parting comes, it has been truly said that the survivor dies, the light goes out, and leaves the world in darkness. Such a parting may come to you and me; but let us so live that, when it comes, we may have no regrets to add to our natural feelings of bereavement! Let there be no words that we would give worlds if we had them to recall. Let there be no cause for self-blame. After all there is no grief in the world so bitter as that in which such ingredients mingle.

Abraham's insistence on paying for the grave; his business-like dealing with the vendors; the faith that determined him to have a grave in the land where he knew that his descendants would be settled—are traits of nobility which are well worth our imitation. How noble, also, that reiterated confession, that he was a stranger and a sojourner. He might have had opportunity to return to Ur or Haran, but chose rather to live a nomad life, till God should bring his descendants into the land. It is easy to dwell in tents when sure of a city.

TUESDAY, February 18. Genesis xxiv.

There is great solemnity in Abraham's spirit and tone as he approaches the question of Isaac's marriage. The whole matter involved to his mind such momentous issues for his son and the whole future, that he could only deal with it, and he led Eliezer to deal with it, in the most solemn and prayerful manner. But if only we could realize it, every marriage should be a subject of equal concern, both for the parents of the husband and wife, and for themselves. What wonder that there are so many disastrous weddings when they are entered upon so lightly and thoughtlessly!

God's angel preceded the faithful servant as he made his way to Mesopotamia, and led him to the old family home. What a concentration of holy influence—Abraham planning, the servant praying, the angel of God leading, the camels kneeling by the well, the damsel coming with her pitcher and volunteering to do all she could to refresh man and beast—do not such things happen still? Certainly they do. This is God's way of caring for those who have no other purpose in life than to do his will. We, too, may see all these things, except the angel; but the angel is none the less present, though our eyes are holden.

Isaac went out to meditate. This was his habit; perhaps a little to excess, but still it was a good and wholesome one. But if in the slow-moving life of those old times religious men found it impossible to live a devout life without these lonely seasons of communion, how much less can we dispense with them? A missionary told me only the other day that he had found Keswick teaching not sufficient to carry him through the perils of his life, unless it were embosomed in prayer.

WEDNESDAY, February 19. Genesis xxv.

The most important matter in this chapter is the death of Abraham. Men who had known him in Ur might have looked on his life as a huge failure. They might have spoken of him as a fanatic, who had derived nothing from all his prayers and sacrifices. Certainly he did not own a foot of land when he died, save that plot which he had bought. But was he not recompensed a thousandfold? His was the friendship of God, and his the blessed sense of peace and acceptance; his the exceeding great reward of having God as his heritage, and heaven as his home; and his has been the honour of being followed by myriads of souls, who have been blessed with believing Abraham. The child to whom you promise a horse will be quite glad if, instead of a rocking-horse, you provide him with a pony. When Abraham became a man, he put away childish things.

But what a contrast there is between this man of God, dying full, and his grandson, Esau, who demanded his portion in this life, and had little thought and care for the unseen and eternal. "Give me something to stay the cravings of my appetite," was his one imperious demand. Ah, how very often our own desires have cried out with similar eagerness! On the one hand, our self-respect, the love of our friends, our standing in the Presence of Christ, have appealed to us to resist the passionate desire. On the other, the desire has become almost irresistible, like an angry sea which has been long beating against the resisting wall until it engulfs it in some final, o'ermastering billow. In days like this beware, beware; for you may say a word or do an act which will irrevocably determine your future, to your own sorrow and shame. Like Esau, you will find no place of repentance; i.e., no chance of altering the issues of your own sin.

THURSDAY, February 20. Genesis xxvi.

How varied are the contents of this chapter. It begins with the Divine voice and manifestation, and it seems as though Isaac also was to live on a great level, to the honour of God and the blessing of succeeding generations. But within a few verses he is guilty of meanness to his wife, who had come so far to be his bride, and of abominable falsehood to Abimelech. It would have seemed incredible had we not been familiar with the same rapid changes and contrasts within ourselves. Now we are holding converse with God, and now doing the devil's work. Here, on the Mount of Transfiguration, asking that we may abide there always, and anon in the valley quarrelling for superiority. Ah me! What a wonderful God is ours, to bear with us as He does! Shall we not record for ever the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness towards us? In spite of it all, when Isaac sowed in that same land, the Lord blessed him, and he received in the same year an hundredfold.

It is interesting to follow Isaac in his well-digging. Let us dig wells and set streams flowing, which will bless men long after we have gone home to heaven. The first well was Esek—strife. The second Sitnah—hatred. The third, Rehoboth—room. Thus is human life, till it ends with Sheba—oath, or covenant. But even the outward repose to which life may attain, may be interrupted by inward anxiety. In Isaac's case there was endless trouble brought about by Esau's marriage. A grief of mind or bitterness of spirit will sow life with thorns. Let children take care not to give needless pain to those who love them. That which hurts tender and true hearts, is not likely to carry with it the blessing of God.

FRIDAY, February 21. Genesis xxvii.

Under the surface of this terrible story runs the conception of Divine pre-ordination. Had not the Divine voice predicted that the elder should serve the younger? Why this inversion of the ordinary course of life? There is a mystery here, which we cannot solve. It is not possible to go far in any direction, in human life, without coming finally on the bed-rock of a Divine purpose, which we cannot account for, but which determines our life-course, though we are conscious of being able to exert our free-will.

Jacob was wrong in taking the matter into his own hands. We must not force Providence. If you have an assurance, that God means to conduct you to a certain destiny, be quiet and still, go on doing what is right in all integrity and industry; and when the Divine hour strikes, God will call for you, as He did for Joseph, Samuel, or David.

Isaac appears to have sunk into premature senility. It seems hardly possible that he who had borne the wood for the offering up Mount Moriah, and had there yielded himself to his father's will, could have become so keen an epicure as to be stirred only when savoury meat was on the way. Surely this was due to the absence of trial and opposition. Remember that Abraham was constantly being emptied from vessel to vessel, whilst Isaac was allowed to settle on his lees. I have known men of large practical power suddenly retiring from a life of vivid excitement and success into a quiet, self-indulgent existence, who have immediately begun to deteriorate. It is better for us to know the daily friction and discipline of life than to settle in the lowland plains, or the isles that are lapped in the bosom of southern seas. "Cursed is the ground for thy sake;" i.e., for the purpose of eliciting thy loftiest faculties.

SATURDAY, February 22. Genesis xxviii.

It must have been a wrench for Isaac and Rebekah to part with Jacob; but how evidently necessary it was that he should be taken out of Rebekah's influence into that greater world, in which he was destined to play so conspicuous a part. The worm Jacob must stand beneath the ever-arching sky of God's Providence, must lie down alone on the bare moorland, must be isolated from the soft endearments of human voices, or he can never hear God speak, nor see the ladder that links every wayfarer, every pilgrim soul, with heaven.

Possibly he thought that God was only to be found within the precincts of his father's household. He was to discover that God is everywhere, and that every lonely spot may be his house, filled with his angels. Oh, to be occupied with this one great thought—God is here; God is as much here as though He were nowhere else; God is waiting to bless me, as though there were no other child of his that needed Him.

Jacob's vow is very interesting. Do not condemn it as too mercenary, though it sounds so in our ears. It was the first articulate utterance of his soul in the new experiences through which he was passing. Remember that you, too, have made vows you have not kept; you have promised money which you have not paid; you have professed a religious fervour which you have allowed to burn out to white ash. And yet God is prepared to be with you even to the end; He will not fail nor forsake you; He will yet make you Israel, the Prince.

GREAT PROTESTANT DEMONSTRATION

AT THE ALBERT HALL.

AN INDICTMENT OF GRAVE NATIONAL PERILS.

THAT there is no diminution in the strength of the Protestant sentiment of the nation was proved anew at a great and enthusiastic demonstration held in the Royal Albert Hall on Tuesday evening of last week. The gathering, like its three predecessors, was arranged under the auspices of the London Council of the United Protestant Societies. It was evident, however, that a forward step had been made through the action taken in the House of Lords last year in connection with the Royal Declaration. More than one of the speakers declared that while at first they had been of opinion that the terms of the Declaration called for modification, the position taken up by Cardinal Vaughan and his co-religionists had compelled them to admit that there was no hope of satisfying the complainants without sacrificing the Declaration altogether—a step which could not be contemplated.

The Chairman (Viscount Midleton) summed up the object of the meeting by saying that they were met to affirm afresh their hearty adhesion to those principles of religious liberty, which were first formulated in the sixteenth century, and which found their final consummation in the Revolution of 1688—"an upheaval which secured for the people an open Bible, and ushered man into the presence of his Maker without any intermediary between God and himself, save that Great Mediator who gave his life for all men. The Revolution of 1688 did more than this. It threw off once for all the shackles of Romish superstition, and granted to us for the future freedom of thought, freedom of action, freedom to worship God according to our own consciences, and all the benefits that had followed in their train.

"Without in any way detracting from the hospitality which England has always shown to those driven from other countries, we may fairly protest against the placing in our midst of large communities of men whose record in the past is hardly such that we can hope for improvement in the future. We are told that at the commencement of the twentieth century the world in general, and England in particular, is treading upon the verge of a wide region of change. It may be so. The limits of that region may even be entirely beyond the range of human ken; but it is with us now as it is in the course of their lives with most individuals. The fabled choice of Hercules is before us. On the one side there is the path of expediency down which a child may run with ease; on the other there are the rugged heights of duty which it will take all the ability of the full-grown statesman to climb. Upon the choice made is wont to turn the future of nation or individual for many a long year to come.

RESPONSIBILITY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

The first resolution expressed the conviction that the steady spread of the Mass and the Confessional in the Church of England is due to the abuse of patronage by the government and the episcopate. In moving this, Lord Kinnaird called on the Protestants of England to open their eyes to the conspiracy which from many sides is seeking to undermine our religion, and putting in its place one without muscle, backbone, or principle: "We are face to face with a national crisis, which must be met by a national movement, and that movement must come from the laity of the country. We most earnestly pray that you will, in a spirit of brotherly love, and in all things remembering that we must give a strict and solemn account, take your part in meeting the need which has arisen. What seems to me the saddest point of the case is that this increase of materialism, and the spread of that side of doctrine which is specially held by Roman Catholics, is undermining the Evangelical life of our people. Evangelistic work is more difficult where these practices are pushed forward; and it is by the preaching of the unvarnished truth, as revealed in the Word of God, that the Gospel of Jesus Christ is going to reach the masses."

This was seconded by Rev. William Cuff in an impassioned address, in which he expressed fervently the hope that, "as long as this great Protestant battle is to be fought, we shall never forget that our keenest weapon, our mightiest influence, our two-edged sword, is the Word of the Lord, with the Spirit of the Lord in the man who wields it. Our appeal is again to the people, and that mainly because it is the people who will make the protest a power at the elections. I know a place where the Protestant vote kept one man out of the House of Commons, and that vote can do the same at the next election. Only a man pledged to the Protestant principle will be returned."

A TIME FOR PLAIN SPEAKING.

The Royal Declaration was the subject of the second resolution, which declared it to be needful that the Sovereign should give a personal pledge of his rejection of the distinctive errors of Rome. In an able address, the mover (Lord Overtoun) recalled the circumstances under which the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act was passed in 1829, and compared the pledges then given with the attitude assumed and the language used by the Romanist members and clergy when the proposal to change the Declaration was before the House of Lords in 1901. Referring, also, to the adoption of the Declaration, Lord Overtoun admitted that it is marked by plainness of language, but maintained that this, and the obtaining of clear securities, are as important and as necessary as ever, especially in dealing with those who believe in mental reservation. "Had we been drawing up the Declaration for the first time other terms might have been employed, but I would suggest that the Church of Rome, which has not ceased to hurl the strongest anathemas at all who hold Protestant doctrines, should be the last to show extreme sensitiveness at our plain speaking. Rome knows no toleration when she has the power.

"It is for you who wish to preserve your priceless liberties to say that the Declaration shall never be tampered with. Roman Catholics who wish to abolish it owe allegiance to a foreign potentate who claims infallibility; and who, if we had a Popish king, would be, through the confessional, the king's sovereign. Our country is determined to govern itself, We will brook no interference from any foreign power, and it is of the utmost importance that our Sovereign should make it perfectly clear that he neither belongs to that Church nor believes its tenets. The nation has made up its mind that never again shall a Roman Catholic monarch sit on the throne."

In seconding the resolution, Mr. Luke White, M.P., congratulated the associations represented on the success which has already attended their efforts to arouse the people to a sense of the gravity and importance of the issues involved; and expressed the belief that as the result of this demonstration very little will be heard in the future of the proposal to tamper with the Declaration.

OUR GLORIOUS INHERITANCE.

"Forewarned is forearmed," said Prebendary Webb-Peploe, "and if ever the nation chooses to sell itself to those who have proved themselves the enemies of liberty, it should only be when the whole of the people have learned what it is proposed to do. We have received from God the most glorious inheritance that man can have—liberty in and through the Lord Jesus Christ, a liberty that touches our mental, social, and earthly affairs, which touches above all that which is everlasting in every man. We have to thank God for an open Bible, the right of appealing to God without the mediation of any human agency whatever, and to approach Him with the liberty of sons.

"It is said to be a hardship that His Majesty should have had to make this Declaration. He is declared Supreme Governor of the Church of England, and no man can take up a sacred office in that Church without making an affirmation of his assent and consent to the Thirty-Nine Articles. Are the terms too hard? Are they contrary to the Word of God? They are in exact harmony with it, and with the formularies of our Church. Hence it is a necessity—not of blasphemy, not of insult, not of disgrace, but of charity—that the King should declare these things to be hurtful, superstitious, and idolatrous. He declares what we all believe to be that which God's Word announces. We must insist in our deep reverence that this becomes the Sovereign, that it is right for him, remembering the dangers of the past and the present. If we are to be Christians because we hold certain truths, then let the king declare that he holds the opposite doctrines to be superstitious and idolatrous."

Attention was called in the closing resolution to the inaction of successive governments in not putting into force the laws for the exclusion of Jesuits and monks; and to the unstatesmanlike refusal to provide for the inspection of nunneries and convents. Adverting to the past history of the monastic orders, and describing the subservience demanded of Jesuits to their general, Mr. Benjamin Nicholson (the mover) asked, "Do you believe that we want persons in this country who are pledged to serve their generals in this manner?

THE WORD "PROTESTANT."

The audience was roused to a high pitch of enthusiasm by the closing address, in which Rev. W. R. Mowll urged everyone to recollect the importance of preserving and utilising the word "Protestant." "If there is a word that the Jesuits and the Ritualists hate, it is the word 'Protestant.' Our criminal population have the advantage of visiting magistrates, and I have noticed with considerable satisfaction that, when the J.P. has the cell door open, the prisoner is asked whether he has any complaint to make. We thank God that this is so. But what we demand is that the inmates of convents, which are living prisons, should be carefully visited. I appeal to the women. Think of your poor sisters. Here in this country of freedom we have slavery. It was only the other day that an Act was passed in which it was set down that the laundries belonging to these institutions should not be inspected. They are abominably conducted. The girls there are sweated with a vengeance, and as for their food, it is marvellous how they exist upon it. This state of things is going on because the laity will not speak out as men and women should.

"The Jesuits are responsible for a great share of the troubles that beset our path to-day. What is the remedy? We must be our own Parliament. We must employ every lawful means, and the means we must use above all others is to preach the Word. I would ask every one of you who is a Nonconformist to urge your minister to preach the simple Gospel of Jesus Christ; and those who belong to the Established Church to come to those of us who fail in our duty and urge upon us also to preach the Gospel. That will uproot the conventual system, and make us gloriously free—Protestant because we are witnesses to a living Saviour. Remember the very name of our Lord, that name Jesus (Jesus—Jehovah Saviour, the Lord is Salvation). Mark it, the meaning of it is, 'He shall save his people from their sins.' So we say to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen, 'Away from all this mere ceremonial. Look unto Him, the Christ of God, who died upon the cross, and who made full atonement for sin. Look to Him in the power of his glorious resurrection, and see the deliverance from the power of sin.' We want this message to be heard now all over our country. God grant that it may be so!"

Clothing Poor Cripples.

"THERE are three crippled girls in the family," wrote one of the lady visitors of the Ragged School Union in describing the needs of some very poor, deserving people, "one is in an asylum, and of the two at home one has been confined to her bed for five weeks by a paralytic seizure." Such a case is typical of the many that are relieved by the "R.S.U." Although it is true that much of the misery that exists is caused by indulgence in strong drink, there are many families whose poverty arises from causes beyond their control, and it is in such instances as these that Mr. John Kirk and the large staff of voluntary helpers come to the help of the needy by supplying them, in these chilly February days, with warm clothing.

BOARD SCHOOL CHILDREN.

The wise counsels of some members of the London School Board have led to the organization of "Special Difficulty Schools," where those children who are physically or mentally deficient are received, conveyances being provided to take them to and from school. Many of them live in very poor homes, and are, indeed, among the most pitiable of our fellow creatures, so that it is only by the help of Mr. Kirk and his friends, in finding suitable clothing, that some of them are able to attend. One poor little mite is described, in an application for help from a lady, as "very thin, and quite helpless with curvature of the spine. Her father earns a scanty living by delivering goods by a hand barrow; both parents are total abstainers." It was a surely happy day for the little lassie in question when a large parcel arrived from the Ragged School Union offices, containing a warm frock and boots and stockings.

LIVING IN A CELLAR.

Among those who most need clothing—although it is difficult to speak of degrees of misery where all are so poor—are those who live in cellars and attics, for which places the rents are somewhat lower than those paid for better rooms. Mr. Kirk was able to send last week a parcel to a little boy described as living in the depths of poverty, whose father, sick, and earning practically nothing, has now to go to the infirmary. The lad's clothes were poor and thin, but now he will be better able to face the keen February winds.

Particular care is paid to the children of widows. We can readily understand the joy with which a poor woman, working hard from morning to night as a "scrubber," welcomed a suit of clothes, and frocks, and pinafores, for some of the five little ones dependent upon her. In much the same position as the widow, too, is the poor creature whose husband, a good-for-nothing fellow, deserted her, leaving her to support a family as best as she could. Work is not always obtainable, and she found herself out of employment. One of her children, a cripple girl, recently came home from the infirmary after being there for three months with several severe abscesses, and the only income of the family is some three shillings a week earned by the twin sister of the young cripple by selling violets in the streets. Mr. Kirk has sent a bundle of serviceable clothes, but the number of applications for help from equally distressing cases, in which careful inquiry has been made, is very large. It is impossible to visit the R.S.U. office and listen to the piteous stories of cripples and their sorrows without wishing that one had command of an inexhaustible store of boots and shoes and all kinds of children's clothing. Perhaps, however, some of "Uncle Tom's" nephews and nieces will be able to come to the rescue, and send prompt and liberal supplies to Mr. Kirk at 32, John Street, Bedford Row, London, W.C.

THE "UNCLE TOM" COT.

It will be interesting to many of the young readers of this column to know that their little friend Hannah, the cripple girl, whom they have helped to support in the Home at Southend, has greatly benefited by her stay at that institution, and it is hoped that within two years time she will be restored to health. The cost of her maintenance is but small, and it is suggested that readers, by renewing their gifts, will raise the £36 required for Hannah's maintenance during the past year and the two years that are to come. The Reign of Peace.

On earth peace, goodwill toward men."

Behold us! suppliants at thy feet,
Confessing all our sin:
Speak, Lord! the "New Creation" form
Our hearts and minds within:
Unto the groaning earth restore
The Eden of thy grace;
And swords shall be to ploughshares turned,
As nations seek thy face!

"The sceptre of uprightness is the sceptre of thy kingdom."

Isaiah saw Christ's wonderful redemption,
And told of days when warfare shall be o'er;
When God shall be the chosen Arbitrator,—
Accepted by the nations evermore;
Such was the vision to the prophet granted,
The reign of peace, by seers of God foretold,
When Christ shall bear the sceptre of the nations,
When his shall be the kingdoms of the world!

Tempted and Tried (James i. 12-27).

GOD and Satan are alike said to try us. The One tries us that we may rise; the other that we may fall. The One appeals to our best and noblest nature to arise to heights never before attained; the other seduces us along a primrose path to the weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth. Probably it is only through temptation and difficulty that the soul can reach its highest excellence; and as it emerges from some fiery trial, like that which Abraham endured on Mount Moriah, or Joseph was permitted to suffer in the house of Potiphar, it receives life as its crown. We must not say that God has ordained, or that He has permitted evil. The existence of evil we can never fathom. It may be necessary to the development of goodness. Perhaps as we can only know light because we have known darkness, so we shall only know perfect goodness because we have learned the awful possibilities of evil. "God cannot be tempted with evil, and He Himself tempteth no man" (13).

In every temptation there is a manifestation of the trinity of evil: the world, which is an appearance of good that may seem likely to be gained by doing evil; the flesh, our own susceptibility to the temptations suggested to us; and lastly, the evil one. There is a precise analogy between the microbes of disease that float in the air, waiting for some morbid condition in which to lodge, and the germs of temptation which are always floating around us and insinuating themselves into our nature. The only hope against disease is to keep the body in such perfect health that the white corpuscles may close around and render innocuous the germ or spore; and in temptation our main hope lies in being so full of the life of Jesus Christ that the forces of evil may expire as a spark in the ocean waters.

Be very careful with regard to every thought of sin that may light for a moment upon you. If this be not met at once by the antiseptic of the blood of Christ, it will most certainly breed evil and bear sin; while sin, risen to maturity, will bring forth death.

What an exquisite conception of God is given in the seventeenth verse! We are told that in Him there is no parallax, no change, no variableness caused by our altering moods, that his gifts are always coming down, and the things which are come down are his gifts. Among the best of these gifts is his Word, to receive which with meekness is to have a talisman which will make sin abhorrent and impossible. A friend of mine, during the influenza epidemic, was careful to carry eucalyptus about his person. It was an antiseptic, and there is nothing which is so absolutely destructive of the power of evil as the Word of God received into the heart and pondered.

Notice that to hear the Word of God without doing it is to go without permanent blessing. It is like a transient glimpse of your face as you pass before a mirror, which you soon forget. The benediction is ours when we look into the perfect law and continue in it, and become doers of that work (v. 25). So often when we have heard the Word preached we go forth and cannot remember even the text that was expounded. How frequently have I seen young Christians carrying note-books about with them, and at the close of some address have heard them say, "I have got it all here." It is a profound mistake; we have only got that which we do. You have only become possessed of just as much truth as you have transformed into daily living. That which you carry in your head is not yours really. Go forth from the sermon and practise what you have heard, and forthwith you are possessed of some new fragment of the great truth of God.

Probably there is nothing that tests us more than our speech (v. 26). Bridle your tongue and you master your entire life. Walk before God, then, in the stainless beauty of a holy character, rich in good works, and silver-toned in speech. F. B. M.

C.E. NOTES.

At the recent All-India Convention, held at Bombay, it was resolved to request the World's Christian Endeavour Union to carefully consider the wisdom of holding the next world's Convention in India, in December, 1903, or January, 1904.

It is gratifying to learn that, notwithstanding the numerous hindrances to the advance of the kingdom as a result of the present war, Christian Endeavour is more than holding its own in South Africa. The South African Endeavourer, which comes from the heart of the Transvaal, records remarkable progress.

The American Army Department has started an Y.M.C.A. among the 7th Infantry at Fort Egbert, Alaska, within the Arctic Circle. Comfortable quarters for the Association are provided by the commanding officer.

International S.S. Lesson.

Sunday, February 23, 1902.

Subject—"The Arrest of Stephen" (Acts vi. 1-15). Golden Text—Matt. x. 28.

AS the number of disciples "was multiplying" (R.V.), so the labour of ministration of daily alms increased, and the double burden seriously interfered with the spiritual work of the apostles. The "Grecians" or "Hellenists" were Jews of the Dispersion, born in Greek-speaking countries, or proselytes. The "Hebrews" were Jews born in Palestine, speaking the Hebrew language, and as natives took precedence, whence probably the murmuring on the part of the Grecians as to inequality of distribution.

Trouble in the Church. Remedy. Results.

1. Dissatisfaction with Church Government.—Jealousy, discontent, murmuring. Heard by God (Ex. xvi. 7, 12; John vi. 43; Luke xv. 2; xix. 7; Phil. ii. 14).

2. Diaconate Proposed by the Apostles.—They frankly admitted the grievance, and proposed seven men (this was the number chosen to manage public business in every Jewish town) as extra workers. Qualifications: unblemished character, men in whom the Spirit of God dwelt abundantly for wisdom and discretion in the practical business of the Church, "ministration," "deaconship" (Deut. i. 12, 13; 1 Tim. iii. 8, 9, 10).

3. First Appointment of Deacons.—Selected by the congregation, appointed by the Apostles; wisely so, for some at least of that aggrieved section, to quell discontent and restore confidence. All names Greek; but it is thought three were Greeks, three Hebrews, and one a proselyte. Only two mentioned again elsewhere. Stephen (Acts vi. 5 to end of vii.) and Phillip (Acts viii. 5; xxi. 8).

4. Prayer and Laying on of Hands.—Where else mentioned? (Acts viii. 17, 18; ix. 17; xiii. 3; xix. 6). Holy Ghost (1 Tim. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6).

5. Renewed Consecration to the Ministry.—Verse 4, "Continue steadfastly to prayer" (R.V. Rom. i. 9; Col. i. 9, 10; iv. 12; Acts xii. 24; xix. 20).

6. Revival in the Church.—Verse 7. (Isa. lv. 11). Disciples multiplying continually. Great company of priests added (John xii. 42). Was this through Stephen's means, who took a distinct line of teaching (v. 14)? Worked out in Heb. vii. 12, 14, 18, 19; ix. 8, 9, 10; x. 1-9; Matt. xxiv. 2; John iv. 21.

Stephen.

1. Stephen's Character and Gifts.

Full of faith and power and wisdom. Devout student of the Scriptures, zealous, and courageous. Patient, meek, calm. So filled with the Holy Ghost that none could resist his wisdom and spirit (v. 10).

2. Stephen with the Disputers.

Libertines, Jewish freedmen of Rome, or their descendants. Synagogue for Cilicia, probably Saul of Tarsus among them. Rabbinical writers say there were 480 synagogues in Jerusalem. Stephen showed wisdom, according to Luke xxi. 15. His own section of Grecians (Psa. xxv. 9).

3. Stephen under Persecution. (vii.) Men who would swear falsely. The elders did not take the lead (Matt. xxvi. 59, 60). Circumstances wonderfully like those of Stephen's Master. False charge, false evidence, Divine courage, endurance, and forgiveness, with visible token of God's favour and presence (v. 15; Ex. xxxiv. 29). Extract from "Last Letters and Further Records of Martyred Missionaries."* Dr. Dunkan Kay wrote:—"Our dear old pastor came. It is good to have him. His face is full of light and brightness, not born of earth, but from constant looking unto his Master's face" (Heb. xii. 2; 1 Pet. i. 8; Psa. xxxiv. 5).

How can the youngest child (or senior scholar) copy Stephen and make ready to follow in his steps?

I. Store the memory now with Bible truths (Stephen) Acts vii. 1 to 53; vi. 10; 2 Tim iii. 15; Acts xviii. 24; John v. 39).

II. Seek the Holy Spirit of God, to be "made white unto salvation" (John xiv. 6, 26, xv. 26, xvi. 9, 14.

III. Yield myself to the Lord (Rom. vi. 13, xii. 1) for Him to do through you (anywhere) any work He wishes to do by you on earth (Eph. iii. 17), remembering John xv. 5, 14; but Phil. iv. 13, Gal. ii. 20.

IV. By his grace, to be ready when He calls you to join the ranks of his servants who "shall serve Him" before the Throne (Rev. xxii. 3; Matt. xxiv. 44).

The House of Rest, St. John's Wood.—Rev. W. Fuller Gooch gave the address at the last monthly meeting at the House of Rest, St. John's Wood. He spoke upon Hebrews vi. 10-12, drawing a clear distinction between a mere reading the Bible and prayerful study which results in a close association with Christ, and an intimate knowledge of his will; and emphasized the need of guarding against being drawn away from the truth as revealed, and being despoiled of spiritual health and power.

University Notes.

[From our own correspondents.]

CAMBRIDGE.

THE Pastoral Lecturer this year is the Bishop of Coventry, who is giving this term a course of lectures on "The Pastor in Teaching, or Religious Instruction Viewed in Connection with Modern Educational Methods." It is hoped that these lectures will prove useful for intending schoolmasters, as well as for candidates for Holy Orders.

OXFORD.

The Oxford Clarendon Press are to be congratulated on the completion of the first instalment of the "Peshito" Syriac version of the New Testament. This includes the Four Gospels, and by its publication the University has brought the text of the Syriac Vulgate to the same stage as another enterprise of a similar character, the Latin Vulgate of Jerome.

The Hon. and Rev. W. T. Rice, in introducing Miss Gorham, of Duxhurst, to an Oxford audience on Tuesday week, referred to a statement recently made by two young brewers, Mr. Noel Barton and Mr. Walter Hoare, in which they admit the remarkable increase of drunkenness among women. They also speak of drunkenness among girls. Mr. Rice urged these admissions as a plea for the work of the B.W.T.A., for which Miss Gorham had come to speak.

Speaking at Trinity College on Wednesday on behalf of the National Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children, Rev. Benjamin Waugh said that they had 840 centres in the United Kingdom. Their idea, he said, was to protect children from neglect. Hundreds of children, for example, were burnt to death while their mothers were drinking. Referring to the fact that a large number of children were smothered in bed, Mr. Waugh showed that nineteen cases out of twenty occurred between Saturday night and Sunday morning, when mothers had retired to bed drunk.

A large and enthusiastic audience assembled at the City buildings on Tuesday to hear Professor Turner lecture on "Sun Spots." Very suggestive were some of his statements. Not the least among them was the following: "Terrestrial magnetic phenomena are in sympathy with solar phenomena. All violent disturbances in the sun are signalled on our earth by violent disturbances of the magnetic needle. We may, therefore be said to be in magnetic connection with the sun, if not in telegraphic communication with Mars." It is Dr. Moule who speaks of "suns, planets, and satellites in the system of the blessed Gospel," of the Glory of God as being the supreme sun, and of whole systems of truth moving in subordinate relation to this. Verily, "the heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handiwork."

Dr. Chavasse had a warm reception in Oxford last week. He addressed the undergraduates in St. Aldate's Rectory Room on the Saturday evening, preached at St. Ebbe's on Sunday morning, and preached at St. Mary's (the University Church) to a crowded audience in the evening. "Love to God" was the Bishop's subject on the Sunday evening. The secret of loving God was declared to be, first, a desire to love Him, then that desire expressed in prayer, and then faith in the great love of God to us. "The open secret of loving God," said the Bishop, "was believing that God loved them." Love is of God. They could not force themselves to love, but if there was one man in that church who really longed to love God, that desire came from God, and sooner or later God would satisfy it.

Protestant Mission in Bristol.

FOR the first five weeks of the present year a mission was conducted in Bristol by Mr. Kensit's Wycliffe Preachers. Owing to the violent opposition offered to the preachers in the Knowle and Clifton districts by a party of Ritualistic young men, the excitement which was aroused grew in intensity during the course of the meetings, large numbers of supporters following the preachers from one part of the city to another.

The leading local newspapers opened their columns to a vigorous correspondence on the merits of the case, and by the end of the mission a very large section of public opinion was in favour of the movement. The culminating meeting took place in the Colston Hall on Monday, February 3, when nearly 4,000 people assembled, and the utmost enthusiasm prevailed. The chair was occupied by Alderman James Inskip, who paid an eloquent tribute to the great value of the Wycliffe preachers' labours, and stirring addresses were given by Mr. John Kensit, Rev. H. Dening, Mr. John Kensit jun., and others. That a deep impression has been made throughout the West is certain, and it is hoped that real good has been wrought in stemming the flood of Ritualism.

Home Missions.

East London Sin and Sorrow.

THE acceptance by Rev. Edwin H. Ellis of the pastorate of the East London Tabernacle has given fresh impetus not only to the regular work of the church, but to those useful home mission operations which have grown up around this well-known sanctuary. Mr. Ellis brings courage and enthusiasm to bear upon a task bristling with difficulties, and has already begun both to reorganize the social operations—which, in the absence of a pastor, have somewhat languished—and to launch new undertakings in order to cope with the widespread suffering of the "under-world" of the distressful East.

THE ORPHAN HOMES.

Commenced in 1881 by Rev. Archibald G. Brown in two rooms, with one poor orphan lad, the homes in Harley Street now accommodate twenty-five children. Conducted with wise economy, the institution deserves hearty support. The excellence of the work receives abundant testimony from the young people who have been sheltered in their time of need, and who are now, thanks largely to the soundness of their training, doing well in positions of usefulness in various parts of the world. Mr. Ellis is personally devoting time and energy to the consolidation and extension of this branch. He makes it a rule to speak words of spiritual direction and encouragement to each incoming child, and to watch carefully over the development of Christian character. Pathetic and urgent cases of need are constantly met with.

Here, for instance, is a poor widow with a family of small children. Her husband has met with an accident which has proved fatal. His workmates, by clubbing together, support, for a time, the loved ones who are left to mourn his loss. At length, when the "job" finishes, and the men are dispersed, the widow is left penniless and in the throes of despair. At that moment Mr. Ellis comes to the rescue. Cases of an equally urgent character are continually met with, and the good folk at Burdett Road are desirous that the appeals of the widow and fatherless should not be made in vain.

"THE CHRISTIAN BUILDINGS."

In Devons Road, E., may be seen a remarkable outcome of Christian enterprise. It is a block of buildings purchased in connection with the Tabernacle, containing some ninety rooms, let out to aged followers of the Lord Jesus. Three rooms and a washhouse are obtainable for two shillings a week, so that the inmates are enabled to spend their declining years free from squalid and miserable surroundings. While preserved from the taint of pauperism, they are necessarily benefited by having such good accommodation at so low a rent, and thus in many cases the evening of life is rendered bright and cheerful. So far this useful piece of work has proved self-supporting, but expense must soon be incurred for repairs and renovation.

DEVONPORT STREET MISSION CHAPEL.

This building, purchased by Mr. Archibald Brown in order to save it from being turned into a warehouse, has for many years been worked by loving friends from the Tabernacle. It shows signs of wear and tear and must be repaired almost immediately in order that the many branches of religious and philanthropic endeavour which are carried on may be maintained.

In the ministry of visitation one devoted worker is endeavouring to cope with a great amount of distress among the deserving poor in a district of some sixty streets. Mr. Ellis seeks to strengthen this department of service by securing a trained nurse, and an additional agent for house-to-house and room-to-room visitation, and by commencing a medical mission. "The need to-day," says Mr. Ellis, "is even greater than in the past. Misery, want and vice are in our midst, and also a great amount of clean, heart-touching poverty. Men and women are to be met with every day who have been beaten in the battle of life, and we want to help them to rise." Mr. Ellis has the hearty support of the increasing congregations at the Tabernacle, and hopes likewise to enlist the sympathy of new friends in the arduous undertakings in which he is engaged. Letters may be addressed to him: East London Tabernacle, Burdett Road, Bow, E.

Ratcliff Highway Strangers' Rest.

FOR twenty-four years "The Rest" at Ratcliff Highway has been the rallying-ground of seamen of all nations. From the commencement of the work the chief aim has been the preaching of the Gospel, and this has been strictly adhered to. Entertainments and similar attractions are not provided, but every endeavour is made to bring the Institution into line with a Christian home. Under the direction of Dr. Andrew M. Neatby, who succeeded Mr. Theodore Isaac twelve months ago, the past year's efforts have yielded results which cannot fail to inspire with new energy those who are responsible for carrying on the work. A new reading-room has just been opened, which the sailors have named their drawing-room. Here Miss Cleaver, the resident deaconess, spends many an afternoon speaking and singing to the men. The doors of the Rest are open from 11 a.m. to 9 p.m. on week days, and two till nine on Sundays. Cards of invitation are distributed in the streets, and words of welcome appear in the window in nine or ten languages.

How many there are who have been helped to lead "godly, righteous, and sober lives" by the spiritual and social agencies of the Rest it would be difficult to estimate; but the number who have taken advantage of the opportunity afforded for kindly converse, quiet reading and study, of congenial companionship, and of attending the evangelistic meetings, &c., is a striking testimony to the sailors' warm appreciation of the efforts put forth on their behalf.

At the annual meetings on Friday friends from many parts of the Metropolis assembled to show their continued interest in the work. In the afternoon Rev. H. J. Knight, of Peckham Rye Tabernacle, presided, and spoke helpful and stimulating words to the workers on Rev. xxiii. 3, 4, 5. Miss Alexander followed with a fitting message in song, "Rich are the moments of blessing Jesus the Saviour bestows." In the course of a hearty address Colonel Major spoke from personal observation in India and at home of the ennobling influence of Seamen's Rests. On one occasion he had witnessed, in Bombay, all the stewards of a P. and O. steamer signing the temperance pledge in the Sailors' Home. The treasurer, Mr. Milton Horner, stated that the finances were in a satisfactory condition, and appealed for new supporters to take the place of subscribers who had been removed by death. Dr. Andrew Neatby, in his review of the year, referred to the warm appreciation of seamen of all nationalities for the efforts made in their interests. Speaking of the numerous methods by which friends could help, the secretary mentioned that it was the custom to give to each man leaving for a voyage a Bible or Testament, with Gospel literature; bags for enclosing the same are always acceptable.

In the evening another meeting was held, when Mr. Samuel Watson presided, and addresses were given by Rev. G. Turner (Sutton), and Pastor W. Fuller Gooch (Norwood).

A Cause for Warning.—It has been stated by Mr. Herbert Philips, at a meeting of the Manchester Branch of the National Vigilance Association, that much harm is being done by advertisements circulated in country districts by servants' registry offices, many young girls, utterly inexperienced in the ways of large cities, being drawn to Manchester and other centres, in frequent cases with sad results.

British Jews' Society.

THE call for expansion in mission work is also a call to the exercise of enlarged faith in the Lord of the harvest. The undertakings of faith, however, often entail a measure of anxiety—in other words, faith is tried; but in his own time God gives relief and blessing.

Our friends of the British Jews' Society have known what it is to be tried, but, all the same, they have not given way to despondency. They have entered into the inheritance of a great work, and in view of pressing need they have not shrunk from the assumption of additional responsibilities during the past year or so. Acting on the urgent entreaty of Dr. Gray of Rome, the Society lately appointed as one of its missionaries Pastor Ravi, an ex-Roman Catholic priest, and a former professor in one of the Evangelical Colleges. Other recent appointments are — new workers for Newcastle-on-Tyne and Dublin, and one to work in East Prussia, with Königsberg as the centre of operations.

Thus reinforced, the Society has agents in many towns of Great Britain, and the great Continental regions of the Dispersion. In addition to settled missionaries, there are workers who undertake tours of visitation among the Jews. Then there are Homes for Aged Hebrew Christians—disabled from work and without friends in the world. Though there is a special fund in aid of this department, it has been needful, through the slackness of income, to borrow money from the general fund. This strain is untimely, by reason of the fact that the general fund itself is not in a flourishing condition. In fact, the financial outlook occasions some apprehension, and if unexpected help is not forthcoming the financial year will close with a deficit of £500. This would be a painful result of a year of noble work. The president of the Society is Sir Andrew Wingate, K.C.I.E., son of the distinguished missionary to the Jews in the last century; and the secretary is Rev. I. Levinson, 9, Great James Street, Bedford Row, London, W.C.

Mr. John Denning's Work.

A BRIEF narrative of facts concerning Gospel effort in Southsea, Portsmouth, and neighbourhood, takes account of the twentieth year of Mr. John Denning's labours in the Gospel. Among believers, without distinction of creed, a helpful ministry has been carried on, both in the gatherings arranged for the expounding of Scripture, and the visitation of Christians unable to attend the means of grace. Referring to the tent work on Southsea Common, Mr. Denning writes:—"We pitched our large tent on Southsea Common in the same position as we have for many years past, where the Gospel was preached every evening and twice on the Lord's Day for seven weeks. Our smaller tent was pitched in the Albert Road, Southsea, where we held meetings every evening and twice on the Lord's Day for about ten weeks, also lectures in the afternoon to Christians. These meetings during the past summer have not been without manifest tokens of the Lord's blessing to his own people and in the conversion of sinners; yet we found the work exceedingly trying and difficult."

The mission work has been vigorously conducted; the services are held in halls, cottages, and the open air. The visitation of the poor and the distribution of tracts have been a means by which many have become acquainted with the way of salvation. Mr. Denning is now leaving Southsea to take up Gospel work on the Blackdown Hills and neighbourhood in Somersetshire, the scene of his labours thirty years ago. Many will pray that the life of this honoured servant of God so earnestly devoted to the preaching of the Gospel may be prolonged for still wider service.

Lord's Day Observance.—Lovers of the Sabbath will appreciate the new quarterly paper, The Lord's Day, in which the Society for Promoting the Due Observance of the Lord's Day proposes to gather together items of interest and importance bearing on the subject. (1d. 20, Bedford Street, W.C.)

The Christian Temperance Campaign.

DR. HENRY IN DUBLIN.

ATTENDANCE and enthusiasm in connection with Dr. Henry's temperance crusade in Dublin are far exceeding the expectation of local friends; and it is believed that if he could plan a return visit to the city at some future time, none of its large buildings would be capable of holding the crowds likely to assemble to hear his stirring addresses. Ministers of all denominations, not hitherto known as particularly interested in temperance work, make special efforts to be at the meeting; while the presence of prominent business men and gentlemen in official positions indicates the creation of interest on the part of classes of people who, as a rule, are not largely affected by such gatherings.

Quite early in the mission a large number of pledges were collected as the reward of admirable organization on the part of Mr. J. Barker Wells and the hon. secretaries—Rev. W. J. M'Creery, B.D., with Messrs. H. B. Dawson and William Carty—ably and loyally supported by Mr. Albert E. Brunton and other members of committee.

The Irish Branch of the Evangelical Alliance has a standing meeting for prayer and conference in the Board Room, Christian Union Buildings, every Monday afternoon; and Dr. Henry was invited to speak on the 3rd inst. Captain R. WADE-THOMPSON presided, and, after Rev. CANON DAY had read a paper dealing with "The Difficulties and Dangers of the Time in Regard to Society," Dr. HENRY referred to three characteristic social sins, namely, pleasure or worldliness (including extravagance, ostentation, and frivolity), intemperance, and impurity. These sins of society must be conquered, he said, by the application of the principles of Christianity to the pressing problems of the day. The doctrines of sobriety, stewardship, brotherhood, and self-sacrifice furnish the keynote to the situation. The glory of the twentieth century will be the reformation of social evils. We shall never promote the golden age except by application of the golden rule to all classes and conditions of men.

The view expressed by Dr. Henry on the occasion referred to was strongly emphasized by one gentleman present, who had been accosted in the street, late at night, by a young girl of some seventeen years. He kindly asked her what would be the end of such a life. She said, "Don't talk to me about hell; I'm in it now. Do you think I could live as I do if it were not for the deadening of my senses by drink?"

A CALL FOR LIBERALITY.

There was a well-filled Metropolitan Hall for Monday night's meeting. Several of their simple but searching songs, of which the people never tire, were ably rendered by the Jubilee Singers, whose presence has been a welcome feature of all the meetings. Dr. HENRY dealt in trenchant style with some of the defences of strong drink. The defence, in the modern world, of a hell-born appetite which demoralizes man in his composite nature is one of the mysteries of iniquity. Drink finds one of its strongholds in that self-indulgence which is the lowest law of nature; but, under the operation of the opposite and noble principle of self-restraint and purity in the fear of God, man's conscience is cleared, his will is strengthened, and his whole nature is elevated.

Speaking to a large and deeply-attentive audience on Tuesday night, Dr. HENRY opened by saying that one of the marks of this new century, as it progresses, will be that people who believe in sobriety and godliness will give to the support of rational and Biblical temperance as generously and systematically as they give to any other department of Christian service. He contended that no department of Christian activity bears its full measure of fruit, because of the blighting and hindering influence of the drink curse. The liquor traffic has one of its strongholds in the terrible condition of the poorer classes of our cities; and the problem of the social regeneration of the masses will never be solved until we, as Christian and temperance people, inaugurate a system of attractive social institutions separate and apart from the drink, in order to supply the craving for that comradeship and inspiration which are so terribly lacking in the lives and circumstances of the poor, but are native to every human soul. Prostitution of the people's politics to pot-house interests should remind us that while politics have no place in religion, religion should have a controlling influence in politics.

"FOUNDATION WORK."

Evident success attended the progress of the campaign throughout last week. The effect upon Christian people in Dublin should make future temperance work much easier. Dr. Henry strongly holds that no more important service can be done in the promotion of God's kingdom on earth than to rouse the Christian conscience against the evils of drink.

On Wednesday two meetings were held. The ARCHDEACON OF THURLES offered prayer in the afternoon. Dealing with the history of Deborah as indicating what women can do for temperance, Dr. HENRY traced the rapid development of true sentiment among them upon this question. If women could be federated against drink, a single generation would see it abolished. In the evening, Rev. WM. PROCTOR (United Free Church of Scotland) prayed for the city; and Dr. HENRY began a series of discussions on brighter aspects of the reform, by showing the success that is coming to substitutes for the drink saloon.

The relation of drink manufacture, sale, and use to the industry and comfort of the people was the subject of a most convincing address, full of telling facts and figures, on Thursday night. At Friday's meeting Dr. HENRY said he was encouraged by special effort outside the meeting. One young man had brought in six counterfoils of pledges secured during the previous day. The speaker then dealt with aspects of the drink problem revealed by the experience and action of insurance companies, athletic champions, military authorities, great travellers, prominent scientists, and eminent physicians, all pointing to the physical duty and moral obligation of total abstinence.

"SIGNS AND SOUL-TRAPS."

A pleasing feature of the Mission was the Metropolitan Hall filled with children on Saturday afternoon, including some from various Homes. Rev. CHAS. DOWSE, M.A., offered prayer, and DR. HENRY talked instructively about "Signs and Soul-traps." Younger children took pledge forms home for parental permission to sign. The evening meeting was full of interest, and included fine bass solos by Mr. F. J. LOUDIN, chief of the Jubilee Singers. Rev. W. J. M'CREERY expressed thankfulness for God's manifest seal upon this Mission. The whole audience rose to adopt a resolution of regret at the declared intention of the Government to exclude Ireland from proposed temperance legislation. Dr. HENRY then gave some sound answers to various questions received (with helpful suggestions) during the week, bearing out the practical application of total abstinence.

Sunday was the crowning day of the Dublin mission. Of the great crowds that filled the Metropolitan Hall to its utmost capacity, both afternoon and evening, it may be truly said that "the power of the Lord was present to heal them." At the first-named service Dr. HENRY enforced, from Hosea vii. 8 and Jer. xlviii. 10, the necessity for equalization of human life as regards the heavenly as well as the earthly side; and the fact that faithfulness to God on the part of nation and individual requires uncompromising hostility to drink and every other evil.

The address made a deeply solemn impression. The spirit of hearing was very marked on the part of the thronging audience in the evening. Dr. HENRY illustrated 2 Sam. xvii. 23 by saying that man is the glory and the scandal of the universe; and concluded that the human soul is too precious in God's sight to be lost for the sake of pleasure, passion, or appetite.

During the Mission 1,100 pledges were taken, and immediately after the Sunday evening service many Christian workers came together and fervently commended to God all who had been brought under the influence of Dr. Henry's powerful personality and godly purpose.

Dr. Henry will speak words of farewell to pledge signers and other Dublin friends on Thursday evening.

FUTURE MEETINGS.

Feb. 14, Holyhead; 18-20, St. Albans; 21-23, Conference Hall, Mildmay Park, N.; 24-25, Chelmsford; 28-March 2, Ipswich; 4-6, Watford; 14-21, Leicester; April 1-3, Macclesfield.

In City Workrooms.

THE annual conversazione of friends associated with Mrs. Fisher in her visitation of city workrooms was held at Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A. on Thursday. For over thirty years Mrs. Fisher has directed the mission, and has enjoyed the fellowship of a large number of helpers, who devote an hour in the middle of the day to conducting brief meetings in various workrooms in which girls are employed in the city.

An old friend of the movement, Mr. M. H. HODDER, presided. He spoke with deep thankfulness of the manner in which the blessing of God on the mission had been manifest during the year. While much good fruit of their labours had appeared, there was the feeling that only the fringe of the young life of the city had yet been touched. Not only in the different factories, but also at Jewin Street Welsh Chapel, where dinner-hour services are held, are there signs of growing interest and enthusiasm, Since removing from the old quarters to Jewin Street, the attendance has more than doubled.

Mrs. FISHER was warmly received. She recalled, with emotion, the commencement of her work, and its subsequent development, acknowledging the kindness and co-operation of many friends who had made it possible to reach so large a number of girls, with the object of winning them for Christ. Speaking of the many assuring signs that the efforts were not made in vain, Mrs. Fisher mentioned that only at the last monthly tea-meeting one of the young women at the close expressed anxiety of soul. She was pointed to the Saviour, whom she accepted in sincerity and faith.

Speaking as an employer, Mr. A. GARSTIN testified to the spirit of hearing which is becoming deeper. From inquiries he had found that young women were becoming more appreciative of the efforts made on their behalf, and even those who were at first indifferent are now in many cases willing to do all in their power to further the meetings. Mr. WATES, another employer, spoke in appreciative terms of the endeavours of Mrs. Fisher and her colleagues. It was well known that many of the girls came from homes where religious influence was unknown, hence the need for Christians devoting themselves to promoting their spiritual interests as opportunity offered.

A number of testimonies followed from both ladies and gentlemen, showing how warmly the workers are received and with what conviction their message has found its way to the hearts of the hearers.

The City of London Bible Class Union annual meeting was held on January 31 in the Lecture Hall, 186, Aldersgate Street, Mr. T. B. Miller in the chair. The speakers were Prebendary Webb-Peploe, and Mr. P. Russell Hurditch. About 300 young men from the City warehouses were present. The annual report was read by the secretary, Mr. D. W. MacKeith, who explained that the object of the Union is to support and strengthen the Bible classes that already exist in the City warehouses, and to introduce such classes where there are, as yet, no weekly meetings for Bible study. Mr. MacKeith made an earnest appeal for young men to come forward and help in this work.

Evangelistic.

Mr. W. D. Dunn at Airdrie.

A SERIES of evangelistic meetings, conducted by Mr. W. D. Dunn in the Baptist Church, Airdrie, was brought to a close on Wednesday week. The church was crowded. Mr. Dunn's faithful presentation of the Gospel has been greatly enjoyed; he spoke with power. Christians have been revived, backsliders restored, and many parents have had their prayers for their children answered. The pastor, Rev. W. Macintosh, and his people are deeply grateful for the mission. M.

Mr. T. Swanston Smith at Kentish Town.

A seven-days' mission has just been concluded at Trinity Presbyterian Church, Kentish Town Road, by Mr. T. Swanston Smith, of the Evangelization Society. Those who were brought into contact with Mr. Smith in connection with the Y.M.C.A. will not need to be told that he had no "new Gospel" to preach, but that he put the Gospel of the Grace of God plainly and faithfully before his hearers. Although the inclement weather somewhat interfered with the attendances, it was felt the Lord's presence was manifested. God's people were strengthened in their faith, and several, especially among the young, professed to find salvation. J. E. Rayner.

Mr. Monro Collings at Buntingford.

In connection with the Congregational Church a ten-days' mission has been conducted in Buntingford by Mr. Monro Collings. This was Mr. Collings's second visit to the town, and the local friends determined to leave no stone unturned in order to reach the people throughout this needy district. Twenty-two meetings were held, and, in spite of the cold weather and the frozen snow on the ground, all were well attended and full of spiritual warmth and power. At the last meeting Rev. G. Fraser Elliott told how many of the young people, for whom he had long prayed, had sought and confessed the Saviour. One pleasing feature of the mission has been the great eagerness displayed by preachers and people from the villages round about to come into the meetings. And it is believed that the strength and stimulus of the mission will be felt in all the country districts for many a day.

The Boy Preacher.

The West London Tabernacle, so well known in connection with the name of Mr. Henry Varley, was the scene of remarkable services on Lord's Day last, when Mr. Jack Cooke, the boy preacher, began a month's mission. The building is a capacious one, but proved too small to accommodate the crowds of people who sought admission. In the morning there was a splendid congregation, and at night the Tabernacle was densely crowded.

With Mr. Cooke were Mr. Coutts and the pastor, Rev. E. M. Todd. Mr. Cooke delivered characteristic addresses, speaking at considerable length, but holding the earnest attention of his congregations, and clearly setting forth the Gospel message. Many hearers were impressed, and, at the invitation of the evangelist, a number entered the inquiry room.

The mission is to last throughout February, services being held on Lord's Days at eleven and seven, and every other evening at eight.

Rev. John Wilson at Bishop's Stortford.

"There shall be showers of blessing." This is the promise which we pleaded prior to the mission which has been conducted in the Baptist Chapel (Pastor W. Walker's), Bishop's Stortford, by Rev. John Wilson, of Woolwich, and this is the promise which we have realized to be true. Mr. A. S. Barrett, president of the P.S.A., rendered splendid service; the P.S.A. Band was at our disposal, and through his influence we were able to hold a men's meeting on the Wednesday evening. The powerful utterances of Mr. Wilson, and the sweet singing of Madam Annie Ryall, made the services impressive. God gave the expected blessing. We were not surprised to see, on the last night of the mission, the vestries filled with those who were seeking, or already rejoicing in Christ. It is too early yet to tabulate results; some go to one place of worship and some to another, but we rejoice in this, that souls have been saved, and the Church quickened. W.

Mr. W. Collard has held a fifteen days' mission at Berachah Mission Hall, Tunbridge Wells, with acceptance. The meetings grew in power and interest, and a number sought the Saviour.

Rev. Jesse Mayo at Garforth, Leeds.

An eight-days' mission has been held at the Free Methodist Church, Garforth, Leeds, by Rev. Jesse Mayo, the result of which has been added blessing to those already in membership and the bringing back of wanderers. The Gospel was preached with force and acceptance, and the mission gave great encouragement, so that it was regretted that Mr. Mayo was unable to prolong his visit in this mining centre. Mr. Mayo has had considerable experience through travel, which has brought him in contact with different phases of human life. He is also ready for open-air work or personal visitation; and more than one old Christian and helpless sufferer has been cheered by his visitation. Mr. Mayo not only preaches, but occasionally sings the Gospel. He possesses some fine lantern slides, by which he illustrates a very instructive lecture. A. Longfellow, Garforth, Leeds.

St. Peter's Church, Everton.

A mission has been held at St. Peter's Church, Everton, Liverpool, by Mr. R. McLean, of the Evangelization Society. The vicar, Rev. T. W. H. Copner, the curate, Rev. A. G. Hopkins, and the other workers entered heartily into the effort.

From the first the presence of the Lord was manifest. The interest increased as the mission proceeded until on the last Lord's Day evening, every available space was crowded.

The clear Scriptural teaching of the evangelist was greatly enjoyed by Christians, who speak of the great blessing they have received. Night by night many of the unconverted were found in the inquiry-room seeking the way of salvation, and some decided for Christ while the message was being delivered.

A praise meeting was held on the concluding Saturday, when many testified to having received blessing. The vicar said he had been greatly encouraged. The gatherings proved that the Gospel has not lost its power, and the large number of young men present showed that nothing of a sensational nature is needed to draw men to church while Christ is preached. Many praise God for sending his servant to St. Peter's at this time. E. H.

Glasgow United Evangelistic Association.

Missions running nearly throughout the whole of January have been held in the Tent Hall and in Bethany Hall. In the former Mr. Charles Galletly, of the Evangelization Society, was the preacher, and Mr. William Thomson, jun., in the latter. The hand of the Lord has been stretched out in saving power, and souls have been won for Christ.

Owing to indisposition Mr. Galletly had to break off before his time had expired; but the meetings went on with the help of others, the Lord working and confirming the Word with signs following. At Bethany Hall, in connection with Mr. Thomson's limelight services, several hundreds have professed conversion.

The east end of the city has in it several churches in which there are earnest evangelical ministers, men who are true to the Gospel, and eager for the upbuilding of the kingdom of God; but it is not speaking disparagingly of others, or forgetfully either, to say that Bethany Hall, as a centre of Gospel effort, has been a great blessing to the district for many years. There goes on in it without a break a glorious work; and precious souls are ever being rescued through the Word of Life preached within its walls. It is in the district like a lighthouse on a rocky coast, and through its beams many a sin-wrecked soul has been saved.

J. C.

Mr. James Wharton has just concluded a ten-days' mission at West St. Leonards, in connection with the Hastings and St. Leonards Railway Mission.

Under the auspices of the North-West Ham Free Church Council, Mr. George Clarke has commenced a mission in the Town Hall, Stratford. The arrangements include a meeting for men on Lord's Day afternoon next, and "Bible Talks" in the Stratford Grove Wesleyan Church on Tuesdays, Wednesdays, and Thursdays. The mission concludes on February 20.

The mission conducted at Stirling under the auspices of the Federated Temperance Association by Rev. L. M. Isitt, of New Zealand, attracted increasing congregations. Mr. Isitt deeply interested the people by his eloquent description of the great temperance work done in New Zealand, while his appeals were of a telling character. Upwards of 400 new pledges were taken, and a profound impression was made by the mission.

At Higham Hill Navvy Mission Hall, Blackhorse Road, Walthamstow, a fruitful ten days' mission was recently conducted by Mr. T. Massey. This hall is for the use of men (and their families) employed on the East London new reservoirs. The spiritual results of the mission were very encouraging. On the last night of the mission many testified for the Saviour. Many families were blessed. The work was of a thoroughly solid character and free from mere excitement.

P. C. B.

Mr. Thomas Payne has conducted a month's mission at Newbiggin, Westmorland. Mr. Thomas Whitfield writes:—"Spiritual power and unction accompanied the messages to both saint and sinner. Many Christians consecrated themselves to the service of God, while a number of the unconverted have been brought to a saving knowledge of the truth. The whole dale appears to be under deep religious conviction."

From Kendal, an esteemed correspondent writes: "We have had Mr. J. H. Brunton with us for an eighteen days' mission. Interest in the meetings increased until, on the Lord's Day, we were crowded to excess. Mr. Brunton preached the Gospel in clear and soul-stirring fashion. There were many anxious inquirers, both men and women, and we had the joy of witnessing many confess Christ as their Saviour."

Mr. Tennyson Smith recently conducted a temperance mission at Llanfyllin. The Town Hall was crowded out after the third day, and the subsequent meetings were held in the Wesleyan chapel. One hundred and thirty-nine pledges were taken at the meetings, and the number is expected to be largely augmented, as forms of pledges distributed in the homes of the people prior to the mission have yet to be collected.

Mr. Alexander Clark, of the Evangelization Society, has just concluded a three weeks' mission in the Baptist Chapel, Kerry, Montgomeryshire. The meetings throughout were crowded; very earnest attention was given to the preacher with the result that many professed to find the Saviour, and begin the Christian life. God's people have been greatly refreshed and strengthened, and a deep impression was made on the whole community.

On February 3 Mr. William Forbes held, at the Christian Institute, Glasgow, a gathering for theatrical girls. Among the speakers were Rev. W. Fergus and Dr. Swanson. Continuing his provincial meetings, Mr. Forbes addressed gatherings at Manchester on February 6, and Liverpool on February 7. Local friends have arranged to continue the work at several centres. In several cities Mr. Forbes was able to arrange for those in bad health to receive medical advice, free.

During the three weeks' mission held at the Congregational Chapel, Marldon, near Torquay, conducted by Mr. A. E. Knight, of the Evangelization Society, the Gospel was earnestly and faithfully preached to the villagers, who gathered in large numbers. Backsliders were restored, and many souls were led to Christ, and are now rejoicing in Him. God's own people have received great blessing, and it is believed that the result of this mission will bring about a more powerful witness for Christ in the village. S. W. L.

Under the auspices of the Provident Teetotal Society a mission has been conducted at Exeter by Mr. Bob Johnson. The hall, which holds 300 people, proved far too small for each meeting, crowds being unable to gain admission. General interest was aroused throughout the city, and the audiences were deeply touched by Mr. Johnson's speaking and singing. During the ten days 120 temperance pledges were taken, and the cause received a great stimulus. The mission was full of encouragement.

A fruitful mission, in connection with the Church of England, was concluded at Weybridge on February 5. The churches were well attended, and Christians were spiritually helped by the clear addresses of the various preachers, while many of the ungodly were impressed as the truths of the Gospel were faithfully set forth. The final evening service at the parish church of St. James was a service long to be remembered. The Bishop of Southampton preached to a full congregation, and the closing hymn of the mission, "Safe in Arms of Jesus," was sung with fervour.

A valuable series of special services has just been conducted at the Wesleyan Methodist Chapel, Saffron Walden, by Mr. Herbert Pont, of the Evangelization Society. The interest steadily grew throughout the three weeks of the mission. Several decisions were made, and the whole church received a new impetus in the work of God. It is a quiet town and well supplied with churches and chapels, so that the striking results of untried fields are not to be expected, but the influence of the mission has been felt through all the town, and we are looking forward to the ingathering of much more fruit. R. H. Colwell (Minister).

The fruitful mission conducted by Mr. C. E. Barraclough, in the Primitive Methodist Chapel, Burncross, Sheffield, concluded on Wednesday night, January 29, when a good congregation assembled to hear his parting words. Large congregations gathered each night during the mission, and these were much moved by the earnest appeals which were made both to Christians, to live a consecrated life, and to the unconverted, to make an immediate decision for Christ. The Church has been quickened, the Sunday school has received a blessing, and several young people and some older ones have decided to live a godly life in the strength of the Lord Jesus Christ.

(Rev.) J. Badminton, Chapeltown, Sheffield.

Obituary.

DR. HENRY LANKESTER J.P., LEICESTER.

A LEADING figure in the religious life of Leicester has been removed by the death of Dr. Henry Lancaster, an ex-mayor of the borough. As an ardent supporter of the Gospel cause, and a notable worker in many religious and philanthropic undertakings, he was held in high esteem in the Midlands for his Christian character and consistent walk. We hope to give further particulars of Dr. Lankester's life and work in an early issue.

MR. J. SYDNEY COOPER, R.A.

Born 1803; born again 1809; departed to be with Christ 1902.

Mr. Sydney Cooper, the distinguished artist, fell asleep in Jesus a few days ago. I send you the following testimony, recorded by Mrs. Cooper, with the prayer that its witness may redound to the glory of God's Grace in Christ Jesus our Lord.

These sentences fell from Mr. Cooper's lips during a severe illness about a year ago:—"The doctor said, 'Everyone is asking how you are, Mr. Cooper.' He replied, 'It is very kind, but I am less anxious they should hear about my health, than that they should hear that God has rescued me by the blood of his beloved Son for an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, that fadeth not away, "reserved in heaven" for me. I want everyone to know that I am going to enjoy that inheritance with Christ.'

"One day he was speaking of the certainty of salvation, and said, 'If anyone asked me how I know that I am saved, I should say I know it better than if I had heard an angel out of heaven say so; for I might make a mistake about that, but I cannot make a mistake about the Word of God. The Lord Jesus said, "All that the Father giveth Me shall come to Me, and him that cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out." The Father has made my soul a present to his Son, and I know He will not take me away from Him.' To a friend who said, 'We must prepare for death,' he replied, 'The cross of our Lord Jesus Christ has done that for me.'

"Just two years ago, when suffering greatly, he said, with much calmness, in prayer to the Lord, 'It is a long life that I have had, and marvellously varied—storms and tranquility, sunshine and shadow—but Thou hast brought me through it all, and "I am a wonder unto many." I have no fear as I go on through the valley. Give me full submission to thy holy will. I have the peace of God, and the love of God in my soul. . . . I am cleansed in thy blood, and Thou dost comfort me with the blessed assurance that all my sins were obliterated at the Cross. Thou dost comfort me. Thou art the source of my comfort—I have no other, I want no other. May I have an easy issue into thy presence above.'

"This God has graciously now given him. May he, being dead, yet speak to those of us who are alive and remain. 'Buying up the opportunity, for the days are evil."

FRANK H. WHITE.

About Books.

A HISTORY OF MISSIONS.

"OF all existing histories of Protestant Missions, I have no hesitation in characterizing Dr. Warneck's as by far the best, not only in respect of the completeness and orderliness of its survey, but also in respect of insight into historical development and enlightened sobriety of judgment."

These are the words of Rev. George Robson, D.D., of Perth, in the Editor's Preface to an English translation (from the Seventh German Edition) of Dr. Warneck's great work.* It is twenty years since the first edition of this History appeared, and of that work, which was only a third the size of this, a translation into English was speedily prepared by Dr. Thomas Smith. The intervening years have witnessed rapid strides in missionary enterprise, and a large increase in literature dealing with the subject. Dr. Warneck's studies have all along been unremitting; and he rewrote his History on an enlarged plan for the third edition, which appeared in 1895. Since then four other editions have been called for, and each of them has been revised and brought up to date in all possible ways. When it is explained that the English translation was made from advance proof-sheets furnished by the author, it will be realized that the version has been prepared under the most favourable conditions. The work of translation was carried through by Rev. J. P. Mitchell, M.A., of Edinburgh, and Rev. Campbell M. Macleroy, B.D., of East Kilbride. The English reader has the additional benefit of welcome notes, explanatory and otherwise, from the pen of Dr. Robson.

All who have studied missions on a large scale—as they relate to the world, rather than to a country or continent—will allow the justice of Dr. Robson's commendation of Warneck's noble work. Missions have been the life-long study of the author of this History, and there is no disputing his eminence as an authority on the questions of principle and policy which constitute the singularly fascinating science of missions. The book is in two parts, the first of which deals with Missionary Life at Home, and the second with the Field of Evangelical Missions. Roman Catholic operations are mentioned occasionally, but no regular survey was possible. The author says: "The hope I had of the appearance of a new volume of the Missiones Catholicæ before the publication of the seventh edition has been disappointed. And the material otherwise provided in Roman Catholic missionary literature, both as regards reports and statistics, is too defective, and often too untrustworthy, to form the basis of a survey that would be in some measure satisfactory."

The chapters are in numbered sections, and bristling with facts. Dr. Warneck, however, does not stop here; he is not a mere chronicler, but a historian. Where tendencies may be estimated or judgments pronounced, whether these affect ethnic conditions or missionary enterprise, our author always has something to say, and he says it after the manner of the historian for candour, and in the spirit of the Christian for charity. We should not like to accept all his pronouncements regarding workers or methods, but we cannot but recognise the shrewd commonsense and keen insight which characterize his pages. He is a critic with a horror of empty rhetoric, and the reader soon realizes his serious purpose and absolutely honest point of view. The chapter which gives the history of the foundation and growth of missionary societies will be a revelation to many.

We bespeak for this splendid work a large circle of readers. It is marvellously encouraging as a record; and it also shows, in an impressive manner, how much remains still to be done. We can imagine that many a missionary would look upon the volume as an ideal present.

The "Twelve Sermons" series of discourses by Mr. Spurgeon has been greatly enriched by the latest on Decision. (1s. Passmore & Alabaster.) The great preacher was specially at home in his appeal to men and women to decide for Christ without delay.

The Bible Marker: A Course in Bible-marking, covering in a simple and comprehensive system the most important Bible topics, and comprising work for one year. By A. R. W. (1s. Marshall Bros.) The title page explains this little book with sufficient clearness. Some twenty-six subjects are treated, in a manner that will prove helpful and suggestive to Bible students.

A cheap edition has been published of Rev. J. George Gibson's Divine Song in its Human Echo (2s. 6d. E. Stock), which contains "a series of short, plain sermons on old-fashioned hymns." The point of view is that of the Church of England.

In the Bible Class Primers Series, Messrs. T. & T. Clark have published Babylonia and Assyria: A Sketch of Their History (6d.), by Ross G. Murison, M.A., lecturer in Oriental languages, University College, Toronto. The book is a triumph of compression and precision.

Young Protestants for the present month is replete with information on present-day topics, treated with a view to the instruction of our boys and girls. Among a variety of readable matter, there is the first of a series of articles on "The Seven King Edwards," and the story of the martyrdom of Rose Allen is sympathetically retold. (Id. 20, Exeter Hall.)

The handsome "Temple Classics" series has been enriched by an edition of The Holy War made by Shaddai upon Diabolus, by John Bunyan. (1s. 6d. nett. Dent & Co.) We know of no edition more neat and compact, beautifully printed, with marginal indication of the progress of the story, and a glossary of archaic and technical terms.

Teachers and leaders of children's services will welcome the annual volume of Young People. The contents are varied and of a highly useful character; and the hope of the editor that ministering spirits sent forth to minister may find in the pages a word they can emphasize in the training of children, young men, and maidens, will not be unfulfilled. (2s. Burroughs, 30, Furnival Street.)

Workers who appreciate the value of carefully prepared outlines of addresses, with suggestive illustration, will be grateful for having their attention drawn to Pictures of Christian Life and Service (1s. Morgan & Scott), by C. Edwards, of Winchester Soldiers' Home. The treatment of the topics shows an intimate knowledge of the letter of Scripture, accompanied by the light of the Holy Spirit on the page.

All the familiar features, statistical, personal, and historical, of that useful compendium of denominational and general information, the Baptist Handbook, are found in the issue for 1902. The Baptists have been particularly busy with building schemes during the past year, hence the illustrations of new churches are more than usually plentiful. The records have been evidently prepared with loving care. (2s. Veale, Chifferiel & Co.)

Those whose minds turn to the philosophic side of the Christian faith and teaching will find in Momenta of Life (5s. Elliot Stock) a thoughtful and helpful—though it must be admitted by no means simply expressed—series of essays on such problems, by Rev. Dr. James Lindsay (Kilmarnock). The great influence of Schleiermacher on modern theology is shown, and true mysticism is carefully distinguished from that which is false and dangerous.

Dr. J. R. Miller's new book, The Ministry of Comfort (3s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton) is as good as the best that have come from his fruitful pen. Dedicated to those who are called to pass through trial, the pages are designed to make hearts braver and stronger in the hard and painful ways of life. This is a volume which many will read to great profit. It unfolds the secret of hope and trust, and conveys messages of happiness and peace.

The Son of Man: A Simple Story of the Life of our Lord Jesus Christ. By Aley Fox. (5s. nett. Elliot Stock). Prebendary E. C. Sumner Gibson, D.D., writes a preface to this book, declaring its object to be "to set before Church people a plain and accurate account of the conditions of our Lord's earthly life and ministry, and to trace the main outlines of his preaching and its method; and it has the great merit of so describing his earthly life as never to lose sight of his Divinity, thus seeking to be true to the whole of the Gospels." Miss Fox has aimed at providing a simple "Life of Christ," and the style will be specially agreeable to young readers. On some controverted points Miss Fox writes with a precision which is hardly consistent with full knowledge and due caution.

The Foundation of British East Africa, by J. W. Gregory, D.Sc., Professor of Geology in the University of Melbourne (6s. nett. Horace Marshall & Son), is a historical volume of great interest. As the author well says in the preface, British East Africa "has a three-fold history—geographical, political, and administrative—dealing respectively with the story of its exploration, the struggle for its possession, and the beginning of its commercial development." Professor Gregory's aim was to do justice to all three aspects in an outline story that should be at once readable and reliable; and he has achieved a large measure of success. Those who would know the history of the Protectorate—from the adventurous voyages of the ancient merchants and Arab traders down to the establishment of British rule—will find here a comprehensive sketch written in a popular style. Considerable space is also devoted to the deeply interesting history of Uganda. There are excellent maps and illustrations.

* OUTLINE OF A HISTORY OF PROTESTANT MISSIONS, from the Reformation to the Present Time: A Contribution to Modern Church History. By Gustav Warneck, Professor and Doctor of Theology. Authorized Translation, edited by George Robson, D.D. Portrait of the Author and twelve maps. (10s. 6d. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

The Lessons of Uganda.

THE Missionary Breakfast arranged annually in connection with the C.M.S. was held at Oxford last Saturday, and was well attended, notwithstanding a heavy fall of snow which had taken place immediately before. From the chair Canon CHRISTOPHER thanked God for the number of seniors and juniors of the University who had come together to hear of God's work in the heart of Africa. He accepted this as a proof that there is in Oxford a very earnest desire to promote obedience to our Lord's last command. Recalling the debt of gratitude which the Church owes to Oxford missionaries, he referred in terms of deepest affection to what had been wrought by Bishop Patterson, Bishop French, John William Knott, Bishop Hannington, and others.

A very hearty welcome was accorded to the BISHOP OF UGANDA, who, in a very interesting address, drew a contrast between the terribly savage condition of the country at the commencement of missionary work and its happy, peaceful, and prosperous state now, with its hundreds of churches and thousands of converts to Christianity, and said there were many more labourers wanted in the mission field yet. He spoke in very hopeful terms of the extension of the work of the native ministry.

The lessons of Bishop Tucker's words were enforced and driven home point by point by the BISHOP OF OXFORD, who thanked him for having fastened on the hearts of all the true principles of mission work, and reinforced for them the certainty of the strongest power in this tangled, struggling life; he had bidden them, as only one who had faced and done what he had faced and done could, to recognise clearly and simply what were ultimately the forces of God's work in the world, and he (Dr. Paget) trusted that no faintheartedness, no reliance on false and unreal appearances and effectiveness, no tampering with worldliness in any of its many forms, might weaken for them the impression he had left on them.

A Christian at Sea.*

BY CAPTAIN H. TOYNBEE.

AS a help to Sunday observance, when engaging my crew I entered on the articles of agreement that they should attend Divine service on Sunday morning. Several got to attend the evening service also, which was not compulsory. This rule led me not to do any unnecessary work on Sundays. I even avoided making a large amount of sail when the wind came fair, and believe that I lost nothing by so doing.

Early influences had led me to respect Sunday, the day set apart, or "hallowed" by God for holy or religious use immediately after the Creation; for we learn that "In six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the seventh day, and hallowed it" (Fourth Commandment). Nothing can be more important than the keeping of this Commandment, considering how, ever since the fall, true religion has been distasteful to unregenerate man.

It became a habit with me to confine my Sunday reading to the Bible and books expounding its teaching. By God's blessing on this practice, I got a more thorough knowledge of Christianity than I otherwise should have done. I learned how the Old Testament, with its ceremonies and sacrifices, was typical of Christ's grand work for fallen man, which is so clearly set forth in the New Testament, showing that Christ, who was both God and man, bore the punishment for the sins of the whole world, and became Redeemer, Sanctifier, and even Justifier of every human being, however sinful he may have been, who is willing to go to Him in true repentance and accept his grand offer. Then again I was led to observe the way in which the children of Israel were warned by the prophets—Jeremiah, for instance—and eventually punished for neglecting God and relapsing into the ways of the world, which is an awful warning to Christians, who are so much more clearly warned by the life of Christ and his marvellous teaching and threats to keep them from relapsing.

From REMINISCENCES OF MY LIFE (3d. The Author, 12, Upper Westbourne Terrace, W.), in which Captain Toynbee (F.R.A.S., F.R.G.S., F.R. Met. S.) gives a graphic and interesting account of many experiences during his seafaring life and of the deing of the Lord under unpromising circumstances.

The Churches.

 The Editor will be glad to receive "post-card" notes for this page, of* SPIRITUAL PROGRESS AND EFFORT in the Churches. They must be prompt, reliable, and NOT TRIVIALITIES; and be accompanied by sender's name and address.

Church of England.

The Church Missionary Society has accepted an offer of service from Rev. G. H. Moule, curate of Wareham, for work in Japan.

The Church Army has just held its fourth mission in Pentonville Prison, N. Nearly every one of the prisons throughout the country has received two or three visits from the Society's evangelists, and the chaplains speak warmly of this new departure.

A set of burglar's tools has been given to Mr. Colin F. Campbell, hon. social secretary of the Church Army, as a present from an ex-burglar, who has turned his back upon the old life of crime, and determined to live honestly. He thinks the tools will now be "in better hands."

The Archbishop of Canterbury paid a visit to the parish church of Lewisham on Sunday in order to preach to men. Over 1,600 men were crowded into the church, many hundreds being unable to obtain admission. Dr. Temple took for his subject, "The greatest of these is charity."

Speaking at the tenth annual meeting of the Bishop of Liverpool's Clergy Sustentation Fund for supplementing the incomes of underpaid clergy in the diocese, held on Friday last, Bishop Chavasse said that pew rents are more or less doomed. In some cases churches which have been supported by wealthy congregations are now left entirely to the poor, and ministers are consequently starving. It is becoming more and more a custom for people to attend church without taking any sittings. The Bishop heartily agreed with a statement in the report, that a clergyman cannot do his work properly if he has to lie awake at night considering how to make ends meet.

Congregational.

Rev. R. J. Campbell, of Brighton, has declined the call to Christ Church, Westminster, in succession to Rev. F. B. Meyer.

Rev. D. B. Hooke has intimated to the directors of the Colonial Missionary Society his intention to comply with their wish for him to visit the churches and missions of New Zealand. Last year, through a serious breakdown in health, Mr. Hooke was unable to undertake it, but it is now thought that the voyage will do much to complete his restoration. Mr. and Mrs. Hooke will leave early in June, travelling via Cape Town.

The Worcestershire Union has passed a series of resolutions on Dr. Parker's proposals, a copy of which has been sent to each church in the county. The Union accepts a federation of the churches on the lines suggested, with certain modifications in respect of the powers of administration to be possessed by the General Council. The proposed title is not approved, that of "The Union of Congregational Churches" being suggested.

At Matlock Bank, Rev. R. Augustus Foster, who has just completed his first year of service, presided at the annual meeting of the church, which was held recently. Thirty-five new members have been added during the year, a number which has only once before been reached in the history of the church. The Secretary, Mr. E. Slack, stated that both spiritually and financially the year has been full of encouragement.

Baptist.

Since the opening of the Soho Church, Birmingham, in December last, there has been a continued increase in the congregations. On Sunday week the Pastor (Rev. A. C. Jarvis), after preaching from the words, "What mean ye by this service?" (Exodus xii. 26), immersed six believers.

Rev. G. T. Ennals, of Upminster, has accepted the pastorate of Clarence Road Church, Southend. The invitation was unanimous and very cordial; and those who know Mr. Ennals will congratulate the church on its choice. For ten years Mr. Ennals presided over the church at Cann Hall, Leytonstone, where he did a splendid work. Many are to-day praising God for his life and testimony.

At the Horley Church special services were recently held to celebrate the second anniversary of the pastors' settlement. Sermons were preached by Revs. E. H. Tarbox, of the Home Counties' Association, and John Wilson, of Woolwich Tabernacle. The pastor, Rev. H. R. Cripps, occupied the chair a public meeting, and was supported by local ministers ant friends. The proceeds of the services amounted to over £50.d

At the annual meeting of the Penge Tabernacle, S.E. (Pastor J. Wesley Boud), the reports read showed a year of progressive work. The number of members at the last annual meeting was 659, and there had been received into fellowship sixty-three during the year. The reports from the mission stations were highly satisfactory. In support of various funds £2,116 17s. 3d. had been raised.

The thirteenth anniversary of Ferme Park Church was celebrated on Sunday and Monday. Rev. Charles Brown (pastor) exchanged pulpits with Rev. J. H. Jowett, who conducted both services. Visits of the Birmingham preacher to the metropolis are few and far between, and it was not surprising to find both morning and evening the church filled to overflowing. Mr. Jowett's sermon on each occasion was a memorable utterance. A special evangelistic service was held on Monday evening, when the pastor presided.

At the annual meeting of the church at Barrow-in-Furness, the pastor, Rev. Wm. Walker, being in the chair, interesting accounts of progress were given. The year's accounts showed a balance in hand, and the chapel building debt is now only £350. Two new class-rooms, much needed by the Sunday-school, have been added and paid for. The twelve representatives of the various church organizations all gave brief reports, and spoke thankfullyand hopefully Of the new mission in Old Barrow encouraging news was received.

A meeting has been held at Salter's Hall Church, Baxter Road, N., to inaugurate the missionary union which has recently been formed in connection with the church. The chief object of the new society is to stimulate practical interest on behalf of foreign missions, and Rev. Arthur Mayo, who has been accepted by the Baptist Missionary Society for work on the Congo, has been appointed its missionary representative. Rev. J. B. Myers occupied the chair, and Rev. J. H. Weeks (from the Congo) gave a graphic account of his missionary experiences.

Methodist.

The Primitive Methodist missionary income shows an increase of over £800 for the year.

Primitive Methodism is growing at Ambie, Northumberland, a station formerly in Blyth Circuit, but now under the Missionary Committee. A church, school, and manse are to be built, and £700 is in hand.

The Victoria Hall, East Greenwich (Wesleyan), erected a few years since, is the centre of a busy work for Christ. All the mission agencies are in active operation, under the superintendence of Rev. John Kinnings and the energetic missioner, Mr. Frank E. Barritt.

The Wesleyan "Girls' Helpful Society," which has by its associates done good service among young girls in various ways for some years past, is now merged into the Girls' Aid Department of the Children's Home. A special committee of ladies, with Mrs. Gregory as president and Mrs. Shepherd as hon. secretary, has been elected to manage this branch of the work. It is sought to have an associate in every town, to whom may be committed the oversight of any girls in a situation there.

Presbyterian.

Rev. Z. B. Woffendale presided recently at the celebration of the twenty-eighth anniversary of his pastorate at Somers Town, N.W., when cheering reports were presented of the year's work. Over fifty names have been added to the church roll during the past year. The church is looking forward to a great revival in connection with the forthcoming mission to young people.

A very successful meeting was held lately at Hoxton Mission to welcome Rev. W. M. Macdonald, late of Sunderland, who has been appointed to the charge of this large mission, which has been carried on for many years by the congregation of Highbury, N. Rev. Peter Carmichael, B.D., presided, and addresses were given by Revs. J. Kerr Craig, A. Jeffery, and Mr. Robert Wales.

The report of Regent Square Church, W.C. (Rev. Alex. Connell), says the past year will long be remembered with a strange interest by those who are spared to follow the future development of Regent Square. Changes are coming quickly; the intervening touch of death has rested heavily on the congregation, and has deprived many branches of work of the assistance and counsel of valued friends, young as well as old. But amid sorrow and change, reports from all sectional organizations of the church show that its resources are still great, that willing help is forthcoming, and that unity of spirit and zeal for Christian enterprise are ever the good objects in view.

Society of Friends.

A new mission hall was opened at Halton, Hastings, on February 5. The building, which is substantially built, contains a large hall, a class-room at the side, and also a coffee shop, and rooms for the caretaker. Mr. R. H. Penney, J.P., of Brighton, took the chair at the opening ceremony. Mr. Samuel Beck stated that the building cost £1,500, the large part of which has been paid. Continuing, he related the history of the Mission, and spoke of himself becoming convinced and converted, and assisting with others in its formation. Mr. Ruff (late superintendent) said the strength of the mission lay in the earnest, self-denying men and women who laboured for it.

Mr. R. Bamber, of the London City Mission, continues his work among the canal boat population at Brentford with encouraging results. On Lord's Day last there were thirty-four "monkey" boats at Brentford in addition to other craft. Mr. Bamber visited the boats. In the afternoon a number of the children were gathered in to hear the Gospel message, and at night the small mission-room was crowded with people from the various craft.

On Tuesday, February 4. at 8 p.m., a Bible Meeting was held at Central Hall, Philpot Street, E. Sir Robert Anderson, K.C.B., LL.D. presided, and delivered a powerful address, exalting the infallible and plenarily-inspired Word of God. Other speakers likewise emphasized the importance and practical meaning of a Scriptural Rule of Faith. Further particulars of the work may be had from Percy W. Heward, general secretary, 14, Pier Head, Wapping, London, E.

Five years ago a lady commenced an undenominational Sunday school near Gosport, and as the work grew a mission room was opened for school in the afternoon and a service in the evening. The meetings were well attended and blessing was given. In March, 1900, the initiator of the work removed, and there has been a difficulty in finding someone to carry it on. It requires someone who can give time to visitation and who has a gift for speaking and for dealing with children. The work, it is feared, must be abandoned unless someone able to devote time and care to it comes forward. Communications on the subject may be addressed to Miss E. Bartholomew, 3, Scarth Road, Barnes, S.W.

Mr. Frederick L. Grosvenor, writing from 22, Lichfield Road, Cricklewood, appeals for "help on one or more days of the week in connection with an interdenominational mission which is affiliated to the Sunday School and Ragged School Unions, but whose usefulness is sorely crippled for lack of workers. The work is confined to a colony of railway employés who, with their wives and children, number about 600 souls. The mission-hall, which is free of debt, is near to the cottages, and within twenty minutes' walk of Child's Hill Station (Midland Railway), and thirty minutes of the Cricklewood omnibus terminus. Converted men and women, without fee or reward, and out of love for the Master are invited to assist in Band of Hope, Christian Endeavour, open-air, district visiting, Bible class, and other work." Mr. Grosvenor will be glad to supply further particulars on application.

Fallen Asleep.

On Lord's Day evening, Mrs. W. LEVERMORE, wife of the Sunday-school superintendent of the West London Tabernacle, a lady who was widely esteemed for her Christian character.—Rev. FREDERICK A. LEES, a young and able Wesleyan missionary, after but a short span of service on the West Coast of Africa.—Free Methodists have sustained a serious loss on the mission field by the death of Rev. CHARLES CONSTERDINE in East Africa.—At Monkstown, co. Cork, Rev. FRANCIS DOUGLASS, Methodist minister, aged seventy-four years.—At Downpatrick, ARCHDEACON PRICE, at an advanced age.

A Portrait of John Bunyan.—One of the two authentic portraits of the author of "The Pilgrim's Progress" which are known to be in existence has been secured for display in the National Portrait Gallery. It was painted from life only six years before Bunyan died, and consequently it is of the greatest historic value.

Notes & Comments

Unauthorized Insets. We frequently receive complaints from readers who receive their copy of The Christian through a newsagent, that advertisement sheets of various kinds are inserted between the pages, some of them being quite out of keeping with the character of the paper. It is impossible for the publishers to exercise control over the issue after it has left their hands, and local newsagents are apt to receive advertisement sheets from tradespeople, which they insert for remuneration. We can only repeat what we have said many times, that no authorized insets are inserted except at the Christmas season, and that all such emanating from this office bear the headline containing the words, "Supplement to the Christian," of the same date as the issue containing them.

"Practical Papers." The series of "Practical Papers" that have appeared in these columns will in a few days be issued in book form by Messrs. Morgan & Scott, under the title of Dreams and Realities. (Cloth, 1s.)

The True Mission of the Pulpit. To our mind, Dr. Guinness Rogers goes to the root of things in his article which appears on page 12. That the preacher is "an ambassador of God," and that the crying need of the world is the Gospel given him to proclaim, are verities that have been too freely set aside of late years. Dr. Rogers has lived long enough to see the pendulum swing both ways. He writes of what his eyes have seen, and his experience is worth more than all the experiments of fanciful theories of which the weary world is tired.

Inter-denominational Amenities. A very graceful act of interdenominational courtesy has just been witnessed. It was the turn of the Primitive Methodists to supply a president for the Free Church Federation. Their representatives, however, voluntarily waived their right in order to offer the honourable post to Dr. Parker, that he might fill the highest post among the Free Churches during the period of his active ministry. Dr. Parker's unstinted service to Evangelical religion has thus received crowning recognition in a way that must be specially grateful to him, as well as honourable to all concerned. The incident further indicates how the evil spirit of aloofness and discord among the various churches is being supplanted by a cordial brotherhood and mutual regard. The principle embodied in the words, "In honour preferring one another," has here received a fresh and impressive illustration.

Our New Ally. The announcement of a defensive alliance between this country and Japan has taken the world by surprise. It is an entire reversal of our policy of "splendid isolation" and marks a step in a new and untried direction. It is reassuring that, on the whole, the new situation has relieved the state of international tension which has followed the recent course of events in the East, and that the treaty is generally held to be a guarantee of peace. Japan has risen to a remarkable position within the last few years. Quietly but surely the Japanese have absorbed civilised ideas—borrowing them largely from us—until it is clear that they are a people to be seriously reckoned with. This is the political view of the case.

Is it an Unholy Alliance? There is, however, another aspect to the treaty which is exercising many devout Christian minds — namely, "How far should Christian England go, in making common cause with an admittedly un-Christian power?" With the object-lesson of Israel before us, and the Divine prohibitions in regard to alliance with heathen nations, it is not easy to view hopefully the present step, from a Christian point of view. At any rate, our primary duty to evangelize Japan is more imperative than ever.

A Veteran's Birthday. Last week, Dr. Alexander McLaren, of Manchester, attained his seventy-sixth birthday, and the testimony concerning him given by a northern daily will be generally endorsed. Our contemporary referred to him as the most popular preacher in Lancashire, combining in himself "the wisdom of age with the vigour of youth," being far more active than many a man of twenty-one, and as bold as St. Paul:—

> First, he is a Christian; secondly, he is an orator; thirdly, he is perhaps the best expositor of the Bible we have—he has the Book in his heart and on his tongue; and, lastly, he believes what he preaches.

As a tireless writer, too, Dr. McLaren reaches and influences another huge congregation, and we trust he may be long spared to labour in both fields.

In the World, yet not of it. The question is frequently asked, How far should a Christian concern himself with civic and national affairs? and the evident answer is, Just so far as he believes in the application of principles of justice and humanity to the government of a city and of a nation. The denunciation of sin should be accompanied by practical effort to substitute righteousness. In efforts to educate the civic conscience in regard to State-created drink monopolies, to traders that blight the worker, to the exaction of rack-rents for slum property, and a number of other evils, the Christian may work for his Master, and do something to prepare the way for the spreading of his Kingdom. As Dr. McLaren has said, in a recent speech at Glasgow:—

> Municipalities have much to do in checking by their action, or furthering by their negligence—and in some cases by their selfish complicity—the vices that are swaying our country.

State-Sown Tares. It is evident that during a period of agitation for improved legislation in regard to the dread drink traffic, much may be done by the wise utilization of existing means. The chairman of the London United Temperance Council commends the London County Council as a strong ally in temperance reform in removing, when possible, "licensed temptation" from congested districts. The example is worthy of imitation in other cities and towns, but, unfortunately, it is difficult to find a district that is not "congested" at every corner.

Lord Dufferin. The death of Lord Dufferin brings to a close a brilliant and useful career under circumstances of pathetic sorrow and eclipse. It has been said of him that there was not one of the high offices which he held that was not filled with consummate ability and adorned with conspicuous distinction. But during his later years he had been drawn into association with a circle of financiers who exploited him for their own ends, and involved him in disastrous loss and discredit through no personal fault of his own. His health was shaken by the discovery that his name had been used as a cloak for doubtful transactions, and a sad cloud thus covered the closing years of his brilliant and honourable life. This is a very definite warning to public men to keep clear of that class of financiers who are always endeavouring to win the confidence of the public for nefarious purposes by using their name and credit in a spurious way. More than one noble career has thus been blighted, and confiding people have been robbed of their money under false pretences.

The Betting Evil. It is a remarkable thing that three such men as the Chairman of Tattersall's, the Chief Constable of Manchester, and London's Chief Magistrate, representing, as they do, the extremes of opinion upon the subject of gambling, should agree in censuring the newspapers for publishing racing "tips." The reasons given by the three men differ widely, but they reach the same conclusion. And we think that among the respectable classes there will be only one opinion as to the soundness of the conclusion. Whether the "tips" given are honest or not in themselves, the effect of them is the opposite of honest. In catering for gamblers the newspaper prostitutes its powers. Several journals tried, for a time, the experiment of excluding all betting intelligence, but the drop in circulation caused them to return to the old system. Individual attempts to lessen the evil seem to court failure. The only thing to do is to strike at the whole thing by making the publication of tips in newspapers illegal. This would only be a slight extension of a principle already in force in other directions.

The Strenuous Life. America may well congratulate itself upon its President. His influence from the very first has been most unmistakably on the side of all that is holy and pure and true. A little volume of his addresses and essays just published in this country will command a wide public, and it will be to the advantage of any young man to read such sane and forcible teaching. "The strenuous life" is the leading note not only of this volume, but of the President's own career. Our gilded youth and the large class of young men whose sole ambition is to get as much money for as little work as possible might with advantage read words like these, delivered to clubmen two years ago :—

A life of slothful ease—a life of that peace which springs merely from lack either of desire or of power to strive after great things, is as little worthy of a nation as an individual.

A Noble Heritage. The history of the French family of Monods is a remarkable illustration of the hereditary principle in religion. For more than a century the family has been distinguished by its warm Evangelical piety, and for the number of distinguished men it has produced. According to L'Evangéliste, writing on the birth centenary of the great French Protestant preacher, Adolphe Monod, the first generation, a family of twelve, gave four of its members to the ministry, all conspicuous for their intense devotion, while a fifth son was a physician of distinction, and a daughter, Adèle, was as great a religious influence as her brothers. The second and third generations furnished a still greater number of pastors, doctors, and publicists, and the fourth has at this time as many as twenty pastors in its circle. The original parents were marked by simple piety, and of a deeply spiritual temperament. For a whole century their example has been cherished as an inspiration by their descendants, who now number over 400.

Growth of French Protestantism. Pastor Ch. Merle-d'Aubigné replies to Mr. Richard Heath's article on the decay of Protestantism in France in The Contemporary, and cites encouraging figures to the contrary, which show that in the centres of population it is increasing. In 1835 Paris had only ten Protestant churches, to-day there are 105 in the city and suburbs. In 1857 there were only 738 pastors in France, now there are more than 1,200. Whole villages have here and there come over to the Protestant faith, and have been found faithful ; while they have never had so many candidates for the ministry, the theological halls having double as many students under instruction as was the case thirty years ago. Though the whole of French Protestants number less than the population of Glasgow, they contribute £267,000 annually towards the support of religious and charitable institutions, and there is a growing tendency to supply and support men for the foreign mission field.

The Gallican Church. The Observer recently called attention to the Gallican movement, which is undoubtedly spreading in certain parts of France. In Paris alone there are thirty-eight chapels where Gallican services are held, and this one fact is sufficient to discount Cardinal Richard's dictum that Gallicanism possesses no power. At the heart of the movement there is a revolt from the interference of the Roman Curia, and an insistence upon the use of the vernacular in Church services. But the manifest weakness of the whole thing is its adherence to Roman Catholic dogma. The rearrangement of ecclesiastical machinery is a mere trifle compared with what is actually needed ; and whilst the Gallican movement is really a Protestant expression at its centre, it can never lead to complete emancipation until the superstitious dogmas of Rome go overboard. The failure of Père Hyacinthe's work is proof of this. But even this movement in France may be but the initial stage of a deeper and more thorough work.

Unity in Slavery. With the death of Professor Kraus, of Freiburg University, the Vatican loses a thorn from its side. Perhaps the greatest of the opponents of the Papal Infallibility claim, and of the Jesuits, Dr. Kraus was a noteworthy example of a priest detested by the Index both as thinker and writer, and openly classed as a renegade, yet remaining in communion with Rome upon a merely sentimental basis of the value and desirability of unity. His writings, however, led many to renounce the errors of Rome, and to find a spiritual and intellectual freedom of which he apparently failed to avail himself.

Vaticanism in China. Dr. Arthur Smith, who has spent twenty-nine years in China as a missionary of the American Board, speaks with knowledge and authority in his new volume, "China in Convulsion," especially in regard to religious questions affecting that country. The writer deals lucidly with the most difficult problem in Chinese missions, the antipathy shown by the literati, from the village schoolmaster to the retired officials, towards all extraneous teaching. But it is with reference to the methods of Romanism in the great Empire that the book is especially valuable. Dr. Smith throws a very lurid light upon the action of a large section of the Roman Catholic missionaries as provocative of the recent disturbances, and shows clearly how these agents aimed at and obtained political power. There is a rooted belief on the part of the people, supported by weighty evidence from all sides, that the Roman Church in China is a refuge for infamous persons who, as Mrs. Bishop (Isabella L. Bird) also has said, can under the banner of the Roman protection evade all Chinese laws. Add to this, and to the injustice exhibited towards natives in the courts in which the political ecclesiastics have influence, the excessive compensation, often over 800 per cent. on the actual loss, obtained by the priests, and it becomes easy to understand the unrest of the population as to missionary effort.

The Irrepressible Turk. The attention of Christian people is called to the growing hostility of the Turkish Government towards the Christians of Asia Minor, where there are signs of renewed persecution. The methods pursued are characteristically subtle and insidious. Justice is being systematically refused to Christians in the courts, and a persistent effort made to paralyze them in their commercial and private affairs. This is the historic prelude to sterner measures. The policy of the authorities is to goad Christians into open resentment and disturbance by methods of petty oppression, and when the flame of opposition breaks out to massacre inoffensive but outraged citizens on the plea of insurrection. The Government ought to demand a knowledge of the facts, and to give them the fullest light. Publicity is the only way to meet the policy of the Turk. Only when the indignant eyes of the civilised world are known to be upon him can he be brought to his senses. "They love darkness because their deeds are evil."

The Treatment of the Native. The paper read before the Royal Geographical Society by Rev. Thomas Lewis on the treatment of the African native, comes at an opportune moment. Mr. Lewis very clearly shows that where so much depends upon native labour, the development of the country itself depends largely upon the way in which the native is treated. A missionary who for twenty years has lived in close personal touch with natives is better qualified than any man to speak of their possibilities. "The blank mind of the savage," which is appealed to as a reason for their ill-treatment, is shown to be a myth, since even in their repulsive fetish worship there is present a definite course of reasoning—from bad premises, of course, but still reasoning. And what Africa needs is not the whip and the gun, but the Gospel, the teacher, and kindness. The Mother Country will have to keep a careful eye upon the adventurers who will soon pour into Africa. If we have fought this Boer war for freedom, we must respect freedom for all when it is over.

Continuous Evangelism. The veteran Dr. Cuyler has been moved to write with affectionate earnestness to his ministerial brethren upon the matter of continuous evangelism in the ordinary ministrations of the Lord's Day. He refers to his own early ministry, and recalls the awakenings in 1848 and 1866 in his own church, when large numbers of persons were converted through his own preaching, and under the regular agencies of pulpit and people. These awakenings were due, he believes, to his custom of delivering quite frequently an "earnest, pungent, and persuasive discourse" to the unconverted ; and he suggests to his brethren that they deliver faithful, arousing, and guiding discourses to the unconverted. The sight of inquirers going in to meet the pastor will do more to awaken the sleepers in the church than the visit of any itinerant or of any evangelistic committees.

These are wise words, and need acting upon. The ideal of every minister should be to see a work of continuous conversion going on in his church. There is no surer way of maintaining the spiritual life of any community than that of continuous evangelism.

The Burden of Inheritance. It is, no doubt, possible to lay too much stress upon "heredity," and there is a tendency to substitute it for personal responsibility. But we cannot ignore it, or deny its influence altogether. Dr. Andrew Wilson has recently demonstrated that, to a very large extent, alcoholism is a matter of inheritance. Without unduly forcing the argument, he says :—

If a man acquires the alcoholic habit, his children surely are bound to exhibit some degeneracy or other which tends to throw them more forcibly in the direction of the parental weakness than the offspring of sober folks.

There is nothing in this of the "necessary epidemics of drunkenness," of which we have heard too much ; it is merely an echo of the Divine warning given in Ex. xxxiv. 7.

Cash versus Credit. Public attention is again being called to the fact that the great mass of the business with which our county courts are occupied, is debt collecting. The credit system of the country becomes more complicated year by year ; and merchants in different trades complain of the difficulty of obtaining prompt settlement of accounts. But the root of the evil lies in the credit demanded of the retailer, a practice which shows no sign of diminution. It is well that all who accept goods on credit, on however small a scale, should understand that they are to that extent responsible for the gravest difficulties the trader has to face thereby, in the end, adding very materially to the cost of the goods. Cash transactions with the retailer would enable him to make short terms with the manufacturer, and lead to the solution of many problems.

The Bane of the Bookstall.

WE have frequently expressed our sense of the moral dangers arising from some of the literature and pictorial papers displayed upon the railway bookstalls of the United Kingdom. There is no doubt that a large sale is made of periodicals whose only aid for circulation is their pandering to low and depraved tastes. Thus what should be a public boon is fast becoming an intolerable bane.

Not long since The Times, in a leading article, made the following trenchant remarks :—

> Our observation convinces us that all concerned, railway readers and those who cater for them, have given too little thought to this matter.
>
> Real books . . . are seldom read nowadays in railway compartments.
> We are concerned for the people who are dependent for their mental refreshment upon the bookstalls.

Quotations then follow from a leading article in The Times of fifty years ago (August 9, 1851), upon the work of Mr. W. H. Smith, in cleansing the railway bookstalls of vicious publications, and stocking them with good literature.

> On (his) acquiring the sole right of selling books on the L. and N.W. Railway . . . at one fell swoop the injurious heap was removed; and every work of interest as it appeared was furnished to the stalls.

To-day, in 1902, The Times says :—

> We in our turn have made a little tour of the most important London railway stations; but with what different results, even at the once immaculate Euston! . . . Is it not time to attempt another revolution like that of half a century ago?

It is a crying shame that a huge monopoly like the bookstall system should cater so largely for those whose tastes border upon the sensual and immoral. Retail stores in the City supply wealth of good and wholesome literature which is abundantly appreciated, and there is no reason why the bookstalls should not do the same. In Ireland, where the railway monopoly is held by Messrs. Eason and Son, much of the literature found at English stations is forbidden. Yet we hear no cry that such prohibition leads to financial loss.

It becomes a question for Christian shareholders in the various railway companies to deal with, since they participate in the profits from bookstall rentals. Let them make their voices heard as they have in various matters relating to Sunday traffic, and they may do untold good.

Four Acts of Parliament exist, directed against anyone who "shall sell, or offer for sale, or distribution, or exhibit to public view, any profane, indecent, or obscene book, paper, print, drawing, or representation, to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers." Why are they allowed to become a dead letter?

To-day, as never in earlier years, our stations are thronged with young folk of both sexes who purchase literature from these sources of supply. Suggestive pictures and highly-seasoned trash stare them in the face and tempt them to buy. It may be objected that "demand creates supply." We believe it is far more true that supply creates demand. People buy what they see, and these monopolies have it in their power to direct the public taste to an enormous extent. In view of the present scandalous condition of things, it is high time to adopt strong measures to stop the demoralization which is spreading day by day.

It is also needful, by-the-way, to keep an eye upon the improvised Sunday stalls, which are allowed to stand at certain hours at terminal stations, when the regular stalls are closed.

An Incentive to Right Living.

SOME time ago a friend said her constant prayer was, "Lord, make me to know how short my time is" (Psa. lxxxix. 47). We all need to pray it, for it is a side of truth that the devil seeks to make us forget. St. Paul continually reminded his converts of the fact. Take, for instance, 1 Cor. vii. 29-31. We often hear preachers speak to the unsaved of the shortness of time, but in this passage St. Paul addresses Christians, "This I say, brethren." No people need more to be reminded of the fact that the "time is short." We see around us those who at one time were on fire for God, now lukewarm and settled down into an easy life, as if they had many years to live. Time is short to glorify God, time is short to sacrifice, time is short to suffer, time is short to win souls. All these opportunities will end when we get to heaven, and so, because the time is short, St. Paul tells these Christians

HOW TO LIVE.

1. Not to be absorbed in or hindered by people. "It remaineth that . . . they that have wives be as though they had none." With how many the beginning of backsliding has been when they were hindered and held back from some path of obedience by someone they loved, and whom perhaps they did not like to go against. With many, their backsliding dates back to a time when they got too much absorbed in some friend, even a Christian friend, who took up too much of their time and thoughts. It will help us, more than anything else, to be saved from such mistakes if we remember "the time is short."

2. But the Apostle also tells these people not to be absorbed in or hindered by sorrows, "Let those that weep be as though they wept not." There is no condition in life in which we can be more selfish than in sorrow. So many, when in trouble, think that others should always be talking of their sorrow; and if they do not, then the one in sorrow is so self-centred as not to be able to take interest in anyone else. This is a great and sore temptation, but we fully miss God's purpose in the sorrow if we give way to it. It will help us to take interest in others, and above all in the Kingdom of God, if we remember "the time is short."

3. But St. Paul goes further, and he once again tells them not to be absorbed in or hindered by joys. "Let those that rejoice be as though they rejoiced not." It is equally easy to get absorbed in our joys. I have known people to be so absorbed in their joys as to make themselves most objectionable and sadly self-centred and selfish. It is sad to think that the very things God gives to make us happy, should prove hindrances instead of helps, and draw the hearts from instead of to Him, the Giver of all! Let us always be specially watchful when a new joy comes into our life, that it does not lessen our joy in God and in spiritual things, or take our time and thoughts from Him. One has known many to backslide when new joys came into their lives, and made them forget that "the time is short," short for souls perishing, as well as for themselves.

4. As St. Paul goes on, his advice seems to get more and more practical, and he now tells them, not to be absorbed in or hindered by business or worldly possessions. "Let those that buy be as though they possessed not," i.e., be as if they actually had not the things which they acquire. How soon men and women forget that "the time is short" when they get absorbed in making money! Solomon tells us "a dream cometh through the multitude of business" (Eccles. v. 3). They sleep away their lives, as far as spiritual influence goes, when they get lost in business. Really to live in the light that "the time is short," means, as St. Paul puts it, that when a man acquires riches they make no difference in his life. He does not move into a grander house, does not display his riches in smarter clothes, or by entertaining more largely and so gaining influence with worldly people. No, he does not alter his manner of life; he remembers "the time is short," and he recognizes that he has been prospered in order that he may advance God's Kingdom.

DOUBTFUL THINGS.

5. The Apostle closes his solemn warning by telling these Corinthian Christians that because "the time is short" they should not use this world to the full. "That they use this world, as not using it to the full" (R.V. marg.). This would have very much the same meaning as where he again says, "All things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient;" that is, there are things that you might do, yet you do not because it might stumble someone; or perhaps you are in doubt as to the right and wrong of a thing, and you do not do it, but give God "the benefit of the doubt," because "the time is short," so short that you can allow no hindrance in your Christian life. Nothing will so help us to surrender doubtful things as to remind ourselves that "the time is short," and further, that "the outward show of this world is passing away," i.e., flitting past like shadows. So you who have money could spend it on yourself, could use it in beautifying your house, but you do not, because you remember that "the time is short." You who have beauty could use it to attract others to yourself, but you do not, because "the time is short," and you seek to attract to Jesus. You who have artistic genius, force of intellect, and so on, you could use these things to make a name for yourself in the world, but you do not; you only use them to advance God's interests.

Oh! let us remember "the time is short," and let us learn better from this advice of St. Paul's, how to live "with eternity's values in view."

Grant Us Thy Peace.

(Luke ii. 14; Eph. ii. 14; John xiv. 27; Heb. vii. 2.)

Give peace, O God! the earth of war is weary,
Suffering creation doth in travail cry;
With carnage strewed, once pleasant lands are dreary,
The orphan weeps and widows moan and sigh.

Give peace, O Christ! far o'er the stormy waters,
For there are loved ones on the surging foam,
And anxious mothers, sisters, wives and daughters,
Are praying Thou wilt guide them safely home.

Give peace, O Saviour! for our foes are legion,
Phantoms that mock, around, without, within,
The fallen angels haunt this lower region,
But Thou, O Christ, canst save and keep from sin.

Grant us thy peace, the peace of full salvation,
Lord, keep us faithful, till our labours cease.
Thus shall we find eternal habitation,
In Thee, O God! our everlasting peace!

Literature for South African Blockhouses.—In reply to a number of inquiries as to the sending of literature for the use of troops in the South African blockhouses, we are glad to be able to say that such can be forwarded, if sent (carriage paid) to Winchester, addressed: "Mr. Palmer (Transvaal), care of Miss Perks, Soldiers' Home." A box is sent out each month by transport, under a warrant from the War Office; and Mr. Palmer, who is superintendent of the Soldiers' Home at the Convalescent Camp, Elandsfontein, distributes the literature to the blockhouses in the Transvaal.

Is Church Attendance Declining?—III.

By Rev. J. GUINNESS ROGERS, D.D.

IT must become clearer the more we study this question, that the pulpit, like every other institution amongst us, if it is to hold its own, must vindicate its right to exist by its character and work. Mere traditionalism counts for less every day. The rage for independence and novelty has become so intense that the danger is lest some things which are very precious should be brushed aside simply because they are old. The pulpit, of course, suffers from this general tendency. We have already seen that on one side it is threatened with the withdrawal of the patronage of fashion. At the other end of the scale it has to meet the growing intelligence of a generation largely trained in Board Schools.

I do not take a pessimist view of the situation when I say that if the pulpit is to be a living force, it must give full proof of its ministry. The preacher's work in such a generation cannot be an easy one. But if he be under a due sense of his own obligation, and rise to the full measure of his opportunities, it may be one of great influence, usefulness, and honour. If, however, he is to achieve such results, he must be something more than an elegant essayist, an ingenious theorist, or even a skilful rhetorician.

THE PRESS AND THE PULPIT.

There is a subtle danger, indeed, to which the preacher of to-day is exposed, from which his fathers were comparatively exempt. Much as we hear about the decay of the pulpit to-day, it has a conspicuous position in public life which it did not hold half a century, or even a quarter of a century ago. The most influential preacher of the past was not so prominent a figure as his successor, even though he may be a man of inferior calibre. The attention which our daily journals bestow upon the churches and their work does not sustain the desponding view which some take of the influence of Christianity among us. But even these indications of public interest in the Christian preacher are not without their attendant danger. The pen-and-ink sketcher who describes a sermon in the same spirit as he hits off a Parliamentary speaker is not one of the wisest guides or the most useful of critics. We feel this even in reading the sketches of a Lobby Correspondent, who is so busy giving his impressions of a speaker's personality that he fails to convey any adequate view of the trend of his speech and its contribution to the general course of the debate.

I have in my own mind a vivid recollection of a sketch of a prominent Churchman in a recent speech. A more weak and mischievous utterance there could hardly have been, or one less suited to the atmosphere of a free Protestant legislature; but the idea left upon my mind by the newspaper artist was simply that of an ascetic devotee constraining admiration by his courageous devotion to a belief from which others had departed, and the rugged eloquence with which his views were expressed.

HOW SERMONS ARE JUDGED.

Such a fault will, in all probability, be more conspicuous in the case of a preacher. To judge him rightly, there must be not only sympathy with the great aims of his ministry, but a capacity for judging how far they are likely to be realized by the kind of preaching which he adopts. A sermon may be judged by many tests. A master of English may try it by its conformity to the best standards of the language. A profound theologian will judge it by the creeds, and pronounce on its orthodoxy. Another may be more interested in its capacity for attracting public attention—the elements of popularity to be found in it. In a word, one will judge of delivery; another of style; another of intellectual originality, and all of them may fail to note the one point on which, beyond all others, stress should be laid. The public journalist especially is likely to belong to one or other of those classes; so it becomes, alas! only too possible that a preacher may be tempted to a self-complacency, which would be exchanged for self-upbraiding if his attention had been fixed on the great object of his ministry.

It is not intended to suggest that even spiritual earnestness is to be accepted as an apology for intellectual laziness. It is difficult, indeed, to understand how these two can coexist. So intent was Paul on the salvation of men that he was willing to become all things to all men that he might save some. As a preacher he followed the example of a predecessor, and sought out acceptable words. This is no more than every preacher ought to do. He must make the best of himself, not for his own sake, but for the Gospel's sake and for the Master's sake. If he has been entrusted with five talents, and uses only one, he is an unfaithful servant, and the indolence which was content with so maimed and imperfect a service would bring his loyalty itself into question. No amount of care which can be employed, in so suiting his address to the spiritual wants of men as to draw them to Christ, can be excessive, and if the heart be set on the one end there will be no hesitation to give all diligence in using the means necessary to secure it.

THE TRUE PREACHER'S OFFICE.

There is, perhaps, no more suggestive description of the preacher's office and work than that which is given by Paul when he says, "We are ambassadors for God." The work which an ambassador has to discharge is clearly marked out for him. He has to deliver the message of his Sovereign. To fail in that is to fail in everything. He may by courtly address and gracious personal qualities win the favour of the Court to which he is accredited, or the people among whom he moves. But if he purchase personal popularity by the neglect of his special mission, he must go back discredited. He has flitted as a brilliant figure across the stage, and that is all. There could not be a more complete analogy by which to illustrate the work of the Christian preacher. I do not forget that, as a pastor, he has to instruct and guide men in the application of the law of the Lord to the common business of life. To that point I hope to return—suffice it to observe here that even for the discharge of that duty, it is necessary that there should be a constant and distinct setting forth of those great principles on which all his social or ethical teachings have to be based. Apart from these, he has neither the law to proclaim, nor the motives to which he can appeal for obedience.

THE NEED OF THE HOUR.

The conclusion to which we are led is simple and obvious enough. The preacher has a Gospel to proclaim. To withhold it is to be unfaithful, but it is to be unsuccessful also. There is an idea abroad, which some are diligently circulating, that the world has outgrown the old faith, and that it is only kept alive, so far as it has any life at all, by venerable formulancy, which preachers are required to maintain, but in which they do not even believe themselves. There may have been a time when there was need for protest against hide-bound orthodoxy of this type. But such need has certainly ceased. The reaction against theology and creeds of every kind has been pressed so far that there are many who seem to think that the less a man believes the better he is, and that the more thoughtful of the day have come to understand that what a man believes is of very subordinate importance, and that sincerity is the one point that matters. A preacher who accepts this position will never be a spiritual force. After all, the world is not intensely eager to listen to the views of ordinary men week by week, on things in general, and on the great problems of human life, both now and in the dread future in particular. But if there comes one who commends himself to the conscience as a messenger from God, and has a Gospel to preach, he will be heard. The world needs the Gospel as much as ever it did, and it wants in the pulpit not elegant triflers, but men consecrated with the Christ-passion and the soul-passion. Give these, and there will be no question about declining congregations.

The Continent and the War.

DEAR SIR and Honoured Brother,—A recent issue of your valuable paper contained a letter, entitled "Our Troops and Continental Opinion," in which it is proposed to constitute "an interdenominational council" of Christians, strictly limited to the task of investigating "the personal conduct of the British troops in the South African war."

It may save our friends a good deal of trouble to let them know that there is no occasion for such an investigation. I feel assured that I represent the bulk of your "fellow-Christians on the Continent," when I state that, according to our judgment, the average British officer and soldier have nothing to fear from comparison with the rank and file of any army. In fact, we are ready to give credit to Tommy Atkins, not only for manliness and courage, but also for kindness of heart, just as we do with regard to the brave fellows against whom he is made to fight.

It is not, therefore, with "the troops" we are finding fault, but with the authorities, political and military. It is, pre-eminently, with the attitude of the churches (taken as a whole) in Great Britain and the Colonies, who suffer without a protest the prolongation of what we consider to be a more than usually odious war—the devastation of a once prosperous land, the systematic ruining of homes, the slaughter of children by thousands, the refusal to offer such conditions of peace as could be honourably accepted, the unwillingness to refer contested points to arbitration.

And, as an excuse for all this—nay, as its justification, as the reason why Christians are in duty bound to encourage the carrying on of such a war in such a way—we are told, forsooth, that the wicked enemy will not consent, if he can help it, to have his national life crushed out.

It is this that causes our dismay, our distress, and the painful "cleavage" complained of between the champions of "Imperial Christianity" and those who hold a widely different view as to what is required by the teaching and the spirit of Christ.

We may be reminded, alas! that the Christians of other lands have oftentimes given the same kind of scandal, and followed the multitude when it bowed down before its own national divinity. The reproach is well founded and should keep us humble, but it can neither justify your course nor alleviate our pain. The sore disappointment of the best friends of England consists precisely in this, that the nation which they had been accustomed to regard as representing before the world the lofty ideal of a religion founded on the Bible should not have maintained a higher moral level than less enlightened countries have done.—I remain, dear sir and honoured brother, yours faithfully and sorrowfully, Theodore Monod.

Paris.

P.S.—Remarkably enough, as I was reading over this letter, who should call upon me but a friend whom I had not met for many years; namely, Count de Korff, formerly of Russia (whence he was exiled for the sake of the Gospel), and now of Hanover. You are well acquainted with him. He sends you his regards, and wishes me to let your readers know that he is of one mind with me in all that I have written.

Th. M.

[We have inserted our friend Pastor Monod's letter in full, because it is well that British Christians should know exactly upon what grounds many of our fellow-Christians on the Continent are denying, not only fellowship, but even the accustomed courtesies of life to their brethren in Christ who claim British nationality. But the pastor's letter reveals the extent to which he and those for whom he speaks have succumbed to the gross misrepresentations that have been made concerning the war by those who for their own ends have manufactured falsehoods, many of which have been reproduced and widely circulated by the French Protestant organ, Le Signal.

This cleavage among the children of God is one of the most painful features of the whole unhappy struggle; but we are convinced that if our Continental brethren knew the facts and ignored the fiction, their verdict would assume a very different form. Unfortunately, feeling runs too high at present for a judicial view of the situation. Not for years, probably, will an accurate estimate be formed.—Ed.]

A Race Apart.—A singularly interesting paper in the final number of The Humanitarian throws much light of a pleasant kind upon the life of the canal boat population in London and the missionary work in regard to that race of people. A very wonderful improvement in their condition has been effected since the Parliamentary inquiry of 1877 and the consequent legislation, due so largely to the labours of the late George Smith, of Coalville, and it is gratifying to find, on the authority of the two London City Mission agents who work day by day amongst them, that "they are not a drinking people," and that they are not only physically healthier, but also "far better in their lives than perhaps any other class of the poor." One missionary says that "the worst thing about canal life, though this hardly applies to barges, is that many children have grown up, and are growing up, who have 'never had no schoolin'!'"

The Stone of Help.

(1 Sam. vii. 12.)

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

THERE are many such monoliths as the "Stone of Help" to be found strewn through these northern lands, from such venerable circles as those of Stonehenge, to the single ones which are pointed out to the traveller in Northern Wales—the last home of the Druids and ancient Britons.

Throughout the world man has endeavoured to associate himself, and the history of his life, with the permanent monuments of nature. In this he has approved alike his littleness and his greatness—his littleness, because every such endeavour is a confession on his part of the transience of his days, and his consciousness that he has so slight a hold on the earth, on which he is but a sojourner and a pilgrim; his greatness, because he is capable of investing with a halo of undying interest wild glens and barren rocks, darksome caves and deep, rushing rivers. It is for this reason that every spot in the older countries of the world teems with interest. It is with difficulty that the tourist can make his way through England or Scotland, Germany or Italy; whereas he will haste, without hesitation or halting, through thousands of miles of Canada or the Western States. How different, for instance, is the interest of travelling through the New England States, or through Dakota and Wisconsin. Each square mile of the one is fragrant with some interesting reminiscence of the past, whilst the other only recalls a vanished race.

At the foot of this stone let us linger for a little, to learn one or two lessons more. For stones have ears and voices. Joshua said that the stone which he reared, at the end of his life-work, had heard; and our Lord said that the stones around Him might be expected to cry out (Joshua xxiv. 26; Luke xix. 40).

I. Its Site.—It stood on ground which had witnessed a terrible defeat and disaster. We are told in the fourth chapter that the great battle of Aphek was fought on this spot. "Israel went out against the Philistines to battle, and pitched beside Eben-ezer, and the Philistines pitched in Aphek." "Now the Philistines had taken the ark of God, and they brought it from Eben-ezer unto Ashdod" (iv. 1; v. 1).

Many who gathered around Samuel when he raised and named this stone must have been present twenty years before on that fatal field, the Flodden of Israel's glory. Here the fight had been fiercest, the slain thickest; there the corpses of Hebrews and Philistines had fallen like leaves in Vallombrosa, trampled beneath the feet of the combatants; yonder the fight had raged around the Ark of God, as it was taken, and re-taken, and taken again. At this point, desperate deeds of valour had been done to turn back Israel from a shameful flight, but in vain. There Hophni fell, and there Phinehas. In this place a brief stand was made, but again the ill-formed line was broken, and the children of a chosen race, whose forefathers turned not back in the day of Gideon and Jephthah, fled like sheep before the wolf.

But, notwithstanding all this, and though the spot was associated with the memories of disgrace and shame, which in turn were the result of deep transgression on the part of people and priesthood, yet there was the stone erected which spoke so eloquently of the Divine help.

What living encouragement is contained in this for us all! We, too, may be traversing at this very hour battlefields which have been sadly marked by defeat. Again and again we have met the foes of our peace in mortal conflict, only to be repulsed. Our hopes have been dashed to the ground and our banners rolled in dust and blood. We meant never to yield again, but we did yield. We meant that that solemn vow should be kept, that holy resolution carried into effect; but they were shivered in pieces. We have been overthrown by our adversary, and overpowered in spite of all our efforts by our besetting sin. Yet take heart. At the very place where you have fallen you shall stand, for "God is able to make you stand"; where you have been overthrown you shall be more than a conqueror. You shall tread these very fields with songs of joy. The rocks which saw the withered leaves of autumn swirl in eddies around you shall behold the young green of spring and the maturefulness of summer. Be of good cheer! The stone of Eben-ezer shall be raised on the very field of the fatal battle of Aphek.

II. Its Retrospect.—What a story this stone had to tell, if all were unfolded, of the wonderful dealings of God with his people. It looked back on the twenty years of patient work, by which the Prophet Samuel had been leading the people homeward to the God of their fathers—quiet, unobtrusive, and unseen work, like that of the coral insects from the bottom of the mighty ocean, till presently the islet emerges, with its crown of fronded palms.

It looked back on many a scene of iconoclasm as, from Dan to Beersheba, there had been a general putting away of the Baalim and Ashtaroth, the cutting down of groves, and overthrow of altars. It looked back on that memorable convocation of all Israel at Mizpah, when water was poured out before the Lord, in confession of sin and humble penitence.

It looked back specially, to the offering of the burnt-offering, which declared Israel's resolve to be henceforth wholly devoted to God, and to Samuel's piercing cry of intercession. Above all, it looked back on that memorable moment, when, as the Philistines drew near to battle against Israel, "the Lord thundered with a great thunder upon the Philistines, and discomfited them, and they were smitten down before Israel." If that stone had engraved slabs of memory within its old heart, as well as eyes and ears, it surely never would forget the mad onslaught of the men of Israel on their fleeing and panic-stricken foes, to avenge in one brief hour the wrongs and oppressions of twenty long years.

Has anything like this taken place in your life? On your answer much will depend. If since your last failure and defeat there have been no acts of the soul, like those which took place at Mizpah, believe me, there is no probability of there being any break in the long monotony of your reverses. As you have been defeated, so you will be defeated; as you have failed, so you will fail, unless there is the pouring out of your heart before God, the putting away of idols, and the resolve to follow Him fully.

If I may be permitted to quote my own experience, I must bear witness to the incessant failure of my life, so long as I cherished things in my heart which were alien to God's holy will. Rules for holy living, solemn and heart-stirring conventions, helpful books and addresses produced but very small result. There was temporary amendment, but little else. But when the scene at Mizpah had been reflected in the inner mirror of the soul, then victory took place on the very spot marked by defeat. Let my reader ponder this. You cannot keep the moth out of your house, so long as one old blanket, stored in some neglected cupboard or box, is full of it. You cannot keep diphtheria from your home, so long as one crack in the drains is emitting the poison of sewer-gas. You will never raise your stone of Eben-ezer until you have stood on the watch-tower of Mizpah and put away all known sin, all complicity with what is grievous in the eyes of Christ. Only so will even his keeping power avail.

You say that you cannot. The evil thing clings to you as the serpent folds around Laocoon and his sons. The deadly creeper has wound itself around the tree of your life, and threatens to crush it to death in its deadly embrace. How can you rid yourself of that which has so strong a fascination that you feel you cannot live apart from it? Ah, there is the point where the Great Physician is willing to interpose for your rescue and deliverance! What you cannot do for yourself, He will do. The only question is, Are you willing? or Are you willing to be made willing? Often enough in the history of the soul it happens that the will, like a tough piece of iron, resists and resents. Then there is one glad resource—take it to Christ, tell Him that you cannot be as you would, or that you will not be as you should, and pray Him to undertake your difficult and almost desperate case.

Do not doubt the result. He takes what we give at the moment of our giving it; and when once He has taken it, we may press to our heart the consolation which the good Naomi gave to Ruth in a memorable moment of her life: "Sit still, my daughter . . . for the man will not rest until he have finished the thing this day."

III. Its Inscription.—"Hitherto hath the Lord helped us." Surely if the stone had a retrospect, as we have seen, it had also a prospect. It looked forward as well as backward. It seemed to say, As God has helped, so He will help. It would have been impossible to secure such results as those twenty years had witnessed, culminating in this glorious victory, unless He had been a very present help; and could He have done so much without being prepared to finish what He had commenced? Would He have begun to build without calculating on his ability to finish? Would He have entered on a campaign without counting the cost of carrying it to a conclusion?

As we go through life, let us be careful to erect our Ebenezer stones, so that when new responsibilities begin to crowd on us, or fresh and unforeseen difficulties threaten, we may be emboldened to sing with Newton:—

His love in time past forbids me to think
He'll leave me at last in trouble to sink,
Each sweet Ebenezer I have in review
Confirms his good pleasure to help me quite through.

All through life, if you will only trust God, if only by faith you will derive from Him grace for grace, if only you will claim a continuance and a crowning of all that He has begun, you will have occasions to raise these stones of help and to say with the Apostle, "Having, therefore, obtained the help that is from God, I stand unto this day testifying both to small and great." The last stone that we shall erect will be on the margin of the river. As we turn our back for ever on the land of our pilgrimage, and enter on the work and worship of eternity, we shall set up a great stone to the glory of our God, saying once more, with a deep sigh of perfected satisfaction, "Hitherto hath the Lord helped."

"Our Daily Bread."

SUNDAY, February 23. Genesis xxix.

THE chief lesson in this chapter is the illustration it gives of the awful Nemesis in life. We use this word for want of a better; but in fact, it is another name for the judgment seat of God, before which we are ever standing and receiving the just reward of our deeds, whether they be good or bad. No thoughtful man can observe life with any care, whether in respect of individuals or families, without noticing the dread incidence of the sentence of the Divine Judge. If Jacob deceives his father, he will find himself deceived; if a woman refuses to correct her child, he will grow up to cause her bitter anguish; if a man lives a noble, royal, and beneficent life, ultimately it will be returned into his own bosom, though with persecutions. "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again." I beseech you, do not suppose that you can sin with impunity. No one in this world can escape the just recompense of reward in conscience or circumstance. The feet of the avenger may appear to tarry, but they are on your track, and will finally come up with you.

There was bitter heart-burning between Jacob's two wives, and it is terrible to realize that this is only as a drop in the ocean of women's tears and anguish in similar circumstances. The infraction of the ancient law of one man for one woman is the source of continual misery wherever it happens. The woman's soul vehemently asserts its right to its exclusive empire over the husband's affections; and he had best yield it, not for her sake only, but his own, or he will discover that his path is more and more beset with briars and thorns.

MONDAY, February 24. Genesis xxx.

Rachel's anguish of heart (v. 1) led her to earnest prayer, and "God hearkened unto her (22)." Pray on, anguished heart, yearning that God shall give thee thy son in spiritual birth; thou shalt yet join in that pathetic but joyful resurrection cry, "This is our God; we have waited for Him"—possibly through long years of disappointment and heart hunger—"we have waited for Him, and He has saved us." Is it not worth waiting for a Joseph whose branches shall run over the wall in fulness of blessing?

The details of this chapter are given with great minuteness, because they concern the twelve sons of Jacob, the fathers of the children of Israel. After all, history is made in the nursery. We are very much what our mothers make us in the early formative years. They give us our names. An old Spanish motto says, "An ounce of mother is worth a pound of clergy." Who can influence a boy as his mother can, by her prayers with him and before him, by her ever-present example and influence, by her wise, pure words? Oh, that women would be beforehand with the devil, and so infill the minds of their sons with high principles, with respect for their own nature and for that of all other women, that they would have a holy hatred of the impurity and evil of the world.

Leah's influence on her boys, as judged by their subsequent life, was anything but healthy and high-minded, and their father's example in his business associations must have been equally prejudicial. He fell far below the level of the world's code of honour, to say nothing of religion. The beautiful gate of noble living rests, like the gate of the Jewish Temple, on two pillars, of which the one is purity and the other truth, and if these be broken down there is ruin indeed. What could you hope for Jacob's sons, when his own example was on so low a plane?

TUESDAY, February 25. Genesis xxxi.

As I read again this story, with its strange and incongruous mixture of religion and deceit, of insincerity and family feeling, it reminds me of the parable of the opal. This precious stone is made of the same stuff as the desert sands, mere silica. It is not a crystallized stone like a diamond, but "a stone with a broken heart." Hundreds of small fissures traverse it, letting in the breath of the atmosphere; and we are told that it is because of the presence of these two transparent mediums of such different density, that it is enabled to refract the light, and reflect every lovely hue of heaven.

In Jacob, certainly, there were these differing mediums. The Lord speaks to him, and he leads his wives to suppose that his prosperity is entirely due to God's gracious care over him and them, but he carefully hides his own chicanery and deceit. Now he steals away with the best of Laban's property, but anon he is swearing by the God of Abraham and the Fear of Isaac. A strange mixture truly, but not more so than is present in us all; by nature we cleave to the dust, but in the new nature we are akin to God. In "The Holy Grail," by the late Laureate, Lancelot complains that the wholesome and the poisonous flowers grew so close on the soil of his heart that they could not be plucked asunder. So men argue, but it is not so; and our duty is to crucify, to die to, the old man with his affections and lusts, and to nurture the growth of the new man, made in the image of God.

WEDNESDAY, February 26. Genesis xxxii.

What tidings Jacob's messengers brought back (verse 6)! Little wonder that he was so greatly distressed; but in the anguish of that hour his noblest nature peered forth and spoke in this marvellous prayer (9-12). He argued that he was on the Divine Plan—for had not God told him to return? He confessed his utter unworthiness of the least of the mercy and truth that had fallen to his lot; he prayed for definite deliverance for himself and his children: he quoted the ancient promise by which God had bound Himself. And having prayed, he made what dispositions he could for meeting the emergency.

Then came the greatest experience of his life. Often this wonderful scene has been used as an illustration of wrestling prayer, but in the outset it clearly was not so. It was not Jacob who wrestled with the Angel, but the Angel who wrestled with Jacob. It was as though God knew that it was the only chance of prevailing against the sin and selfishness of his servant's nature. He wanted to lift him into a new royal life, which could only be attained by the subjugation of his will, and He actually wrestled with him to force him to yield. Jacob was a proud man. He stood his ground, and resisted the attempt of the Angel of Love to humble him. He struggled and fought, as we all do under similar conditions. It was only when the Angel put forth his hand and touched the sinew of his thigh, which shrivelled as a cord in flame, and he was no longer able to resist, that he cried, "I yield!" In that act, he was conquered, but he prevailed. He was blessed, and became Israel, the prince. Yield to God's Spirit, and become royal.

THURSDAY, February 27. Genesis xxxiii.

What happened on the next day after Jacob's wonderful experience at the Jabbok? It is almost too terrible to repeat, because in some respects it is so exactly like ourselves. The meeting with his brother was all that could be desired; evidently the angels whom he had met (xxxii. 2) had, in answer to his prayer, formed a bodyguard of defence. Surely, after this, he might have trusted God still further and completely to deliver him; but no, he must needs resort to his own way of helping himself, which was full of the deceit and evasion that had always characterized him.

First, he gave Esau a lame excuse for not accompanying him; then, as soon as his back was turned, he set off in the opposite direction, and made for a fat valley and a land of pasture, where his cattle and sheep might feed and multiply, whilst his sons and himself could drive a large trade with the men of Shechem. We are told that he pitched his tent towards Shechem, and worse than that, he bought the parcel of a field. He who had come of a pilgrim race, and who ought to have trusted God, knowing that He would ultimately give him the whole land, became a freeholder, and bought real estate right over against Shechem, one of the worst cities in the country. Like Lot, for wealth and worldly advancement he threw himself, his wife, and children into the closest possible contact with this sinful city.

FRIDAY, February 28. Genesis xxxiv.

Dinah went out to see the daughters of the land. Poor child! She had been put in the way of temptation, and, like a gnat, began to flit round the candle-flame. It may have been that her home was irksome, and that there was a good deal of quarrelling between her brothers. Perhaps she longed for a tenderness and sweetness which came not to her lot. So she took a step from which there was no retreat, and sacrificed her honour.

But who was to blame? First, Jacob, because he placed her in such temptation. There is a similar tendency on the part of a Christian man, when he begins to make money; he says, "I can live in a larger house; I can go into better society." Too often, in acting thus, he places his children under influences similar to those which emanated from Shechem. And the children begin to acquire worldly notions. They come in contact with the children of this world, and contract similar tastes. Of course you ought to make your home as bright and happy as possible, and give your children recreation; mind to put a happy frontispiece to the volume of your child's life, so far as may be in your power; but beware of the life of Shechem. Make your home so happy that Dinah will not desire to go there.

But surely Leah was also to blame. She ought to have forewarned her daughter. But, incredible as it may appear, thousands of boys and girls are issuing every year from Christian homes, into schools and elsewhere, to meet the evil of the world, as they inevitably will, without being provided with that knowledge of good and evil which could be conveyed to them from the wise, pure, loving lips of their parents. Oh the pity and misfortune of it! Do not send your children forth from your home without one memorable talk, which would arm them in all future time against the pestilence that walketh in darkness.

SATURDAY, March 1. Genesis xxxv.

Does not God speak to thee in the first words of this chapter? "Arise, go up to Bethel." Thirty years ago you were at Bethel. Life was young then. Thou hadst only thy staff. All thy future was unshaped, and unknown. It was the first night away from home, and how earnestly thou gavest thyself to prayer! What tears, vows, and resolves! But since then, what a distance thou hast travelled away from it all. Married! Prosperous! A family of children! But far from God! Get back, and speak to thy household, that they may accompany thee. Thy return will mean their regeneration; they will renounce their strange gods, and put off their polluted garments.

Let us be clean! Clean in heart, in look, in speech! Clean in secret habit, and in outward walk and conversation! Clean in the books we read, and the pictures and statuary of our homes. Let us put off the garments of the old man, so well described by the Apostle, and put on those of the new man, renewed in the image of God.

> The dearest idol I have known,
> Whate'er that idol be;
> Help me to tear it from thy throne,
> And worship only Thee.

At Bethel, God again gave Jacob the name of Israel, holding up the great ideal, and engaging to enable him to realize it, by the gift of that great name El Shaddai, as though He said, "I open before thee a great destiny, but I am abundantly able to realize it for thee, because I am the All-Sufficient One." He can make us fruitful; He can give us the land; He can interpose between us and the results of our misdoings (v. 8). What though sore sorrow be in our home, and death on death, yet He hath made an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things and sure. F. B. M.

The Christian Temperance Campaign.

LIMERICK, DUBLIN, AND HOLYHEAD MEETINGS.

THERE is abundant evidence that, under God, wonderful success is attending Dr. Henry's unsparing exertions in advocacy of the only rational and consistent ttitude which the people generally, and Christians in particular, can take towards the lisastrous habit and traffic of strong drink.

The arduous but cheering labours of the ast week opened with meetings in Limerick, wice a day, on Tuesday and Wednesday last eek. Out of a population of 40,000 the Protestants claim about 4,000; and no hall of dequate capacity was available for the interested and enthusiastic audiences which are verywhere being commanded by the burning loquence and consuming earnestness of Dr. Henry, so ably seconded by the cultivated ocalisation of the Fisk Jubilee Singers.

At the opening meeting in Munster Hall, Mr. ROBERT HANNA presided, and a number of ministers and other influential gentlemen were resent. In the name of all the churches, as vell as the temperance organisations of the ity, the CHAIRMAN gave a warm welcome to the nissioner and his coloured coadjutors.

Dr. HENRY showed that some of the outtanding features of Limerick, as of other laces, are the churches on the one side, and he public houses on the other; the aims and nfluences of the two sets of institutions being otally irreconcilable. For the Christian, he aid, there is but one attitude toward a blighting and remorselessly selfish traffic. The time as come to give temperance reform its rightul place, on the highest possible level, as part f Christ's mission to the world; and the Church must do this for its own preservation.

An intensely interested audience filled the all on Tuesday evening, Mr. H. L. STEWART n the chair. Prayer was offered by Dr. LONG. Dr. HENRY described some of the forces that nake for righteousness in our fight against 'the drink," and advanced an overwhelming nass of testimony in favour of total abstinence.

On Wednesday afternoon Dr. HENRY told a rowd of boys and girls that every fourth amily has to furnish a drunkard; but if we an keep the children out of the public-house ntil they reach years of discretion, such places vill be shut up, because old drunkards would lie off, and there would be nobody to take their laces. So many came to the closing meeting n the evening that the overflow was gathered nto the Baptist church, speaker and singers lividing their ministry between the two places. n the hall, Mr. W. B. FITT was chairman; and Dr. HENRY dealt, in convincing style, with indusrial, physical, and other aspects of temperance.

Mr. WILLIAM LAUDER writes of the Limerick neetings:—"They were most successful, and ve are very glad indeed that we had Dr. Henry here. During the time 211 pledges were signed, nd among them are some which would well epay any little trouble."

Rev. Dr. DICKINSON, who presided over a pecial meeting of the Dublin Committee and uarantors held in the Metropolitan Hall, Dublin, on Thursday afternoon last, said that Dr. Henry's recent mission would certainly ear abiding fruit.

Rev. W. J. M'CREERY, one of the hon. secrearies, read an encouraging letter from the Archbishop of Dublin, who wrote:

I am glad to learn that the Temperance Mission neetings lately held in Dublin were so largely ttended, and that so many were led by what they eard—among them some 600 members of the Church f Ireland—to sign the temperance pledge. The Committee has taken a wise step in deciding to send the ames of those who have signed to the clergy of their espective parishes and churches, so far as it may be ossible to do so.

Dr. HENRY, who followed, described the nti-Saloon League, which is active in thirtyight states and territories of the American Union, and has 300 men who devote their time nd energy to the organization of temperance orces and the awakening of the conscience of Christian people in the cause of temperance reform. By sinking differences, the boundary of common agreement is constantly extended, thus tending to answer our Lord's prayer for unity. The people will never be unified for enduring opposition to the drink evil, except by the power of the truth as it is in Jesus, which includes love to God and love to man. Jesus Christ cannot be King universal until alcohol is destroyed. In cities like Dublin, America has representative executive councils of temperance workers, with separate committees for practically dealing with agitation, legislation, and law enforcement in a way which gives every abstainer something to do.

In the evening a farewell meeting was held, the Metropolitan Hall being crowded in every part. Mr. THOS. EDMONDSON, vice-chairman of the Rathmines Urban Council presided.

Rev. Dr. KINGSMILL MOORE, M.A., moved "That this meeting desires to place on record its deep gratitude to God for the great success which attended Dr. Henry's nine days' temperance mission just concluded; that we gladly recognise the able advocacy and great ability displayed by Dr. Henry, together with the invaluable assistance rendered by the Jubilee Singers." The motion was seconded by Mr. CHAS. EASON, J.P.; supported by Mr. WM. CARTY, and carried unanimously, the whole audience standing in token of their appreciation.

Before entering upon another powerful appeal for pledges, Dr. HENRY declared that success had come because the people were minded to work, and God was working with the people.

In the course of an interesting letter to Mr. Robert Scott, Mr. William Carty says:—

The total pledges for the ten days exceed 1,400, and I have been hard at work sending out the names of those who signed in connection with the Methodist church, and at the same time writing a pressing letter to each minister to have each new member visited and enrolled in their local society. I have also urged that an adult Total Abstinence Society be formed in connection with every congregation, and suggested that once a month one of the week night services might be made a Gospel temperance meeting, the services of zealous, godly men and women, young and old, being used in conducting this meeting. Thus we may hope that the work shall be continued on the high Christian level on which Dr. Henry has brought the movement.

I cannot tell you the number of godly men and women who have identified themselves with the temperance cause on this account. As the outcome of this mission their eyes have been opened, their consciences educated and aroused to active personal service in this sacred cause. In the past the temperance cause has been too often conducted on a low level, God being left out and amusements having the prominent place in the meetings, and so Christian folk have held aloof, but now a great revival has taken place in the churches, scores of members are working to enlist others; men and women are pleading for the overthrow of this, the first and worst enemy of Christ's kingdom. There is hardly a post but brings me letters from those who have worked in this mission (and I have had the joy of having over 100 workers, night after night, labouring earnestly and prayerfully to enlist others at the meetings, with a grand total of over 1,400 new signatures) assuring me of their continued and zealous labours and mourning over past lukewarmness.

I do praise God for Dr. Henry's mission. Every day our love for this man of God has grown stronger and deeper, and we would love to have him back again soon. Dublin has been shaken, the churches are awakening. For over forty years I have been connected with the total abstinence work in this city; I unhesitatingly say that I never listened to such powerful soul-stirring and high, level Christian advocacy as has come from our beloved friend, Dr. Henry. I pray that England may be set on fire with zeal for the overthrow of the enemy strong drink.

Two meetings were held at Holyhead. The first was at the Presbyterian church, where Dr. Henry addressed words of counsel and inspiration to a large number of Christian workers. Of the evening gathering the secretary, Rev. E. B. Jones, writes:—"We had a most magnificent meeting at the Town Hall. The building was packed to its utmost capacity, about 1,000 people being present out of a population of 10,000. Dr. Henry delivered a most powerful, eloquent, and convincing address. His mission has already proved a great blessing to us. We had at the Town Hall meeting 450 pledges. The ministers and churches have been aroused as never before."

To My Larger Congregation.

AFTER finishing my first series of Conferences in St. Petersburg with a most blessed Sunday of crowded congregations, and an unusual sense of the presence of the Holy Spirit, I started for Dorplat, a university town, about nine hours distant. Baron Nicolai accompanied me as interpreter, and though I had some misgivings as to our reception, in consequence of the stringency of the regulations, we have been most marvellously helped in our meetings, both with the townsfolk and the students. It is very sweet to realize that the Master is using one to further his work with souls, and with congregations.

Dorplat is situated in the Lidonian provinces, once included in the kingdom of Sweden, and amongst the earliest of the countries that received the Reformation. Until recently the University was entirely German, but now three-fourths of the students are Russians. We have been entertained most hospitably by two noble ladies, and I am struck with the intimate knowledge displayed by the upper circle here of all that is transpiring in Great Britain. These friends had read Mr. Balfour's recent book, knew our current literature, were perfectly aware of the attitude taken up by different parties with respect to the war, took in Regions Beyond, and subscribed to the Congo Mission—speaking English perfectly.

I long to get home, and yet realize the great importance of this work. My books have preceded me, and been translated, so that audiences are secured to me, for which I am deeply grateful, and desire to use my opportunities in humble dependence before God. I again commend myself to your prayers, as I return to St. Petersburg for the concluding Conferences.

Obituary.

MR. JAMES FLANAGAN.

THE Protestant Reformation Society has lost a prominent missionary by the death of Mr. James Flanagan. Of a genial and kindly temperament, he was very successful in gaining access to Roman Catholics, his ready Irish wit often standing him in good stead when preaching to his countrymen of the Roman Catholic persuasion. By the blessing of God, he had been instrumental in bringing many out of Roman error into Gospel light and liberty. As years gathered upon him Mr. Flanagan, owing to a brutal attack by Romanists, was afflicted with deafness, but this did not diminish his energy or his efforts. Mr. Flanagan laboured for forty years in various centres, including Liverpool, Leicester, Nottingham, Northampton, Halifax, and the South of London.

MR. WILLIAM CHIVERS, J.P.

The Baptist denomination has lost one of its most prominent laymen by the death of Mr. William Chivers, J.P., of Histon, who passed away on February 11 at the age of fifty. A man of remarkable business ability and success, he regarded his means as held in sacred stewardship, and gave generous support to religious and philanthropic undertakings. With his father and brothers he took a warm and practical interest in the Cambridgeshire Baptist churches. He was chairman of the Augmentation Fund of the Baptist Union. As an evangelist, he possessed the gift of presenting the love of Christ in simple, attractive beauty, and there are many to-day who first realized the Saviour's love because of the human love and sympathy of the messenger. Rev. J. H. Shakespeare writes of Mr. Chivers: "During the term of my secretariat I have been thrown into frequent intercourse and correspondence with him. I found him simple, humble, and unostentatious. Those who met him on committee were always struck with his quiet manner and gentle speech, and would, perhaps, never have guessed that he was the chairman of one of the largest businesses in the country."

The Boy Preacher.

IT was during the Christmastide of 1896 that ten-year-old Jack Cooke received his first spiritual impulse. His father was an able schoolmaster, a man of refined and literary tastes, and at the same time a well-known and popular supporter of all that had to do with athletics. It could not be said, however, that the quiet Manchester home was dominated by religion.

Mr. Cooke, senior, becoming interested in spiritual things, began to search after the truth, devoting an hour each afternoon to prayer and the study of the Bible. It was at the same time, too, that his young son, Jack, began to seek for light, and it was with a hallowed sense of God's nearness that, in a private devotional gathering of the family, the lad began to speak of eternal things. It was evident to all present that their young relative possessed not only a notable gift of speech, but spiritual power in delivering his message. He was the means of leading out some of the family into the spheres of religious thought and activity, and had the earnest encouragement of his father.

FIRST EFFORTS IN EVANGELISM.

Impressed with a strong sense of duty, Jack soon began to speak in public, his first plea for Christ being made in the open air, at the corner of Oxford and Grosvenor Streets, Manchester, in May, 1897. Opportunities for service were opened in many directions, and missions were undertaken in Manchester and the outlying district as well as in some of the chief towns of Lancashire. After about a year and a half, a visit was paid to the United States, and here, too, great interest was awakened. Undoubtedly the youth of the preacher afforded one reason for the attractiveness of the mission, but certainly something more was required to retain attention. At New York, Chicago, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Denver, Philadelphia (at Bethany church), St. Louis, and other great cities of the States, fruitful missions were held, as well as in Canada, at Toronto and Ottowa. The famous Ocean Grove camp meeting was also the scene of services, and the auditorium, estimated to accommodate 10,000 persons, proved all too small for the crowds desiring admission.

THE PREACHER AND HIS METHODS.

Possessing a remarkable command of language, a clear voice, and an animated delivery, Mr. Cooke has many platform advantages, while his zeal and sincerity secure earnest attention. Every address is full of the Gospel message. Nervous and sensitive, Mr. Cooke's addresses are characterized by incisiveness and eagerness, and he invariably aims to bring his audience to the point of immediate decision. He regards the after-meeting as of equal importance with the preaching, but, in view of the heavy demands upon his physical resources, the young evangelist values the practical help of his friend and coadjutor, Rev. J. R. Coutts, in conducting the proceedings right on to the close, and endeavouring to point seeking souls to the Saviour. He speaks with but little direct preparation, but his faculty for extemporary speaking enables him to requisition his study for the thoughts and inspirations of the moment.

SOME RECENT MISSIONS.

On his return from America, Mr. Cooke was invited in November last to undertake an evangelistic mission at Bloomsbury Chapel (Rev. B. J. Gibbon). The young preacher was thereby brought prominently before public notice. Undoubtedly there was at first a feeling of fear lest something of an abnormal or eccentric character should mar the effort. Indeed, there was some cleavage of opinion among Christian people as to the advisability of one so young occupying so responsible a position. It was soon remembered, however, that youthful preachers are no new thing, and that, for example, Mr. C. H. Spurgeon was, at one time, familiarly described as "the Boy Preacher of the Fens." Moreover, the modesty and solemnity of the preacher, and particularly the impression made upon the crowds that flocked to hear him, were bound to dissipate doubt or prejudice. Mr. Gibbon's views were distinctly favourable, "that is, for the work he specially undertakes—the work of evangelisation. There is nothing sensational in Mr. Cooke's manner or methods. He does not appeal specially to the emotions and makes but few humorous remarks. His youth is no doubt a great element in his power of attraction; but it is undeniable that God has given him great power. Crowds may come to wonder at his flow of ready speech; but, when we see scores in the inquiry rooms, we are constrained to acknowledge the hand of God."

Following Bloomsbury came a month at Shoreditch Tabernacle. Pastor Cuff's capacious building was crowded nightly, and there were many decisions for Christ. During the third week of the services, Mr. Cuff wrote: "I have been putting myself through every phase of thought and search on this lad and his mission, and I cannot anyhow think why it should be thought a kind of 'sensationalism,' or even 'a questionable proceeding.' In years, Jack Cooke is nearly sixteen. In some of his thinking and utterances he is far beyond that. In private, as in public, he has all the ways of a pure, simple, high-minded boy. He is dogmatic about the truth, and does not mince matters. Someone would think him a little hard at times. Whatever else he is not, he is a master of assemblies, and holds his audience from first to last. I have ventured to write this, because we have most surely seen wonders of grace here during the past fortnight. If it shields the lad from adverse criticisms, I shall be glad; but I have written it for no other purpose except to glorify the Lord. We all here adore and magnify his holy Name for what we have seen and heard; and to Him we give all the praise."

The month's Mission recently concluded at Mr. Charrington's Great Assembly Hall, Mile End, will be fresh in the reader's memory. It was, according to Mr. Charrington's hearty testimony, a season of awakening, when hundreds of people, of all ages and classes, were brought under conviction and pointed to Christ.

AT WEST LONDON TABERNACLE.

At present Mr. Cooke is labouring at the well-known West London Tabernacle, so intimately associated with the names of Mr. Henry Varley and Rev. Dr. Moore, the pastorate being now occupied by Rev. E. M. Todd. There also the Divine blessing has accompanied the words of the young preacher. We earnestly pray that the development which will come with the passing years may appear in a manhood of far-reaching usefulness in the extension of the kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ in the hearts of men.

Death of Dr. Newman Hall.

WE learn with deep sorrow that Rev. Newman Hall, D.D., passed away at his residence, at Hampstead Heath, on Tuesday morning last, aged eighty-six. As an evangelist, pastor, and author of religious works, he occupied a prominent and honoured place in the ranks of the Church militant. He was a Christian worker of a type only too rare, and no movement or cause calculated to help those who came under his influence, lacked his hearty support.

As early as sixteen years of age young Newman Hall decided for Christ, and became a member of the Independent Church at Maidstone. Reaching the age of twenty-one, he was recognised by the church as a candidate for the ministry, and was accepted as a student at Highbury Theological College. After a term of preparatory study, he was called to the pastorate of Albion Congregational Church, Hull, and for twelve years he enjoyed the esteem and affection of a large fellowship. In 1854, Mr. Hall succeeded Rev. James Sherman as minister of the church worshipping in Surrey Chapel, Blackfriars Road, London. Soon after coming to the Metropolis, Mr. Hall took the degrees of B.A. and LL.B. in London University. He afterwards received three diplomas of D.D. from America, in grateful recognition of his early and continued advocacy of the cause of "Freedom and Union" at the time of the Civil War. Later, the same degree was conferred by Edinburgh University.

From the beginning of Mr. Hall's ministry Surrey Chapel was crowded every Sunday; large numbers were led to God, and new life was infused into the numerous institutions of the church. In 1866 his high character and excellent work were recognised by his being appointed chairman of the Congregational Union. Just before the lease of Surrey Chapel lapsed, a freehold site was purchased in Westminster Bridge Road, on which Christ Church was at length erected at a cost of £62,000.

As a preacher, Dr. Hall was singularly successful. His style was simple, natural and pithy. His sermons were for the most part expositions of Holy Scripture, illumined and enforced with frequent illustrations from nature and experience. Holding fast the vital doctrines of the Gospel, he delivered no discourse in which sinners were not entreated to be reconciled to God through Christ. Notwithstanding the constant claims upon him by the large church over which he presided, Dr. Hall found pleasure in aiding the cause of the Gospel throughout the country as opportunity offered, and in the summer months he often delighted some village congregation, or cheered some struggling pastor by rendering such help as small churches often need, but cannot always command. Open-air preaching he rated highly and largely employed, and after the Sunday and Monday services he was frequently to be found addressing a crowd of artizans in front of Christ Church. It is impossible to recount his numerous endeavours for the promotion of measures for the amelioration of the condition of the working classes, and in the persistent advocacy of temperance.

In 1892, Dr. Newman Hall resigned from the pastorate of Christ Church, but not from active service. His eightieth birthday was celebrated in 1896 by a remarkable meeting at the Memorial Hall. To the close of last year he was frequently to be found in the pulpits of Free Churches, not only in the Metropolis, but throughout the provinces.

Dr. Hall's writings were numerous and of an eminently practical character. He wrote volumes on "The Lord's Prayer," and "Gethsemane," also on Modern Romanism and the Doctrine of the Atonement. His tracts, including the well-known one on "Come to Jesus," were forcible and direct. It has been given to few workers in the Lord's vineyard to maintain for so long a period a beneficent influence such as Dr. Newman Hall was privileged to exercise. His name will long be held in loving remembrance by Christian churches throughout the land.

Pioneering in East Africa.

Rev. THOMAS WAKEFIELD, F.R.G.S.

THE subject of this sketch, whose name is indelibly associated with missions in East Africa, was born at Derby on June 23, 1836. He was educated at the Wesleyan day-school in Chester, where his parents had gone to live. Early converted to God, he soon began to call sinners to repentance. When learning the trade of a printer at Nantwich, he was recommended by his circuit as suitable for the work of the ministry, and in 1858 received his first appointment. The Free Methodists did not then possess a training school for ministerial candidates, so he went direct to circuit work from the printer's bench. He did not, however, neglect self-tuition—as his after history showed. When he had spent three years in the home ministry a new scene opened up before him. He became a foreign missionary.

The publication of the "Missionary Travels" of Rev. Dr. Krapf presented to the religious world the region of Eastern Equatorial Africa as a field for Christian missions almost untouched. He and his colleague, Rev. Johann Rebmann, had planted a mission station at Rabai, near Mombasa, in connection with the Church Missionary Society. Otherwise the field, which was then little known, was completely neglected. The United Methodist Free Churches, influenced by their treasurer, Mr. Charles Cheetham, of Heywood, resolved to commence mission work there. Dr. Krapf was invited to this country for an interview with the Missionary Committee, when he consented to take charge of a missionary expedition and lay the foundation of a mission. He had said much in his book concerning the Galla nation, and the evangelization of that people was the object in view. The missionary party was formed, and, leaving towards the close of 1861, it reached Africa after a dreary and toilsome voyage.

The party consisted of Dr. Krapf, the leader, two Swiss students from the missionary institution at St. Chrischona, with Messrs. Woolner and Wakefield, two young Free Methodist ministers. Mr. Woolner's health gave way almost immediately, and he returned home a physical wreck. The Swiss workers also retired. Dr. Krapf fixed the location of the mission at Ribe, near Mombasa, and then, regarding his work as accomplished, returned to England. Thomas Wakefield was left alone in a trying situation. He was quite a young man, inexperienced, unacquainted with the idiosyncrasies of the people, and ignorant of their language. He had many discomforts and privations, as all missionary pioneers must have. Still, he did not shrink from the position, but bravely "held the fort." As soon as possible a colleague was sent him, but for many months, in the spirit of a true hero, he laboured alone.

The first helper to arrive was Rev. Charles New, an able and enterprising young man, who was the first to ascend to the snow-line on the lofty mountain of Kilima-Njaro, and thus demonstrate the existence of snow in Equatorial Africa. This brother was a member of the expedition which was setting out to search for Livingstone when it was learned that the great explorer had been found. Mr. New died in 1875, returning from an excursion undertaken to establish a new mission. Another early colleague was Rev. Edward Butterworth, who succumbed to malaria three weeks after his arrival. As we are not writing the history of the Mission, we cannot chronicle the arrivals or departures of other brethren who joined. Of a number who were sent to reinforce or extend it, some fell asleep in Jesus and others were compelled by the failure of their health most reluctantly to return to England.

Neither the Gallas nor the Wanyika, among whom Mr. Wakefield laboured, were idolaters. They were superstitious, depraved, and literally "without God in the world"; but they did not bow down to wood and stone. It has been contended that all heathen have symbols, images of some sort which they adore, either in public or in secret. Mr. Wakefield and his colleagues had no reason to think that the people around them had anything of this kind. They "saw no similitude." But gross vice was common, and what the Bible strongly condemns was looked upon as venial. Intemperance also prevailed. When the cocoanut palm is tapped, it yields a pleasant juice which, on being allowed to stand, becomes highly intoxicating. Many of the natives were slaves to tembo drinking. A successor of Mr. Wakefield declared of a native town that the population were sober in the morning, tipsy by afternoon, and all drunk by night; and he did not mean this to be understood as a hyperbole. If this was an extreme example, the ordinary cases showed that strong drink in East Africa, as at home, was, and is, a great hindrance to the Gospel.

The greater number of the natives who settled on the mission stations were escaped slaves, and this fact often led to bewildering complications. The whole region now called the Sultanate of Zanzibar, was once offered absolutely to the English, but the offer was declined. Mr. Wakefield often expressed his regret at what he thought a mistaken step. At the present time, England holds the dominion in its hands, but it allows a titular sovereignty to the Sultan of Zanzibar. This gives authority to the Mohammedan law, which permits and sanctions slavery. In the course of years, Mr. Wakefield and his colleagues had the joy of seeing the slave-trade abolished by the Sultan, in agreement with the wishes of the English Government, and at the instance of Sir Bartle Frere. Domestic slavery remained, and missionaries—anxious on the one hand to obey the law, and on the other influenced by humanity, the love of freedom, and a desire to promote purity, were often placed in a dilemma when the man-stealer was on the track of his so-called property. Mr. Wakefield's policy was to help the fugitive on his way. After he had left the scene, a Chief Commissioner purchased the freedom of hundreds of slaves on the stations of the Church Missionary Society and the Free Methodists. The expenditure was repudiated at home, and the missionary societies were called upon to assist in defraying the cost of manumission. Mr. Wakefield strongly supported the application, and a considerable sum was raised by private subscription. That, however, did not end the evil or the strife. The plague was not stayed, and the difficulties arising are still acute.

In 1868, Mr. Wakefield came home on furlough, when he received a warm welcome. He addressed many missionary meetings, and his reception at Exeter Hall was enthusiastic. Ere he returned to Africa he was married to a pious young lady, Miss Rebecca Brewin, who was his companion and fellow-helper for several happy years. She died, however, soon after the death of her second child, who lived only a few short weeks. Except the aged and infirm Rev. J. Rebmann, of the Church Missionary Society, there was not a European within 140 miles of the station; so the afflicted father had to act as doctor and undertaker, making with his own hands the coffins for his wife and child! The hearts of mission helpers at home were wrung with grief when they read the pathetic letter in which poor Thomas Wakefield narrated his sad bereavements. Mrs. Wakefield's life has been embalmed in a beautiful memoir by her gifted brother, Rev. Robert Brewin, of Grantham.

Eight years after the death of his first wife Mr. Wakefield married again. As the lady he married in 1881 happily lives still, delicacy forbids saying more than that she is universally beloved, and that everyone regards her as every way fitted to be a missionary's wife.

Although there was some cheering success attending devoted operations on the field, it was felt almost from the first that the precise design of the mission could not be carried out in the particular locality chosen by Dr. Krapf. The evangelization of the Gallas was intended, but the people in the neighbourhood of Mombasa and in the Duruma Country were chiefly Wanyikas. Hence it was thought desirable to establish a mission in Gallaland on the banks of the River Tana. An attempt was made a few years after Mr. Wakefield's arrival, but it proved futile. Not until 1884 was a successful attempt made. On Christmas Day, 1883, a coloured missionary and some converted Gallas set out from Jomvu to seek a settlement on the banks of the Tana. They fixed on Golbanti. Mr. Wakefield visited it a few weeks later, accompanied by Mr. Houghton, a colleague, who took charge of the Golbanti Mission in the following year. Mr. and Mrs. Houghton were both barbarously murdered, a few months later, by a predatory tribe, the Masai. The Mission however, took permanent root, and while Mr. Wakefield remained in Africa, he superintended it, though, as he never fixed his residence there, he could only pay it occasional visits. In this region the object of the mission has been attained. The Gallas, a people with some noble qualities, but proud and intractable, have been reached. Of late the missionaries have begun to labour also among the Pokomos, a race subject to the Gallas, but much more amenable to the influences of the Gospel.

As East Africa became better known, and travellers sought to reach the far interior from its coast, Mr. Wakefield came into contact with many persons who have distinguished themselves in different ways. He was familiar with Sir John Kirk and Sir Bartle Frere; Captain Burton, Joseph Thomson, and Henry M. Stanley he knew well; the two Church Missionary Society's martyrs, Mr. Pilkington and Bishop Hannington, he also knew. Horace Waller, Livingstone's friend, was his friend also, and he knew the great and good Dr. Livingstone himself.

Mr. Wakefield was a missionary, not an explorer; but in his missionary character he made explorations, and the geographical information he gave was so important that in 1882 the Murchison grant was awarded him by the Royal Geographical Society. For such services also he was made a F.R.G.S. He became an expert in the languages of the Swahilis, the Wanyika, and the Gallas, executing translations of portions of Holy Scripture, and composing or translating hymns which are yet used in the service of song in the house of the Lord.

During Mr. Wakefield's residence in East Africa, as well as subsequently, the Church Missionary Society greatly extended its operations there. In addition to smaller stations, Frere Town, and, more recently, Mombasa, have become centres of work and influence. Mr. Wakefield laboured in harmony with his brethren of that great society, and all the Free Methodist workers have been laid under a debt of obligation to these missionaries, and especially to the ladies and the medical men. On the Tana, also, there is great harmony between the Free Methodist missionaries and the Neukirchen (German) missionaries at Ngao.

Mr. Wakefield's retirement from the mission field was involuntary. In 1887, he came to England. After doing good service as a deputation, it was arranged that he should return. A medical interdict, however, at the last moment, kept him at home. His brethren showed their great respect for his character and services by electing him President of the Annual Assembly in 1888. He also represented the denomination at the Ecumenical Missionary Conference in New York. He was appointed by the last Annual Assembly to visit, with other two brethren, his old field of operations, but his doctor forbade his going, and he died ere the other delegates returned. After his resumption of home work, he laboured in several populous centres; and was living in Southport when called home.

His last illness was short, and tidings of his death—which took place on Sunday, December 15, 1901—were received with surprise as well as sorrow. Amongst those who saw him on his deathbed was Rev. Dr. Brook, President of the Connexion. In the course of conversation Dr. Brook said, "You have done a good day's work, Brother Wakefield;" but the dying man deprecatingly shook his head, and said, "I am trusting in Christ—only in Christ." The remark of the President was the statement of a fact; the reply lifts us to the higher region of faith. Judged by any human standard, Thomas Wakefield had performed a good day's work, but, like a greater missionary than himself, his desire was to "be found in Him, not having his own righteousness, but that which is through the faith of Christ."

Among Chinese Lepers.

THE efforts of the Mission to Lepers among suffering outcasts in China are meeting with much encouragement, and are appreciated, not only by the lepers themselves, but in some instances by the Chinese authorites.

At Hiao-kan, near Hankow, the work has been most successful. Many conversions have taken place, and Dr. Griffith John, who takes a warm interest in the asylum, wrote recently that if it were doubled in size it would be filled immediately. Dr. H. Fowler (the superintendent) says: "At present we are the only workers in Central China among the lepers. It is our unhappy lot to have to refuse many applicants. The effect of the leper-work on the authorities at Hiao-kan is very apparent."

Great difficulty was found in securing land for extension of the asylum, exorbitant rates being demanded. But on Dr. Fowler's return from a holiday he found this obstacle removed in the most gratifying manner. The leading gentry of the place having heard that he was desirous of enlarging the Leper Asylum had met in his absence, and had agreed to let him have three large fields at a merely nominal price—practically as a gift. This they did as a mark of their appreciation of the leper work and the medical work carried on by him. A few days later they all met at the Asylum, and the leading man of the district addressed the lepers in the chapel, praising the missionaries who had come, not to seize territory, but to care for the diseased and suffering. The officials carried to the mandarin so favourable a report of the work that he not only refused to receive his usual fee, but paid an official visit to the missionaries to express his approval.

Dr. Fowler pleads urgently for at least £200, for which sum three new wards could be built and other improvements affected. This enlargement would enable us to receive, and provide for fifty or sixty more of the homeless outcasts who plead for admittance to this, the only Home of Hope open to them. This need is emphasized by the distress due to the fearful floods in the Yangtse Valley, which have sent up the prices of food to famine rates.

A NOBLE EXAMPLE.

Just outside the gates of Canton is a large leper colony of about 1,000 souls, among whom a most promising effort has been begun. It originated with a blind, one-legged, leper woman, who learnt of Christ in the Medical Mission Hospital, and returned to the village to tell others of the wonderful doctrine. Her testimony resulted in many inquiries and several baptisms. The Christian lepers contrived to collect enough to purchase a site for a church, the erection of which will cost £100. In this large village the missionary reports "scores of children who have no sign of leprosy," and for these a home and school are urgently needed.

A new opening of a most encouraging character is that in Hokchiang (south of Foochow), where Rev. J. B. Carpenter (C.M.S.) has begun to visit the native leper asylum. The lepers invited him, and fifty gave a most attentive hearing. He writes:—"I find the average Chinaman very unresponsive, but it was so very different with these. I do not think I have ever seen the Gospel received with such manifest joy." A medical worker looks after them, and they show great eagerness to learn. We are desirous to place an efficient catechist among these poor people. For £25 we could provide such a worker for a year, as well as a little extra food for them. The very paltry allowance made by the authorities is often much reduced before it reaches them, so that they are almost starving at times.

In addition to the foregoing, a church for the lepers at Foochow is being built, and another at Yen Ping. The work at Longwong is progressing, and our asylums at Hangchow (superintended by Dr. Main) are crowded out.

The Gospel in Basutoland.

DURING recent years, efforts to take the Gospel to the Basutos have been more successful than at any time since the first attempt at missionary work in their country was made, some seventy years ago. With the object of awakening a keener interest in missionaries and their labours in Basutoland, Rev. A. CASALIS is paying a visit to England, and is holding meetings as occasion allows.

The first of these gatherings took place at Mildmay Conference Hall a few days ago, when Colonel Morton welcomed a large number of friends to listen to a lecture, which was deeply interesting. In introducing the missionary, Dr. Maxwell spoke of the Basutoland Mission as one of the most remarkable studies to be found in the history of missions.

The lecturer's discourse was full of encouragement, and showed how the blessing of God has abundantly rested upon the labours of the French brethren, the outcome of which is seen to-day in the 10,000 converts who are adorning the doctrine of Christ. Some 5,000 natives have applied for membership, and are awaiting acceptance into Church fellowship. The Church is organized in a way that tells upon the whole life of the country. The missionaries have fought the difficulties with which they have been confronted—drunkenness, polygamy, &c.—and are looking forward to the day, which they feel to be not far distant, when none of the 250,000 souls in Basutoland shall be outside the influence of the Gospel. The lecture was illustrated by lantern views, descriptive of the life and customs of an interesting people.

Similar meetings have been held at various centres in London, and at Andover, Eastbourne, Torquay, &c.; while others are arranged for Wimbledon, Tunbridge Wells, Blackheath, and Folkestone. Friends who are anxious to further the efforts of Mrs. Sutherland Taylor in giving opportunity for Rev. A. Casalis to speak of the progress of the Gospel in Basutoland may communicate with her at 25, Brownswood Road, Clissold Park, London, N.

Belgian Missionary Church.

WE have from time to time called attention to the work of the Christian Missionary Church of Belgium—evangelical effort in the midst of a Roman Catholic community. Founded in 1837, the work has been steadily growing, and to-day there are sixty churches and halls, with thirty-four pastors, and fifteen evangelists and colporteurs. These details represent a large amount of work, organized with a thoroughly evangelistic purpose; in fact, public worship and meetings are held regularly in ninety-eight places, with a total of over seven thousand gatherings in the course of the year. What this means will be best understood by those who know the field. Suffice it to say that the congregations are composed of converts from Romanism, and a spirit of inquiry is manifesting itself on every hand.

During the past year interesting progress has been achieved. Open-air preaching at Thulin, in the Borinage, has led to the organization of a new station there. Hornu, an annex of Quaregnon, near Mons, has grown so as to require the appointment of a minister. A new place of worship has been opened at Gilly, near Charleroi; the new converts of Seilles, where the work had begun two years ago, have taken the Gospel to a neighbouring village, Surlemez, and a meeting hall has been opened there. The work for the young has been extended. Fifteen Sunday-schools were organized during the year, bringing the total up to seventy-eight, with 2,956 pupils, one-third of them Roman Catholic children.

As to finances, the progress made is not less striking. The 6,107 adult members of the church, most of them working people, have contributed £4,277 towards the maintenance of the church work, besides contributions to orphanage, missions, and other undertakings. More than half the entire expenditure (about £8,000) has been found in Belgium; in former years two-thirds of the total was supplied in the form of contributions from foreign sympathizers.

The help of friends in Great Britain is still urgently needed; and that assistance may be more readily secured, Rev. Chas. Jung, of Charleroi, is at present on a visit to London as delegate of the Missionary Church. His temporary address is: 8, Mecklenburg Street, London, W.C. He is fully acquainted with the deeply interesting history and noble work of the Church, and will greatly value opportunities to address meetings.

India's Present Need.—III.

WHILE nearly all interested in India's welfare agree upon the great need of fostering and developing home industries, opinions differ as to the methods to be pursued. On this we need not enlarge at present.

Two objections are generally made against missionaries entering into industrial enterprises: (1) that it interferes with their spiritual work; and (2) that they are not qualified for it by previous training.

Such work has been forced upon many of them by circumstances arising from the famine distress. None are more willing to admit than the missionaries themselves that it was at the cost of their directly spiritual work that they were able to relieve the appalling distress and to save thousands of lives. But was Jesus neglecting his spiritual work when He twice fed thousands in the wilderness?

At the A.M.E. Mission, Aligarh, we found Rev. and Mrs. J. C. Lawson superintending three departments of work as the result of recent famines, 336 boys under the care of Rev. H. Lavalette, over 200 girls in the orphanage directed by Miss Bobenhouse, and the Women's Industrial Home, with 360 inmates, of whom the majority were widows, and at the head of which is Mrs. Matthews, a woman of remarkable energy, who has learned herself every industry that she wishes her women to be taught. The buildings are not completed yet; but they have already made a fair start in weaving, lace, basket-making, &c. While walking with Mrs. Matthews over the compound and seeing her give a smile to one, a correction to another, a brief order here, some advice there, pointing out to the workmen some defect in a roof, as if nothing could escape her eyes, bright and cheery and trustful at the same time, we could but feel that she was the right woman in the right place.

If the women and girls departments show more progress, it is partly because they are better supported, and partly on account of an adequate number of young ladies helping with the work; while in the boys' department there is great dearth of helpers. Mr. Lavalette, who came out two years ago, and who is endeavouring to master the language, superintends this work with only the assistance of the eldest son (sixteen years of age) of Mr. Lawson. The boys are taught shoemaking, bricklaying and carpentering by native men who understand the work but imperfectly; for if there are certain branches, especially in art industry, such as the brass work and carving in ivory in which the Indian finds no equal, there are other more useful trades, as yet in a primitive condition, which greatly need to be improved upon. Therefore the cry of Mr. Lawson is—

Wanted—(1) A master tanner to open up tannery, to supply leather of the best kind and of all kinds to the mission industrial shoe-shops. (2) A master shoemaker, one who can with his own hands make boots and shoes of the best quality; also one who understands the setting up and entire management of shoe-machinery run by steam power. (3) A master cabinet-maker. Furniture of all kinds, best kinds, in demand. He should know, if possible, simple blacksmithing and tin work, as these are largely connected with cabinet-making.

Mr. Lawson is coming to England in May, and it is hoped that he may find opportunity for expounding his plans to sympathetic ears.

He is the presiding elder of the great Punjab (land of the five waters), a vast stretch of country extending over 400 miles in length, from Delhi on the south-east away beyond Peshawar on the north-west, and in width over 300 miles, from the Indus near Mooltan on the west, in a straight line along the Sutlej beyond Lahore to the Himalayas on the east, with a teeming population of over 28,000,000.

There are, of course, numbers of churches and missions of other denominations within this territory, and this is only to show the vastness of a single man's work. Yes, India needs more Christian men—men of ability and sterling character, able to teach the dignity of labour of every kind.

We mentioned in our last, the factory at Nadiad. Similar industrial buildings are being erected at Baroda. From the methods of applying the famine relief, we are justified in expecting that the enterprise will meet with success. With reference to that time, the presiding elder of Gujarat, Rev. E. F. Frease, says: "Our main principles were to avoid that gratuitous relief that pauperizes, and to provide, first, work at a living wage for those who could not otherwise obtain it, and at the same time, to supply food grains to them at a rate to correspond with the wage. By doing this, the committee was able to use its funds over and over again. Whereas, had it given its funds outright either in cash, uncooked or cooked food, or clothing, it would have been restricted either to the permanent relief of comparatively a few, or the temporary help of a larger number who after that should be expended, would have been left miserably to perish.

"To illustrate. At a certain centre a weaving community would be given yarn to weave, and be paid the wages by means of which they are able to purchase sufficient food at our cheap shops to keep them in condition. The money thus paid for the grain would be immediately re-invested by the committee in other supplies, which in turn would be purchased and paid for in the same way. In the meantime, the cloth produced would be disposed of at slightly above the cost of production, and that money again used. In some cases it had a triple or quadruple use, as where the New York Christian Herald made a grant of money for over 30,000 blankets. The District Committee had the blankets woven by its own weavers, paying the regular wage, and having the blankets as well for distribution.

"Our weaving operations," continues Mr. Frease, "assumed a magnitude not dreamed of when the work begun. We managed to produce a cloth exactly adapted to the needs of the Public Works Department for famine relief shelters, and at a price which made it profitable to the Government to purchase it from us. Their purchases amounted in all to about £4,300."

By the above we are encouraged in hoping that the Industrial Mission plant at Baroda in connection with the M.E.M., which is established on similar lines to that at Nadiad, will prove a success from a business point of view.

Dr. F. J. Lucas, of the Presbyterian Mission at Allahabad, on the occasion of our calling upon him and Mrs. Lucas, remarked to us: "Where the leading missionary is himself something of a mechanical genius and thoroughly interested in the work I generally find industrial enterprise a success." Not every missionary can be supposed to be such a genius, and yet he may be anxious and striving to meet the existing need. It is here where the Industrial Missions Aid Society comes in.

The problem of India has been sometimes called "The White Man's Burden." In ages past the burden of Nineveh was laid upon Nahum; in more recent times a noble woman's heart was burdened with the fate of numberless miserable prisoners, and strove and yearned to relieve them. It was but the other day a missionary told us how vividly he remembered two pictures which in his youth he often used to see side by side, and which represented to him two ideals of true womanhood—Queen Victoria and Elizabeth Fry. The grandson of the latter, Mr. H. W. Fry, feels in his turn the burden of India's mission problem. It is to his initiative that the Industrial Missions Aid Society (17, Paternoster Row) owes its existence. Its aims are well known. Its object is to assist foreign missions all over the world by initiating industries side by side with missionary work, and providing the necessary capital and proper business management.

Two points are always insisted upon, namely:—

(1) That the proposed industry will be of substantial assistance to missionary work.

(2) That there is a fair prospect of the industry proving successful from a financial point of view within a reasonable time.

The risk incurred by investments would, therefore, not be any greater than it is in ordinary business enterprises, while the purpose of the Society is worthy of the co-operation of every Christian man and woman who is able to assist either by grants or by loans. It means nothing less than the promotion and extension of Christianity in India, such as it is understood by believers, and not simply by nominal Christians.

Leaders of the Brahmo Somaj (reformed Hinduism) have recently said that the missionaries are already leading the way in industrial work, but that the need is so great that it must not be left to the missionaries, but must be taken up by the people of India themselves.

If missionary effort should accomplish nothing but stimulate the peoples of India to action in this matter, the good done would even then be worth the trouble.

The other day we happened to meet Mr. Fry at the C.M.S. Mission, Sikandarah, near Agra, where Akbar's tomb is. This greatest and most enlightened of Mogul emperors, a contemporary of Queen Elizabeth, is said to have had a Christian wife, Miriam by name. The mission buildings stand on the site of the gardens surrounding her tomb, which, on one occasion, served as a hospital for small-pox patients.

Rev. E. T. Pegg has 300 orphans under his care, to whom, as he says, the English are very good. We purchased the first rug that was turned out by these children, and which we hope on our return to show to our friends. Mr. Fry is endeavouring to establish a carpet factory there, similar to that at Ahmednagar. We heartily wish him God-speed in it.

Bombay Y.W.C.A.

DESCRIBING the work at the Bombay Association, Miss M. F. Willoughby Jones, general secretary, writes:—"The Home has filled up far more rapidly than we had expected. On the first floor, besides permanent boarders, we have rooms for visitors, and are never without some missionaries, who come either as they pass through or for business, but chiefly to rest or recruit.

"We have been greatly cheered by the many testimonies we receive from them to the help and refreshment, spiritual as well as physical, which they have found during their stay here. The next floor has accommodation for twenty-three young women, and the upper floor will enable us to take fourteen more. There are a very large number of English and Eurasian young women earning their living in Bombay, and the need for a Christian Home such as this was very great. We praise God for this beautiful institution, and still more for the many tokens of blessing which He has already graciously given us."

"Walk Not."

WALK not by fleshly impulse led,
As in the evil bygone days;
But, as one risen from the dead,
Walk ever in the Spirit's ways.

Walk not by sense and carnal sight,
Let Faith's clear vision be thy guide;
And in the darkest hour of night,
The Lord will travel by thy side.

Walk not in cunning craft and guile,
By selfish passion led astray;
Yield not to evil's subtle wile,
But, fearless, be the child of day.

Walk not by legal burdens bowed,
But Christ's redeemed freeman be;
With fulness of his grace endowed,
Live the glad life of liberty.

Walk not as utter worldlings do,
With vain and foolish thoughts inspired
Be to thy God and calling true,
Thy heart with holy passion fired.

Walk not as fools, but as the wise,
Redeeming life's swift fleeting hours;
Counting but dross earth's dearest prize,
Judging as nought its richest dowers.

Walk not in any doubtful path,
But in the straight and narrow way;
And thus God's smile, and not his wrath,
Shall be upon thee through life's day.

About Wires and Posts.

Do you ever notice, when you are on a railway journey, how the telegraph wires at the side of the line seem to rise and fall as the train rushes along? It was always a source of wonder and amusement to me as a little boy. I thought the "poor wires" were trying their best to get up as high as possible, but the "nasty posts" kept coming and knocking them down! I got quite excited as the wires rose higher and higher, almost out of sight, until a post would bring them down again. It seemed sometimes as if they really would escape; but no, they were caught every time—and once, in my feverish interest, I jumped on an old gentleman's toe, which made him very cross indeed.

Of course you know it was only imagination to suppose that either the wires or the posts moved at all. The weight of the wires, causing them to droop between the posts, produced the effect I have described. Your parents will, no doubt, explain this to you more fully if you do not quite understand what I mean.

Now I think the chief lessons we may learn from the apparent movement of the wires and posts is that we should have Pluck and Perseverance. You seem to be getting on so nicely at home, or at school, trying to be thoughtful and kind; or you are doing your best to overcome some fault or bad habit—when suddenly something happens, like the post rushing by, which knocks down the wires of your good endeavours, perhaps lower than they were before. But you must not lose heart. Gradually the wires rise again, and every time they are, as it were, struck lower, they pluckily try to regain their lost position. But in actual life we are more fortunate than they, because we can go on mounting higher and higher in the ways of God, whereas after perhaps hundreds of miles they are really no higher than when they first began. But you will find that at the last they end, not on the ground, but at the top of the post. This reminds us of what is said of Gad in Genesis (xlviii.-l.) (See this week's "Bible Searcher.") That is my text.

Now, boys and girls, when you stretch out the wires of your good endeavours, you may be quite sure that you will have difficulties to meet, and temptations to resist which will discourage you. But first, be brave; do not sit down and cry, but ask God to help you to "overcome evil with good" (Rom. ix.-xii.).

And remember this: if it were not for the posts, the wires would not be held up at all, so that while the posts seem to be like enemies to them, they are also like friends. So, too, some of the discouragements of your young life may turn out to be blessings in disguise, to uphold you and make you strong.

Then, having bravely determined that you will not give in, you must persevere, which means,

> If at first you don't succeed,
> Try, try, try again.

You will never do much good in life by sitting still with folded hands, grieving over your disappointments. Let "Up and Doing!" be your motto. I saw a picture the other day of some Malays catching fish. How do you think they did it? After baiting one end of the line and throwing it into the water, they tied the other end on to their big toe, and lay down to sleep by the river side! There's a lazy way to catch fish!

Now, don't lie down and expect that success will come to you while you are asleep. Make up your mind that you are going to mount higher and higher in your studies, and in your Christian character; that you will not be disheartened by occasional failures; that you will persevere in all that is right and noble and true, and "run with patience the race that is set before you, looking unto Jesus" (Heb. xi.-xii.).

> Yield not to temptation,
> For yielding is sin:
> Each victory will help you
> Some other to win.

It may mean hard trying, because Satan is very strong; it will mean incessant watchfulness, because he is very cunning; but God is both stronger and wiser than he, and as Jesus conquered him in the wilderness (Matt. iv. 4, 7, 9, 10), and overcame him on the cross (Heb. ii. 14; John x. 17, 18), so He will give you the victory. "Resist the devil, and he will flee from you" (Jas. iv.).

Obedience (1 Sam. xv. 10-23).

In the earlier part of his reign, Saul had failed in obedience, and as a punishment his seed were not to sit on the throne. "Thy kingdom shall not continue" (1 Sam. xiii. 14). Some years had passed since then, and now for a second time he was to be tested. Would he do God's bidding? If so, he might still have a useful and happy reign.

The Amalekites occupied the country south of Palestine, roaming over its pasture lands with their flocks and herds. For their opposition to Israel they were threatened with extermination (Ex. xvii. 16); and now the sentence was to be carried into effect. As God's anointed, it was obvious that Saul must hold himself at God's behest. It was a terrible enactment, for it meant that all must be destroyed—nothing spared; but we must remember that, like the old inhabitants of Canaan, the Amalekites were hopelessly and utterly corrupt, and their prolonged existence would have been inimical to the best interests of the race. Besides, the age was a rough one, and required a rough lesson; it could not have understood the Sermon on the Mount. Saul was not loath to undertake the Divine commission, summoned a vast army, and smote them from Havilah, at the south of Palestine, to Shur, "the wall" of Egypt.

Its divine sentence, however, was not carried into effect, for Agag, and the best of the booty were saved. Into Samuel's ear, in the night, the awful tidings were uttered by God, that it repented Him to have made Saul king. It was in vain that the old prophet pleaded with tears and prayers for the erring monarch. There are hours in life when the prayers of our dearest will not save us, because we have deliberately taken the bit into our own teeth, and refused to be held in by bit and bridle. With heavy heart, Samuel went to meet Saul at Carmel, a few miles south of Hebron, and then followed him to Gilgal, near Jericho.

The king met him effusively, and declared, either because he wanted to evade further inquiry or because he thought that he had done all that was needed, "I have performed the commandment of the Lord." He resembles many still, who profess to obey with entire consecration, but keep back part of the price. They have a reserve in their hearts and lives. They give up what they do not value, but keep something else, which is the life of their life. And thus one thing is all the while eating at the root of their peace and usefulness. With them, as with Saul, only one chamber of reserve is needed to depose them from the royalty with which God was eager to invest them. Ah, young reader, ask thyself whether this may not be a picture of thine own character. Thou seemest so earnest and devoted; but is there one point in which thou preferrest thy will and way to God's?

It was very unwelcome, that at that very hour the herds began to low. Sometimes I have heard them lowing in lives and homes with which I have come into contact; where, on the one hand, I have been met with professions of entire surrender, whilst on the other clear evidence to the contrary has crept out in the ordering of the home or the customs of the business.

Saul had two excuses, the one that the people had been too strong for him, the other that he was anxious to use the spoils for the purposes of religious worship.... This was too much for the prophet, and he burst out in the scathing denunciation: "To obey is better than sacrifice . . . the Lord hath rejected thee from being king."

Then Saul trembled. Finding himself classed with idolaters and dealers in witchcraft, he shrank before the inevitable punishment that must befall; and he feared apparently most of all the loss of his prestige if Samuel should break with him, or leave him abruptly and without prayer. Nothing tests us more absolutely than obedience to the known will of God. "He that hath my commandments and keepeth them," said the Lord, "is he that loveth Me." And yet we are so weak. Passion and lust of gain are often and often too strong. May God forgive us, and reinforce us by his mighty and all-sufficient grace. Obedience preserves the stars from wrong, and is compatible with perfect freedom. F. B. M.

C.E. NOTES.

News comes from Ireland of interesting extension work done by Rev. Y. M. Alley in Connaught, resulting in the registration of seven new Societies.

* * *

Dr. Francis E. Clark, who is now visiting various parts in the interests of Christian Endeavour, reports that the work is most encouraging in Germany, where it is greatly blessed of God in many places; also, that it is well started in Italy; while a beginning has been made in Scandinavia.

* * *

In reference to C.E. work in the Samoan Islands, Rev. John Marriot writes:—"In the Samoan group we have a total of 1,822 belonging to the Endeavour Society. In the Gilbert Islands we have three societies, and the total number of members is 360. In the Ellice group we have seven societies, and a total of 706 members. In the Tokelan group we have two societies and 335 members. In Samoa we have the following:—Malna Institution for training native ministers, eighty-seven members; Papanta Girls' Boarding School, forty-one members; Atanloma Girls' Boarding School, a society of fourteen members just commenced; Talealili district, twelve societies with 279 members."

Subject—The Stoning of Stephen (Acts vii. 54—viii. 2).

Golden Text—Matthew v. 44.

As Stephen stood in the prisoner's place before the Sanhedrin, he would probably remember that, some three years before, his Divine Master had stood in that very same place to answer a similar charge. "Fear not" (Matt. x. 28), "Lo, I am with you" (Matt. xxviii. 20). Surely it was the voice of the Lord into his soul that brought that "look of heaven" on his countenance, which riveted the gaze of all the Council! Still the high priest pressed the judicial question, and Stephen's defence, which has been called "the mouthpiece of sacred eloquence," followed. With a memory stored with Scripture truth and history; a mind illumined, "taught of God" (1 John ii. 27; John vi. 45); and a face beaming with zeal and devotion to the Lord Jesus Christ—by the "power promised" Stephen preached a sermon which went home to the consciences of his hearers with the unerring force of God's searching, sin-convincing Spirit. Calm and fearless, because "God was with him" (v. 9), with courtesy and respect (though the men in front were planning to murder him, Gal. v. 22, 23), Stephen traced the history of the chosen people from Abraham to Christ, by way of the prophecies and promises, in the lives of the patriarchs and prophets; he emphasized the persecutions and idolatries, and, lastly, quoted 1 Kings viii. 27 and Isaiah lxvi. 1, 2. So far they listened, but when he gathered the full force of his manifold argument in one focus, and turned its fire on the men before him (as in verse 51, resisting the Holy Ghost; 52, crucifying the Just One; 53, failing to keep the law), they were cut to the heart (frenzied with rage): he a foreigner, and they the chosen nation. They lost their power of speech, forgot their dignity, and rushed on the prisoner.

Stephen's Vision. How is Stephen engaged? Like Moses (Ex. xxxiv. 29, 30), his face reflected Glory. His opening words were, "The God of Glory." He had confessed "that Jesus Christ is Lord to the Glory of God the Father" (Phil. ii. 11). As the closing sentence of his defence left his lips, "being full of the Holy Ghost," he "saw the Glory of God"; and when this "light affliction," which (was) but for a moment, "had worked for him" a far more exceeding and eternal weight of Glory (2 Cor. iv. 17), "The King of Glory" (Psa. xxiv. 7-10; 1 Tim. iii. 16; Acts i. 2; 1 Pet. iii. 22; iv. 13; and John xvii. 24) to whom he had commended his spirit, and who had "guided him with his counsel," received him to glory (Ps. lxxiii. 24, 25). May we not say with John, in Patmos (Rev. vi. 9, 10, 11), "I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the Word of God, and for the testimony which they held," and, remembering with Stephen, the dear missionaries in China, read 1 Pet. iv. 12 and 1 Pet. i. 4-11, to the glorious keynote of John xvii. 1-26, "Father, I will . . . . that they may behold my glory," and pray as in Jude 24? Stephen means "crown." 1 Pet. v. 4—"Crown of life." Rev. ii. 10—"Crown of glory."

"Thy martyr Stephen" (Acts xxii. 20). Stephen's position before the Sanhedrin was one full of sacred interest, so closely was the proto-martyr allowed to follow in the steps of his Divine Master. (1) He was the object of malicious persecution from the elders, scribes, &c., and "laid hands" on (Acts vi. 12; Matt. xxvi. 50). (2) Arraigned on false charge, and on same ground of complaint (Acts vi. 12, 13, 14; Luke xxiii. 5; Matt. xxvi. 61). (3) False witnesses and blasphemy (Acts vi. 11 and 13; Matt. xxvi. 60 and 65). (4) Gnashed on him (Acts vii. 54; Psa. xxxv. 16). (5) Vision of glory (Acts vii. 55, 56; Matt. xxvi. 64). (6) Cast out of the city (Acts vii. 58; Heb. xiii. 12; John xix. 17; Luke xxiii. 33; John xviii. 1); Stephen's Gate led towards Cedron. (7) "Man of Cyrene" also a Grecian (Matt. xxvii. 32). (8) Prayed for his enemies (Acts vii. 60; Luke xxiii. 34). (9) Prayer in death (Acts vii. 59; Luke xxiii. 46). (10) Buried with honour (Acts viii. 2; Mark xv. 43 and 46). Even "the clothes" and the "loud voice" are mentioned (Acts vii. 58; Matt. xxvii. 35 and 50).

Personalia.

Many readers will hear with regret that Mr. W. R. Rickett, the esteemed treasurer of the Baptist Missionary Society, has had a slight paralytic attack, and is confined to his home. He will be unable to attend to any business for some time to come.

In view of the various notices which have appeared in the Press regarding the health of Mr. Samuel Smith, M.P., he would like it to be known that since he went to Mentone he has not been so well, but a change for the better has now taken place. He fears, however, that it will be long before he is able for public work again, and requests that only necessary correspondence be sent to him.

Mr. J. D. McEwen, whose work in Brazil we brought before our readers last week, hopes to remain in London a short time, and will be glad of opportunities to address meetings in aid of Gospel effort in South America. During the past few days he has spoken at Littlehampton Convention, and in Exeter Hall, the Metropolitan Tabernacle, and elsewhere. Letters to Mr. McEwen may be addressed to our care.

Rev. F. B. Meyer gives up his pastorate at Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road, S.E., on the third Sunday in July. Then he purposes to spend a month at Northfield. Returning home, he hopes to labour in Great Britain during September, afterwards proceeding to Norway, Sweden, and Germany. In January, 1903, Mr. Meyer expects to begin his larger ministry throughout England. He asks prayer for God's blessing to attend the out-working of this programme.

*How a Sunday-School Class was Converted.

By D. L. MOODY.

When I went to Chicago, I hired four pews in a church, and used to go out on the street and pick up young men and fill these pews. I never spoke to the young men about their souls; that was the work of the elders, I thought. After working for some time like that, I started a mission Sunday-school. I thought numbers were everything, and so I worked for numbers. When the attendance ran below 1,000 it troubled me, and when it ran to 1,200 or 1,500 I was elated. Still none were converted; there was no harvest. Then God opened my eyes.

There was a class of young ladies in the school who were, without exception, the most frivolous set of girls I ever met. One Sunday the teacher was ill, and I took that class. They laughed in my face, and I felt like opening the door and telling them all to go out and never come back. That week the teacher of the class came into the store where I worked. He was pale and looked very ill.

"What is the trouble?" I asked.

"I have had another hæmorrhage from the lungs. The doctor says I cannot live on Lake Michigan, so I am going back to New York State. I suppose I am going to die."

He seemed greatly troubled, and when I asked the reason, he replied:

"Well, I have never led any of my class to Christ. I really believe I have done the girls more harm than good." I had never heard anyone talk like that before, and it set me thinking. After a while I said, "Suppose you go and tell them how you feel. I will go with you in a carriage if you want to go."

He consented, and we started out together. It was one of the best journeys I ever had on earth. We went to the house of one of the girls, called for her, and the teacher talked to her about her soul. There was no laughing then. Tears stood in her eyes before long. After he had explained the way of life, he suggested that we have a word of prayer. He asked me to pray. True, I had never done such a thing in my life as to pray God to couvert a young lady there and then. But we prayed, and God answered our prayer.

We went to other houses. He would go upstairs and be all out of breath, and he would tell the girls what he had come for. It wasn't long before they broke down and sought for salvation. The next day we went out again. At the end of ten days he came to the store with his face literally shining.

"Mr. Moody," he said, "the last one of my class has yielded herself to Christ."

I tell you we had a time of rejoicing.

He had to leave the next night, so I called his class together that night for a prayer-meeting, and there God kindled a fire in my soul that has never gone out. The height of my ambition had been to be a successful merchant, and if I had known that meeting was going to take that ambition out of me, I might not have gone. But how many times I have thanked God since for that meeting!

The dying teacher sat in the midst of his class, and talked with them, and read the fourteenth chapter of John. We tried to sing, "Blest be the tie that binds," after which we knelt to pray. I was just rising from my knees when one of the class began to pray for her dying teacher. Another prayed, and another, and before we rose the whole class had prayed. As I went out, I said to myself:

"O God, let me die rather than lose the blessing I have received to-night!"

The next evening I went to the depôt to say good-bye to that teacher. Just before the train started, one of the class came, and before long, without any pre-arrangement, they were all there. What a meeting that was! We tried to sing, but we broke down. The last we saw of the teacher, he was standing on the platform of the rear car, his finger pointing upward, telling that class to meet him in heaven.

Poor Men's Palaces.

At a time when huge blocks of cheap lodging-houses, from which Gospel preaching is deliberately excluded, are being opened in the metropolis by purely financial corporations, it is well that Christian people should be reminded of the Victoria Homes, which are conducted on distinctly religious principles, and, after years of usefulness, are proving more than ever attractive in the eyes of the class for whose benefit they were originated.

It will be remembered that the work had its inception in the refuges for emigrants at Blackwall, started by Lord Radstock, Mr. T. A. Denny, Mr. Seagram, and other members of the present committee, and organized by Mr. A. Wilké, whose ripe experience and unremitting care have borne rich fruit. The first of the Victoria Homes was opened in Commercial Street with accommodation for between 250 and 300 men. The popularity which was immediately attained rendered enlargement and a second institution necessary. Accordingly the imposing No. 2 Home in the Whitechapel Road, E., was opened, and the two buildings now provide accommodation for no fewer than 1,100 men.

CLEANLINESS AND GODLINESS.

An inspection of either Home is a revelation of what has been accomplished by a happy combination of skill and sympathy. Anything more unlike the ordinary "doss house" of London rookeries, it would be difficult to imagine. Viewing the Whitechapel premises from floor to floor, one finds that from roof to basement the building is a model of cleanliness and wise arrangement. The cubicles are divided by light buff terra-cotta tiles, which are easily kept free from dirt, while it is plain that, under the strict but kindly rule that prevails, the men have come so highly to value the Home that they take a pride in helping to keep it so beautifully clean. Scientific appliances are used for ensuring plenty of light and fresh air for each dormitory.

In the large basement are rooms where the men, on returning from their day's work, may rest or take their food. Adjacent is the kitchen, notable for its bright and businesslike appearance, where a man may purchase, for example, a plate of roast beef and potatoes, or beef-steak pudding, for threepence, a meat pie for a penny, soup or vegetables for a halfpenny, and tea for a halfpenny a pint. Nor is the list of other advantages possessed by the building easily exhausted. The recreation hall is a commodious saloon, and the reading-room, supplied with books and magazines, affords a quiet refuge to those who desire to spend their spare time in reading and study. A man who stays for a night in the building has the privilege of using all the rooms until the close of the succeeding day without further charge.

A REMARKABLE CONGREGATION.

From the religious standpoint, the management has been admirable. The work is essentially evangelistic and undenominational. On Sunday afternoons and evenings there are Gospel services in the recreation room, when many of the men are glad to attend. Pursuing the matter, Mr. Wilké and his friends proceed to the basement, where homely talks are given to the hundreds who assemble. It is a striking and picturesque scene as the Gospel is proclaimed with simplicity and directness to this motley but earnest congregation of weary toilers. Among those who speak from time to time are deaconesses from Mildmay and Doric Lodge, and the vicar of St. Jude's, E.; while once a week the rector of Whitechapel arranges a Gospel temperance meeting; and, fortnightly, Miss Wilké takes the lead at social gatherings. The services of two or three more lady workers would be appreciated. The evangelistic missions that are held also serve powerfully to stimulate interest in spiritual things. One encouraging result of these many-sided undertakings is, that the superintendent can point to a number of regular lodgers whose consistent walk testifies to their sterling Christian character.

Necessarily the needs of the men call for earnest consideration. Many are hawkers, bill distributors, casual labourers of all kinds. Not a few find themselves "too old at forty," and the self-imposed burden of ministering to their sufferings and sorrows is a heavy one. Considering these facts, Mr. Wilké has surely a strong claim for liberal help when he asks for Surgical Aid letters and cast-off clothing for his poorer lodgers. Although various secular undertakings have been launched on somewhat secular lines, the Victoria Homes continue to be self-supporting. All that has been accomplished since the opening of the institutions has been done without charge upon the generosity of Christian people.

WANTED, A HOME FOR WOMEN.

In view of the admirable results of these efforts in the interests of men, it is to be hoped that the way may be speedily made clear for the opening of a lodging-house for women, also on self-supporting lines. The condition of many of the places in which women at present congregate undoubtedly constitutes a gross scandal, and Mr. Wilké, with Mr. Edward Trotter and the rest of the committee, is much exercised as to the best course to pursue for the gathering in of London's great population of practically homeless women.

Parcels of clothing, and Surgical Aid letters for the men, should be addressed to Mr. A. Wilké, Victoria Home for Men, Whitechapel Road, London, E.

From a Nurse's Notebook.

A RECENT number of the occasional paper issued by the London Medical Mission contains some jottings from a notebook of one of the nurses, which emphasize afresh the need for Christian activity on behalf of the poor and afflicted.

"The present inclement weather, with its persistent fogs and chilly dampness, brings with it, as may be imagined, a sad train of sickness and cases of much need. Only to-day our doctor was called in to see a poor widow, whom he found suffering from rheumatic fever. She has two children, one a messenger boy, the other a dear little girl of nine, who acts as a mother's help, practically doing the housework, waiting upon mother, and keeping the home tidy. We are glad to be able to say that the poor woman listens to the Gospel, and, we believe, has tasted of the Water of Life.

"Again, a poor old man, whose wife is a regular attendant at our mothers' meetings, is just taken seriously ill with pleurisy and rheumatism. On visiting him we found the wife also suffering from bronchitis, the home and furniture so poor, the most scanty of bedclothes, and a wretched apology for a fire. We soon got a supply of warm bedclothes and coal from our Invalid Kitchen Fund, leaving the old couple rejoicing in the goodness of God.

"Another typical case is a poor woman in the last stage of consumption, and so deaf that only with the greatest difficulty can we converse with her. We feel sure that a work of grace is going on in her heart. We were able to supply her with a water-bed to-day. When resting upon it her joy was unbounded. 'Oh!' she cried to a neighbour who occasionally looks in to assist her, 'you need not trouble any more about me. I could just rest here for ever.'

"How precious to realize that beneath all this sickness, squalor, misery and sin, these poor people are themselves the objects of God's great love, and that He is unceasingly working through this Mission, and in numberless other ways, to bring them to a saving knowledge of Himself.

"We would here mention how welcome a supply of plain needlework would be. So many of our patients are confined to their rooms for the winter, and would be so grateful for the opportunity of earning a little."

The secretary, Mr. C. Oakey, may be addressed: 33 and 34, Short's Gardens, Endell Street, St. Giles', W.C.

Methodism in the East End.

THE record of a year's work of the London Wesleyan Mission East, which was recently issued, reports once more definite progress all along the line. The membership is returned at 1,166, with 327 on trial, and 471 juniors. From St. George's branch come the cheering tidings that "God has been constantly witnessing to his saving power." Removals to other districts, of which the principal cause is the elevation due to Christianity, results in a heavy drain on the membership, but the number is more than maintained through the gracious working of the Holy Spirit. Backsliders, too, have been restored; some of them with remarkable experiences.

"The spiritual tone is high, and still rising. The possibility and practice of Scriptural holiness are consistently held before our members. The willingness for any kind of service, to play an instrument, to testify in the open-air, to give place to another, to do anything, testifies to us that the love of Christ is permeating their whole life. The attendance at the Lord's Supper has been very good. The work in our junior society classes is most attractive and heartening. The majority of our girls, and many of the boys, are endeavouring day by day to live Christian lives. Their desire to help one another is often evidenced in the class. Many of the girls have this year been transferred to an adult class, and a large number of the young people in our bands, guilds, &c., are those who have passed through our junior society classes."

SOCIAL AND SPIRITUAL UPLIFTING.

The workers at "Paddy's Goose" say: "We are needed at this centre for the scores of dock-workers who regularly use the coffee-bar; for the several trades' unions and other clubs which meet nightly, safely housed from the drink; for the temperance work among the Phœnix lodges; for the brass band, which rallies every Tuesday night; for the working lads' meeting, and many and various purposes for the good of the people of the locality."

From Stepney Temple, which was the centre for a considerable part of the East End during the Simultaneous Mission, the results of that effort are spoken of in the highest terms. "The congregations were large and the signs of God's presence and power abundantly manifest. Numbers were saved, believers were quickened, and many temperance pledges were taken. Our own mission profited greatly, and we have reason to believe other churches were much helped and blessed."

At the Lycett also there has been given to the workers the highest form of encouragement. "In our regular services and meetings men and women have yielded themselves to Christ." From the "Old Mahogany Bar" the same goodly report is received.

WORK GROWING: LARGE DEFICIT.

"Our spiritual work is healthy," says Rev. Peter Thompson (583, Commercial Road, E.), "and increases in efficiency. Our open-air work has been pursued with greater energy and visible success. Our evangelical brass bands have done excellently. Crowds of people have eagerly listened, and scarcely a meeting closes without conversions and pledges. Our Sunday-schools and children's mission continue our most important success, and we are reaping very welcome fruit from the labours of years past. Our boys' brigade, lads' clubs, young men's guilds and gymnasiums, young women's guilds, girls' parlours, factory girls' club, adult and juvenile sewing-meetings, our medical mission and slate club have all done excellently and made good progress. Our holidays' fund has helped to secure for large numbers of children and women a breath of fresh air in the country. A few we have been able to get away for ten days or a fortnight into the country, and some others we have been able to send to Convalescent Homes. But the financial strain has been unusually heavy. We close the financial year with a larger adverse balance than ever before."

Evangelistic.

Gipsy Smith at St. Leonards.

A VERY fruitful mission has just been held in the Royal Concert Hall, St. Leonards-on-Sea, conducted by GIPSY SMITH. Such services have not been known in the memory of the oldest Christian workers in the place. On several occasions towards the close of the mission, hundreds had to be turned away. Over 300 persons passed through the inquirers' rooms. On Friday evening last, a well-attended meeting was held in the Central Wesleyan Church, Hastings, for thanksgiving and testimony. Many came from the surrounding towns and villages to tell of blessing received. All the churches have shared in the good result. C.

Mr. R. S. Bradbrook at Stantonbury.

With my deacons and fellow workers, I desire to express grateful thanks to Almighty God for the mission in my church by Mr. R. S. BRADBROOK. The meetings were held in connection with the National Mission to Young People. Mr. Bradbrook's addresses, coupled with his earnest pleading with the anxious, as well as his sympathetic singing of the Gospel, have been blessed to many precious souls. The Bible readings and meetings for Christians were seasons of power, while the children's meetings have resulted in many hearts and lives being turned into the paths of righteousness. We are greatly encouraged in our work.

H. F. CHIPPERFIELD (Pastor).

Dumshalt, N.B.

At Dumshalt, in the district of Auchtermuchty, a local gentleman some months ago took up evangelistic work in the village hall, where speakers were brought from various parts of the country, and the interest that was felt by the people was manifested in increasing attendances. A fortnight's mission which was recently conducted by Mr. A. Y. MCGREGOR, of Edinburgh, made a deep impression. The gatherings were well attended, and some of the unsaved were led to Christ. The mission concluded with a conference, at which stirring addresses were delivered by Mr. McGregor and by Rev. Wm. Affleck (U.F. Church, Auchtermuchty), Mr. Veitch (Carrubbers Close Mission), Mr. Alex. Dick (Burntisland), and others.

C. D. FAIRLEY.

Kilchrennan, Argyllshire.

A time of blessing has been experienced in the district of Kilchrennan, Argyllshire, in connection with a recent mission begun by Rev. W. Ross, of Glasgow, by arrangement with the U.F. Presbytery of Lorn. The work was followed up, among other workers, by Mr. SAMUEL MCKENZIE in the districts of Dalmally, Appin, and Ledaig, where much interest in Divine things was manifested. When Mr. McKenzie visited Kilchrennan further blessing was experienced. A general breaking down took place at a gathering of Christians, and, says an esteemed correspondent, "souls have flocked into the kingdom. Mr. McKenzie speaks with power, dealing specially with the prevalent sinful pleasures which, in these days, stand so much in the way of young people yielding to Christ."

Cox Green Mills, near Bolton.

On Lord's Day, February 9, Mr. H. COLLINS, of the Evangelization Society, concluded a fifteen-days' mission at Cox Green Mills. The weather was inclement, but the meetings were well maintained. Some came a distance of three miles over the snow to be present. The simple preaching of the Cross prevailed over the power of Satan and sin in many cases. On the Saturday evening, after a tea-meeting in Eagley Schools, there was a testimony and experience meeting for nearly two hours, during which several valuable and interesting testimonies were given by men who had been delivered by God's grace from lives of sin, and also from women who have been called to serve the living and true God instead of leading lives devoted to folly and frivolity. Several young persons have expressed their determination to live for the Lord henceforth. Altogether the mission has been a blessing to the district. JOHN NAUGHTEN.

Mr. Henry Thorne at Shrewsbury.

At the invitation of the Shrewsbury Y.M.C.A. Mr. HENRY THORNE conducted a ten days' general mission in the town, from February 1-10. The meetings were held in the Working Men's Hall. At the daily Bible readings in the afternoons good numbers were present, and many Christians have testified to the searching and quickening power of the Word of God. The evening meetings were well attended, and the Gospel, so faithfully preached by the evangelist, proved a message from God to many. Men and women, both old and young, and little children, were found amongst the inquirers, and the workers had the joy of hearing that not a few had found the Saviour. The men's meeting on the second Sunday afternoon was a memorable occasion, the hall was filled with men, and the message, "Without God," was with power. The number of those met with during the mission that were converted at services held by Mr. Thorne twenty years before was most encouraging.

G. R. ROBERTSON, Hon. Secretary.

Simultaneous Mission in Sydney.

Of the Simultaneous Mission lately held in Sydney, New South Wales, Rev. John Watsford writes in the Southern Cross: "The city and suburbs were divided into districts, where missions should be held, and bands of earnest workers went from house to house inviting all to attend the meetings. As soon as the missions commenced the whole place seemed moved; the people flocked to the churches, halls, and tents; the power of God was with the Word, and for fourteen days—morning, noon, and night—the missioners and workers were engaged in preaching the Gospel and directing sinners to the Lord Jesus.

"The results have been most glorious. At the great thanksgiving meeting at the close of the mission, the secretaries announced that they had not yet received reports from many of the missions, but that those to hand showed that more than 3,000 inquirers had been spoken to, and they had no doubt that the total number would be over 4,000. It is intended to hold a Simultaneous Mission in Melbourne."

Kingsland Chapel, Bristol.

A very helpful mission in connection with the National Mission to Young People was conducted by Rev. W. J. SEARS, Willesden Green, London, N.W., from February 1-10, at Kingsland Chapel, St. Philip's, Bristol. The meeting for "men only," on Sunday, February 2, was the first token of blessing, and the tide continued to rise throughout the week.

There were over 200 inquirers, the majority of whom belonged to the Sunday schools in the district. As a proof of their sincerity, on the last night of the mission, at the request of Mr. Sears, these young disciples walked up to the platform below the pulpit, whether they had been sitting in the galleries or in the body of chapel, thus testifying they were not ashamed of the step they had taken. It was a week of joy and rich harvest; teachers have been rejoicing over scholars for whom they had offered many prayers; some nights three and four in one class accepted Christ as their Saviour. Will "the Lord's remembrancers" bring these young converts to the throne of grace, and ask that they may be kept true and faithful?

B. ACKERMAN, Secretary.

Rev. E. Payson Hammond in New York.

A series of helpful young people's meetings has been held at Bethany Church, Tenth Avenue, New York City, conducted by Rev. E. PAYSON HAMMOND. At one service more than ninety children decided for Christ. In endorsing Mr. Hammond's work, Mr. W. Nesbit, formerly of the San Francisco Occident, says:—"Nearly thirty years ago I remembered to have heard that there was a large delegation of Christian and prominent business men from St. Louis going to visit the State capital to hear Mr. Hammond speak. He had been specially invited to address the Senate and the House of Representatives by a joint meeting of the two bodies. I have often thought since that this was a most remarkable circumstance; and no less remarkable was the fact that, hearing of this invitation, delegates were formed in other parts of the State, and went to the capital to hear the address. Mr. Hammond was known then, as he is now, as the 'Children's Evangelist,' and yet here was clear evidence that this man of the children was able to sway the children because possessed of the qualities that fit him equally well not only to sway men and women, but the strongest men and women."

Euston Theatre, N.W.

Evangelistic meetings have been conducted for some weeks past on Lord's Day evenings in the Euston Theatre, Euston Road, N.W., by Pastor D. H. MOORE, of Vernon Chapel, King's Cross. Writing on February 11, Mr. Moore says:—"God's hand is graciously resting on the work. Last Sunday night we had an audience of 1,600 people, and a goodly number were seeking the Saviour. At our prayer meeting at 'Vernon' on Monday last, it was a great joy to hear from one and another of those who have been recently led to know the Lord. A potman from a public-house accepted Christ, and is now living for Him, having given up his situation. Four young fellows shook me by the hand, and said they had sought the Saviour the week before. Several young women also decided. From the services last year a whole family have been led to Christ, and joined the Church—husband, wife, two sons, and two daughters. The helpers are all voluntary." The weekly expenses in connection with so large and popular a theatre are necessarily heavy, and Mr. Moore will be unable to continue the services unless outside help is forthcoming.

Mr. W. R. Lane at Leicester.

An encouraging mission has just been concluded at Melbourne Hall, Leicester, by Mr. W. R. LANE. Though the Mission has not been a united one, it has had all the force engendered by the sympathy of neighbouring churches and the interest of the Christian people of the town, and from first to last a spirit of deep expectancy has been manifest, joined towards the end by much gratitude and joy. Both as a preacher and as an expositor Mr. Lane commends himself to the people, and his appeals to the conscience are strikingly effective. All through the ten days (February 1-10) he was with us there was not a trace of sensationalism or sentimentalism, though we have had sensation and sentiment following on the rousing and pathetic messages of our brother.

There was a refreshing sense of ease and restraint in his conduct of the after-meetings. At first he had none at all, but when he began to hold "second meetings" he "rushed" nobody, to use his own expression. Without excitement, and with good taste, he instructed the seekers, leading them to a definite avowal of their desire and decision for Christ.

Apart from the Sunday services, the three most crowded meetings were the Bunyan lecture, the meeting for men only, when Melbourne Hall was filled, and the story of Mr. Lane's conversion, with its warning against gambling, and its appeal for confession of Christ at all hazards. We have had many crowds at Melbourne Hall, but scarcely ever a larger one than that which thronged the "farewell" meeting, and which for two hours was moved to alternate smiles and tears. W. Y. F.

The Weaver Brothers in Bristol.

A most blessed mission has been held at Brookland Church, Bristol, by the WEAVER BROTHERS. The numbers increased night after night until the large building was filled to its utmost capacity. There was no noise or excitement, the missioners being very desirous (to use their own words) that "any who wished to decide for Christ should do so thoughtfully and dispassionately," so they were content with a simple and clear statement of the claims of Jesus Christ as being sufficient to bring conviction.

A youth (about sixteen) from one of the public boarding schools came forward at the close of one of the meetings and asked for some printed invitations to distribute. On being asked if he was a Christian, he replied, "Yes." "But you have not been into the inquiry-room?" "No, light came into my soul while Mr. Weaver was preaching, and I need no further explanation." Testimony of a very different kind to this, yet showing the plainness of the message, came under the writer's own observation during the services. Three intelligent and manly fellows about thirty years of age, appearing to be deeply impressed, were asked if they were Christians, and if they understood the message. The first said he understood it perfectly. He had been a Christian, but of late years had followed the bent of his own mind, and now he felt the difficulties in the way of his return too great to be overcome, but he quite realized that the full responsibility of refusa rested with himself. He, however, yielded at the close of the mission. The second, while acknowledging the absolute clearness with which the claims of the Gospel had been presented, said he could not make up his mind. The third said he had decided not to be a Christian. He owned that his position and danger had been made plain by Mr. Weaver, and he had no excuse to offer for the choice he was making, other than that he had determined to go his own way.

The National Mission for Young People and Children, arranged by the Sunday-School Union, was recognized by the provision of three special meetings for this purpose, which resulted in a large number of names being given in by children who specially wished to be trained for the Christian life.

The total number of inquirers amounted to 512, spread over the following ages:—Under 14, 222; 14 to 25, 234; 25 to 60, 56. The help received from many members of neighbouring churches contributed largely to such a glorious result, and a grateful acknowledgment is hereby made of their kindness. At certain periods of the mission, the numbers of inquirers were so great that it would have been impossible to have dealt with them properly but for the assistance of these friends, and it is hoped that the blessing given will be returned manyfold by the labours, in their respective churches, of those who have found salvation at Brookland.

W. J. RANDALL, Mission Secretary.

Rev. John McNeill at Kilmarnock.

Kilmarnock, the largest town in Ayrshire, has had a visit from Rev. John McNeill, and great interest has attended the services carried on by him. The mission was opened on Sabbath, February 2, and on the forenoon of that day he preached in the Laigh Kirk to a much larger audience than usually attends. Since then for two weeks he has been holding forth nightly in the Agricultural Hall, and in the afternoon of each weekday he has addressed meetings in King Street U.F. Church. A writer in one of the local papers says that Mr. McNeill's popularity is a puzzle to him; while another, evidently gifted with more insight and clearer perception, writes: "The visit of such a man should leave a permanent trace on the inner life of the community."

Twenty-seven years ago we heard the late D. L. Moody preach in the Laigh Kirk one Sabbath night, and the scene of that summer evening in the street, with the crowds struggling to get in, we can never forget. Results remained from that brief visit of Mr. Moody, and beyond all question results will be permanent and fruit remain from Mr. McNeill's mission. The ministers of the town have given him their hearty support throughout, and such unity of action lends power to any movement having for its aim the salvation of men.

In the Kilmarnock Standard an interesting paragraph appeared worthy of reproduction. It ran as follows:—"Passing the Corn Exchange buildings one evening this week I noted two separate crowds, whose widely different aims were somewhat suggestive. Streaming into the hall that now does duty so frequently as a theatre were to be seen great numbers of the patrons of the stage bent on witnessing a sensational melodrama, entitled 'The Span of Life,' that was being enacted there. A little further along, another stream of tendency was obeyed by numerous townspeople who entered the gateway of the Agricultural Hall, and descended into that roomy place of public meeting to listen to the stirring exhortations of the evangelist, Rev. John McNeill. These two different multitudes, though mingling with each other to some extent at the corner of Duke Street, and entering the same block of buildings, took divergent ways. A serious but prejudiced spectator might rashly set down the one crowd as sheep, and the other as goats, and appoint each lot its proper destination. But I do not mention these circumstances to dogmatize on so invidious a distinction. I only remark that this is a mixed and kaleidoscope world." J. C.

The mission conducted by Mr. James Dixon at Ormeau Road Methodist Church, Belfast, has been accompanied by much blessing both to Christians and the unsaved. The attendances were large.

Mr. William Forbes held a meeting for theatrical women in the lecture hall of the Y.M.C.A., Sackville Street, Dublin, on February 13. Addresses were given by Mr. J. J. Sims and Mr. Forbes, and solos were given by Mrs. Sims.

At the Baptist Church, Cinderford, a fortnight's mission was concluded on Sunday, January 26. The services have been very fruitful. The members have been quickened in spiritual life, and many of the unconverted have sought the Saviour. Rev. A. T. Jones, Maindee, has been the missioner.

Labouring in connection with the Drighlington and Adwalton Free Church Council, Mr. J. H. Fearnsides, of Batley, has held a twelve days' mission. The united village churches have been gathered together, to hear the Gospel. Many young people were spiritually helped, and Christians were stimulated by the stirring addresses of the missioner.

Mr. James Eyres has just concluded an eight-days' Gospel Mission at Hollinwood, Oldham. During the whole time snow, frost, and fogs alternated, but, in spite of the adverse weather, large congregations were gathered, and the results were most satisfactory. A brass band missioned outside, and a string band inside, with a large choir and soloists, rendered effective service.

A season of blessing is being experienced by the inhabitants of Varty, Cwmavon, and neighbourhood. In a series of mission services which are being held by Mrs. J. B. Horton nightly, crowds come over the mountains to hear the simple story of Christ's power to save. The morning meetings and Bible readings are specially enjoyed by the Christians, while nightly some make choice of Christ and his service.

Rev. Andrew Allan (formerly of Hull) has just concluded a fifteen days' mission in connection with the two United Free Churches in Leven, Fife. The attendance at the meetings increased, and the interest deepened as the mission went on, and there were many tokens and testimonies of real spiritual blessing. In addition to evangelistic meetings in the evening, Mr. Allan gave afternoon Bible readings on "The Overcoming Life," which were greatly enjoyed and found helpful by many. Hugh Elder.

At New England, Peterboro', where there is a large colony of railway men, Mr. John Hawkins has conducted a twelve-days' mission, which concluded on February 14. The addresses were very earnest, and the meetings grew in numbers at almost every service, and the Railway Mission Hall, which is situated in the midst of the railway company's houses, was filled. Mr. W. Hill, president of the Mission, writes:—"Thanks be unto God which giveth us the victory. About fifty have professed conversion."

On Lord's Day last, Mr. J. J. Sims entered on the fourth week of his mission in Merrion Hall, Dublin. During the past three weeks the interest has been well maintained. On Lord's Days the hall has been filled, and there have been large audiences on week nights. Ministers and Christians of all denominations have been present, and testimonies of blessing received are coming in continually. Mr. Sims is a teacher as well as an evangelist, and Bible students and Christian workers have found material help in the addresses.

Rev. Jesse Mayo has just concluded a ten-days' Gospel Mission in the Gloucester Hall, Taunton, with good results. His bright and logical addresses have reached the hearts of many young people. All through the ten days there were special counter-attractions for the young; but the Gospel prevailed, and many we believe were brought into the Kingdom of Christ. The limelight lecture on Australia and South Africa given by Mr. Mayo on the last evening gave abundant satisfaction to a crowded audience.

Edwin Howard, Pastor.

Rev. James Davidson writes from Blackadder Manse, North Berwick:—"We have just closed an exceeding fruitful mission which continued throughout January and the early part of February. It was conducted by Mr. Andrew Stewart, and stirred North Berwick. The largest hall in the place was engaged for Lord's Day evening, and for the last week altogether; and in spite of severe weather, was filled every night. Christian people have been greatly refreshed, and very many of the unconverted have been won for Christ. We feel that this is answer to much prayer."

During the past fortnight a series of evangelistic meetings has been held in the West United Free Church, Pollokshaws. The meetings have been more largely attended than any other such services for many years, while a considerable number of persons have been dealt with in the inquiry room, Mr. J. R. D. McAusland sang several solos each evening, the pathos of the rendering touching the hearts of the audience. A short address was given each night, Rev. W. McAlpine, the minister of the church, having the hearty support of a large number of ministerial friends. M. G. Mathewson.

Mr. James Neech, of the North Midland Evangelistic Mission, concluded a fifteen days' mission in the Wesleyan Church, at Althorpe, Epworth Circuit, last week. A special feature has been the lantern services held on the Saturday nights. Bible-readings were given twice a week. The last Sunday evening service will long be remembered by those who were privileged to be present. At the close of the service many stood up to acknowledge their acceptance of the Saviour. On the following night a testimony meeting was held, at which those who had been gathered in spoke of the saving power of the Lord Jesus Christ. H. L.

A united temperance mission was commenced at Kingston-on-Thames on February 2. In the evening at Bunyan Baptist Tabernacle a large congregation assembled, and Mr. Whitehead, of Manchester, gave a spiritual address. Meetings were held at the various churches, the concluding one taking place at the Drill Hall. A torchlight procession paraded the streets. The hand-bell ringers from Stockwell Orphanage rendered valuable service. Addresses delivered by Mr. Walker have been marked by earnestness and power. The singing of the united choir proved most helpful. Over 600 pledges were taken. The town was systematically canvassed, and the mission has proved one of the most encouraging seasons we have known at Kingston. R. H. S.

Mr. James Wharton, after opening the new hall for railway men at St. Leonards (where God gave tokens of blessing), came on to Bexhill for a mission. From the very commencement souls yielded to Christ. In the neighbourhood of Hamilton Hall people have been led to think of eternal things as never before. The results have been that every night the power of the Spirit has been manifest, and in some cases whole families have been led to surrender to the Lord. The sincerity of the converts, old and young, is seen in the fact that they bring others to the services, and they in turn are led to yield to the Master's claims. A sisters' weekly meeting has been formed, and also a class for those who have decided in the Sunday school. S. F. D.

Rev. F. C. Spurr's Mission at Back Street Church, Trowbridge (January 18 to February 3) has been characterized by an unction from the Holy One. The Bible has been caused to glow anew with holy fire, and God has reiterated the call and consecration of his people from its sacred depths. The Gospel in all its native eloquence has been presented day by day, bringing Christ in life-giving power among the people. Fruit of the mission has appeared and is still appearing, and there are indications that much more will yet appear. Very gratefully will the Lord's people look back upon the happy, hallowed fellowship they have been privileged to enjoy with Mr. Spurr these seventeen days.

A united gospel mission, under the auspices of the Wilts and Somerset Baptist Association, has been held in the Baptist churches at Westbury, Leigh, and Penknap, Westbury. The missioner was Rev. James Sprunt, of London, whose faithful, earnest preaching and singing of the Gospel has been used of God in much blessing. The various meetings, including children's lantern services, Bible talks, and a Gospel address each evening, have been well attended throughout, and there is an evident revival of spiritual life and energy in each of the churches. Believers have borne testimony to definite help and blessing received, backsliders have been restored, and some have decided for Christ. It is believed that much fruit will yet be gathered from Mr. Sprunt's visit into the district. W. P.

Miss Marie Futty, a young English lady who is working as an evangelist in Ireland with the Irish Christian Workers' Union, has conducted a five-weeks' mission at the Orange Hall, Donacluny. It was a time of great blessing. The meetings were well attended from the first, the people coming, in some instances, for miles, in spite of the bitter weather, many having to stand throughout on account of the crowds. The Gospel message was eagerly listened to. During the last week Mrs. Futty, a well-known temperance speaker, joined her daughter, and it was encouraging thus to see mother and daughter stand together to preach the Gospel. Deep impressions were produced upon the undecided, and an influence for good has resulted from this and other missions in the neighbourhood conducted by Miss Futty. The Irish people are deeply grateful to God for sending this humble servant to minister so lovingly to their needs. J. H.

Notes & Comments

Our Readers and the War. The extent to which the South African struggle divides Christian people at home and abroad is impressed upon us every time we have occasion to refer, however briefly, to the painful subject. Our insertion last week of Pastor Monod's letter, on "Continental Opinion," with a note of our own subjoined, has brought us shoals of letters expressive of the most divergent views. We have uniformly declined to discuss the general merits of the war; and considering that the daily papers freely ventilate all views, there is no need that our space should be so devoted. May God speedily give peace, and grant release from misunderstanding and reproof among his people!

The Liberty of the Subject. There are many signs that for some time back we have been drifting towards conscription, with the accompanying and consequent evils which are so evident in connection with compulsory military service in some of the Continental countries. The war spirit is apt so to develop as to choke nobler ideals, and sufficient public attention, therefore, has not been given to the threatened danger of an oppressive and overpowering militarism. In these circumstances it is highly interesting to find no less an authority than Colonel Sir Howard Vincent, M.P., now returned from South Africa, speaking forcibly against the idea. He said:—

> We hear a great deal about conscription and compulsory military service, but I do not see the necessity of such measures . . . . there can be no necessity for compulsory service in this country. Whatever ministry might propose such a measure, I, as a member of Parliament, would oppose it with my last breath.

The Early Closing Bill. We venture to believe that the majority of people in the country will resent, with something like indignation, the unreasonable and high-handed action of the House of Lords in rejecting the Early Closing Bill, considering that, out of 300 tradesmen's associations in all parts of the country, only two opposed the Bill. The reason alleged for its rejection is singularly ridiculous. If those who have so easily strangled the proposed measure could only suffer for a few weeks the white slavery which so many shopkeepers and shop-assistants are compelled to undergo, we should hear less about early closing being "an infringement of personal liberty" and "an act of intolerable injustice." Lord Avebury's or some similar Bill will yet have to pass, for the question involved in it is one of pure humanity. In Australia personal liberty is not infringed because the shops close early; on the contrary, there is a greater liberty all round, both for employers and employed. Surely it is time that Parliament helped to make the lives of busy toilers a little less wearisome and mechanical, and more free and human.

Sunday Closing. The movement for Sunday closing of public-houses in England is assuming a business-like aspect. One of the chief obstacles has been the comparative indifference of members of the Anglican Church to the reform. This should now be greatly modified by the warm advocacy of several of the leading bishops, as well as of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The working-classes are erroneously supposed to be hostile to the movement. About a million householders have already been canvassed, the result showing a majority of seven to one in favour of Sunday Closing. Even more striking is the result of a canvass of fifty-six workshops, containing over 11,000 men. Of these 10,000 declared themselves in favour of Sunday Closing, with 1,190 against, and 514 neutral. A majority even of publicans have declared against the present custom. There will be a determined effort this session to do away with the objectionable aspect of the bonâ fide travellers' clause.

The King and the People. Since the King ascended the throne he has in very many ways shown his practical interest in the welfare of the people. His frequent appearances amongst them are very welcome, and in many obvious ways will accomplish good. We are glad to notice that His Majesty, through his secretary, expressed his disapproval of the objectionable fashion now in vogue of trimming ladies' hats with seagulls' wings. Royal disapproval of this barbarity will be the most effectual check that can be put upon it, since Society obeys all the noddings of the Court. On the other hand, we hear on all sides expressions of concern and sorrow that His Majesty's personal patronage has of late been so largely devoted to the less elevating phases of our national life. The music-hall, the theatre, the Sunday concert, the brewery—these certainly are not the elements that make most effectively for the well-being of the nation. If we are to be content with the plea that the exigencies of such an exalted office require the bestowment of an "all-round" patronage, we hope we shall not be disappointed in the expectation that the higher industries and philanthropies of the land will in their turn have equal attention.

Parents and Gambling. The evidence brought before the Select Committee of the House of Lords on gambling, by the Headmaster of Harrow School, contains an indictment which parents of children would do well to take note. Dr. Wood, while able to testify that there is less betting in schools than formerly, said that when boys bet they have generally acquired the habit from their parents. This puts the case into a different category from what it would be were it the result of thoughtlessness or a mere desire for fun. It shows that one of the roots of England's chief vice is in her homes. Parental influence for good is of incalculable value; it should not be forgotten that it is just as far-reaching when directed towards evil. The amusement of the parents may become the ruin of the children.

The Old Bailey Pulpit. The majority of the men who are addicted to the vices which are sapping the country's best life, do not, unfortunately, read Christian journals, nor listen to the teachings of Christian pulpits; hence they deprive themselves of the moral force which would correct or prevent their aberrations. But when the tribune of the Old Bailey becomes a pulpit which, in the most practical manner, preaches the necessity of morality, men are compelled to listen. We earnestly hope that the moral of the Liverpool Bank frauds will be seriously taken to heart, that men may understand that betting and gambling are deadly things to play with. The revelations of the Goudie trial have demonstrated beyond doubt how deep is the scoundrelism to which professional gamesters can descend. The Betting Commission has now, surely, sufficient material to work upon.

A Warning to Employers. The trial of Goudie and his accomplices, resulting in their exemplary punishment, will no doubt prove a salutary lesson to foolish young men on one side and designing knaves on the other. But there is another lesson that has been severely pressed home during the evidence in this remarkable case. Lax precautions against fraud on the part of employers create a situation full of temptation to those under them. Those employés whose principles are settled find all precautionary measures irksome, if not insulting in their suggestion; but to the weak-minded they are a great defence by making fraud impossible, or at least supremely difficult. In such cases the strong must suffer for, and bear with, the weak, lest a stumbling-block be put in their way. Constituted as human nature often is, men must be safeguarded against themselves. This is the moral of Mr. Justice Bigham's strictures on the imperfect checks which made Goudie's frauds practicable.

Geography and Morality. The foolish yet most convenient theory that morality is largely an affair of geographical situation, is once more to the front. It is, of course, most acceptable to a certain class of people, who find in the lax morals of other peoples a demonstration of their own ideas upon the subject. There can be nothing meaner than for a man to enjoy all the special privileges attaching to a Christian civilization, while he holds loosely the fundamental ideas of morality which have rendered such a civilization possible. Pure morality is not an affair of geography at all; it is a question of a conscience enlightened by Christian principles. In those latitudes where morals are lax, it will be found that there is either an absence of Christian teaching, or the Christianity taught is encrusted with superstition. But where the pure light of New Testament Christianity has shined, there the standard of morals is highest.

Education in the "Humanities." An article on the modern public school, which appears in a current monthly, contains some very wholesome, if unpalatable advice, which all would be better for taking to heart. The writer explains Continental dislike towards Englishmen as largely due to our insular education, which tends to produce within us the feeling of superiority over others. This is not the whole truth by a long way, but there is undoubtedly very much truth in it. We all know too many men who speak with cheap contempt of "foreigners." We cordially agree with Mr. De Brath that an education in the "humanities," as well as in classics, would develop in English boys their powers of sympathetic comprehension. Our Continental neighbours are wise enough to permit free exchange between the various nations; our insularity is a bar to this. But, with a larger outlook upon life, there would be less room for arrogance, and a consequent better understanding between ourselves and others.

Is Japan Becoming Christian?

The newly-formed alliance with Japan has turned all eyes towards that far-off land of the Orient. It is clear that one of the first duties laid on us in viewing it, is a redoubled interest in its Christianization. So far, the Americans have taken the chief part in missionary work in that country. On the whole, their efforts, and those of other bodies, have been followed by success. Since the removal of the Interdict in 1872, when there was a sudden and astonishing development of Christian effort, the work has been steadily progressing. In 1883 there were 5,000 Japanese converts connected with Protestant missions. In spite of a temporary set back, the last report on missions in Japan shows a splendid advance. There are now 41,808 Protestant Christians there, of the Greek Church 25,231, and of Roman Catholics 53,924, representing a population of a quarter of a million under some form of Christian instruction.

The Jerusalem of To-Day.

M. Hyacinthe Loyson, in a lecture at Geneva, has given a graphic account of the present condition of Jerusalem. The city is still mainly Jewish in its character and population, Moslems and Christians being in a minority. As a curious contrast to what obtains elsewhere in the Sultan's dominions, M. Loyson points out that non-official religions enjoy more freedom, so far as outward expression is concerned, in Jerusalem than in Paris. As regard the Jews, however, this only means that they are in a state of low mental condition, being over-ridden by Rabbis who believe that ignorance is the best safeguard "against infidelity and Christianity," and who feed their flocks on the husks of the old Rabbinical Talmud. It is a sad picture of the once "Holy City," from which, as its centre, the all-conquering faith of the Cross spread to all the world. The prophecy of our Lord, "Your house is left unto you desolate," has been fulfilled to the letter. Only in the final triumph of that faith in its midst, will Jerusalem reverse its sad history, and come to its own once more.

Entertaining the Stranger.

Special arrangements have been made in Manchester and Dublin, and possibly in other places, for friendless girls and women who arrive at the railway stations in ignorance of proper places of abode, to be directed to safe and suitable temporary homes. In Manchester many such voyagers are guided to the Female Strangers' Lodging House by the railway officials, whose services in thus protecting girls and women from the temptations and dangers of a large city have earned the public thanks of the committee. Such institutions can be made almost, if not entirely, self-supporting, and as they temporarily shelter a class in which there is much helplessness, it is desirable that they should be multiplied elsewhere. But some distinctive badge or uniform is desirable in meeting girls, to protect them from the attentions of unauthorized or designing persons.

The Late Anna Shipton's Works.

The recent departure of this well-known Christian author aroused considerable interest in the many works that came from her pen; and Messrs. Morgan and Scott have made up several assorted parcels of her books at half price. This arrangement will, it is hoped, enable friends to circulate the works of the late gifted author among such as would be benefited by them. Particulars may be had on application.

The Debt of the Suburbs.

A contemporary raises again the burning question of depleted churches in the centres of large cities, and the claim that they have upon Christians in the suburbs. The abandonment of the centres for the suburbs as places of residence is proceeding at a rapid rate, and the tendency is still towards going further out. But the point is, can a man who makes all his money in the centre, and who lives in the suburbs, cleanse his hands from all responsibility towards the city churches that are left to battle with the poverty of slumdom? Suburban life is undoubtedly very pleasant, but it must not blind its Christian residents to their responsibility for the vacated centres where the poor live.

Pity the Preacher!

What with the well-meant advice of friends and the brusque criticism of foes, the pulpit is having a lively time of it just now. The result certainly should be healthy. One litterateur complains that the generality of sermons are too bright and effervescent; another's complaint is that they are dull and commonplace. We hardly think that the columns of a daily paper do justice to such a subject, since all sorts of persons, religious and irreligious, feel free to ventilate their opinions, which too frequently represent themselves only. We agree that a sermon should be neither frothy nor dull; the seriousness of its mission ought to prevent the first, and real heart-love for human souls will certainly prevent the second. One thing is often lost of—that there is much froth and dulness in the pew as well as in the pulpit, and a poor pew can do much towards spoiling a strong pulpit. On the other hand, we express once more our conviction that if preachers would only apply the Bible to human life, there would be far greater interest awakened in the hearing of sermons. Mr. Meyer's and Dr. Whyte's Bible character-studies are proof enough of this.

The Churches and Men.

"How to get the men to church" is still the problem. We are glad to see that our contemporary, the Baptist Times, is setting itself the serious task of inviting practical conference upon the matter, and ministers who are having some measure of success in dealing with men are offering their contributions. It is agreed that the P.S.A. movement, where properly worked, succeeds in doing real good amongst non-church-goers—and by "properly worked" we mean where the great end set before the promoters is the conversion of the hearers. When every sort of subject, save personal religion, is discussed, no mere addition of numbers is proof of real success. It is significant, too, that most of the contributors to the conference regard the pew-rent system as accountable for the distaste of a large majority for the house of God. Is it not time, then, that the churches should be thrown open to all comers?

Deadly Respectability.

Of many churches, it may be said that they retard their own progress by their "deadly respectability." To be "proper" is undoubtedly the ne plus ultra of many ministers and people; and if the world were all that it should be, propriety would not be so grievous an error. But in view of the vast number of non-church-goers, who regard "proper" religion with disdain, it is a serious question for any church to face whether it is determined to guard its conventions at the sacrifice of its mission, or to sacrifice them for the better accomplishment of its mission.

Proselytizing.

A prominent Sacerdotalist has been describing the work of Protestants in Ireland, so far as it affects the poor peasants and others, as "Satan's work," the representation being that, in return for food, clothing, and education, the poor people are called upon to "deny their faith." The caricature of Evangelical effort in this description is too absurd to need any reply. Indeed, a friendly commentator of the preachers unconsciously supplies a justification for the work which is so hardly stigmatized when he says, "A favourite field for them (Evangelicals) is among the drunken poor, who when bereft of their reason are tempted to part with their offspring for money with which to purchase more drink." The writer apparently fails to see that he indicts his own priesthood for carelessness, whilst in the unreasonableness and drunkenness of the parents he offers an excellent reason why earnest Christians should intervene. Blessed work of this kind is not proselytizing, but Christlike Evangelism.

*Britain's Chief Curse.

By Rev. RICHARD GLOVER, M.A., Rector of Wotton, Surrey.

Not an insufficient wage,
Not the want of work,
Not the market overstocked —
Thus the truth we shirk!
This is plain to all with eyes,
None the fact can blink,
Chief of all the workman's woes
Is the love of drink!

Whence the blight that, like a curse,
Blasts the humble home?
What compels to leave its joys,
Far with sots to roam,
Causing careworn wife to weep,
Child from sire to shrink,
Making "father" name to dread?
'Tis the love of drink!

Here's the leak that drains away
Name and health and wealth!
Here's the worm that all the life
Saps by secret stealth!
Here's the lead that weights the soul
Down in vice to sink.
Ruin writes his other name
Thus—The Love of Drink!

'Tis by drink the gaol is filled;
This the madhouse crowds;
Nought like this the workhouse feeds;
This weaves half the shrouds!
This the pavement stocks with vice.
England, sad to think,
Most and direst of thy woes,
Come from love of drink!

What can take this love away?
Give no answer vague!
Can mere pledge, or ribbon blue,
Cure this mortal plague?
Use as helps; trust not as cures!
Linen stained with ink
Soap cleanseth not; nor pledge alone
Purge the love of drink!

Love alone can cast out love;
Right love, wrong love cure!
Only can a purer love
From a baser, lure!
Change the heart, you change the man;
Snaps each fetter-link;
Flies asunder Satan's chain!
Flies the love of drink!

The True Melchizedek.—I.

"Such a High Priest became us" (Heb. vii. 26).
"We have such a High Priest" (viii. 1).

THE Bible contains a series of Divine photographs, a succession of pen and ink sketches, by the infallible Artist, the Holy Ghost. Some are full-length portraits, others are vignettes; some are elaborately finished, others only slightly drawn.

Two such personages are brought before us in early Scripture history, who are in close and vital contact with each other. One of these, Abram, is minutely described through many many chapters; the other, Melchizedek, is only mentioned in Genesis in three verses (xiv. 18-20) with a mysterious brevity. In one verse in Psa. cx., Jehovah declares with an oath that David's Lord is a Priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek. The New Testament, in a few pregnant sentences, takes up the wondrous tale, and shows that more was conveyed by what was omitted in Genesis than by what was written; and that as Jesus is the one and only Seed, the Redeemer, the Lamb, the Mediator, the Surety, the Son, the King, of whom all other were but types, so He is the one and only Priest, of whom Melchizedek and Aaron were but shadows.

Melchizedek was the priest of God Most High. He was flashed for a moment on the screen of history as the typical ideal of God's eternal Priest. He represented an order of priesthood which is untransferable and perpetual. There never have been, and there never can be, more than two priests of that order, the one the type, the other the Antitype.

Melchizedek, the type, brought forth bread and wine, and blessed Abram in the name of God Most High, Possessor of heaven and earth, and Abram gave him a tenth of all.

God saw Abraham in Abram, as the artist sees the angel in the block of marble. He chipped away the weak and brittle shell of character manifested when Abram fled into Egypt from the famine in the land which God had promised him. He laid bare the strong and noble jealousy for God which gave Lot the choice of territory, that there might be no strife between their herdmen, in presence of the Canaanite and the Perizzite who were then in the land.

The Divine Sculptor patiently removed the rotten stone of self-confidence which took Hagar and begat Ishmael, for he saw beneath it not only the faith which received Isaac when Abraham and Sarah were past age, but also the obedience which, when Isaac had come to young and vigorous manhood, laid him upon the altar before it was possible that "in Isaac shall thy seed be called."

But long before that supreme probation, how when Melchizedek had blessed him that had received the promises, in the name of the Most High God, the high quality of Abram's confidence in God was manifested. The blessing took immediate hold of him, and, using the very words of Melchizedek, he said to the King of Sodom: "I have lift up my hand unto Jehovah, God Most High, possessor of heaven and earth, that I will not take a thread or a shoe latchet."

No further mention of Melchizedek is made until David (whose tongue was the pen of the ready writer, the Holy Ghost) spoke, in Psalm cx., things that he had made touching the King, and touching the Melchizedek Priest.

In the New Testament Melchizedek is mentioned only in the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the writer shows that the Son, in whom God has spoken in these last days, is greater than the prophets, greater than the angels, greater than Moses (the faithful steward of God's house), greater than Aaron, whose priesthood was as powerless to bless as was Moses' fiery law, of which it formed a vital part.

All who came out of Egypt by Moses fell in the wilderness, except Joshua and Caleb, who were the exception that proved the rule. Yet Joshua did not give them rest, though he led the new generation into the promised land. For rest comes not by outward circumstances, but by believing God, and by ceasing from our own works.

Lord, I believe a rest remains
To all thy people known;
A rest where pure enjoyment reigns,
And Thou art loved alone.

It is a fearful thing to come short of the rest which God has promised. But it requires all our diligence to enter into the Sabbath rest which remains, from the Legal past to the Gospel present. For the Word of God searches and probes us like a two-edged sword, and all things are naked and laid open before the eyes of Him with whom we have to do.

The wearied soul is driven from every false rest. The piercing eyes of God detect subtle and selfish motive beneath apparently holy actions, and the soul says, "Alas, alas, I must give it up! Holiness may be possible to some whose nature is less carnal, and whose circumstances are less unfavourable than mine, but not for me."

"No," replies the inspired Word, "do not give it up." Mention has been already made of Jesus as a merciful and faithful High Priest, who has taken our human nature that He may make expiation for our sins (ii. 10-18). Now He is brought before us as the High Priest exercising his intercessory work in heaven, and enabling us to hold fast our confession. "Having, then, a great High Priest, who is passed through the heavens, Jesus, the Son of God, let us hold fast our confession"—not profession of what we are, but confession of our Saviour and of his great salvation. As the Psalmist said, "I will make mention of thy righteousness, even of thine only."

The Epistle now goes on to describe the character of the true priesthood, which is after the order of Melchizedek, assuring us of the brotherly sympathy of Him

Who in the days of feeble flesh
Poured out his cries and tears;
And in his body feels afresh
What every member bears.

Friendship in Christ: A Bible Study.

PETER and John, companion fisherlads in youth, partners in the boats (Luke v. 10); became, together, "fishers of men" by their Lord's own appointment (Mark i. 17; Acts ii. 41); Peter, the disciple who expressed his love to Christ; and John, who repeatedly spoke of himself as "the disciple whom Jesus loved" (John xxi. 7; xx. 2). The former, warm-hearted and impulsive, self-confident, but liable to fail on an emergency. The latter, devotedly tender (John xiii. 23, and xix. 26, 27), but ambitious (Mark x. 37), and although generally calm and self-contained, could prove himself a "son of thunder" (Mark iii. 17) when any offence was offered to his Master (Mark ix. 38; Luke ix. 54).

Quick of perception and sympathy, "the other disciple did outrun Peter" (John xx. 4), yet Peter "went into the sepulchre" first (John xx. 6); and when John first caught the tones of the Master's voice (John xxi. 7), it was Peter who plunged into the water to come to Him (John xxi. 7). The ruling passion in both was love to their Master, and zeal in his service. Their union was strength for themselves and the Church. In Acts ii. 14 and iii. 11, it was Peter's voice that alone was heard, but John stood close beside him, and "shoulder to shoulder" they faced the Sanhedrim (iv. 7) and the rulers took knowledge of them, that they had been with Jesus" (iv. 13).

These same two friends with John's brother had formed the favoured group which witnessed the transfiguration of the Lord Jesus Christ (Matt. xvii. 1), and again, together they had been sent to prepare the last passover (Luke xxii. 8). Both followed Jesus into the Hall of the High Priest (John xviii. 15); "both ran together to the sepulchre" of their beloved Master (xx. 3). Both "went up together to the Temple at the hour of prayer," and both were sent later on by the other Apostles as a deputation to Samaria (Acts viii. 14). Blessed friendship in the bonds of the love of God in Christ Jesus!

Voices in the Sick Room.

THE active side of life is more attractive to the majority of mankind than the passive. Thoughtful minds, however, will agree that both conditions are necessary for the upbuilding of character; the active, to quicken zeal, to stimulate effort and to keep the heart fresh and ever watchful; the passive, to recuperate lost strength, to replenish wasted powers, to strengthen weak faith, and to bring forth traits of character which else would remain unrevealed.

It requires grace readily to obey the Master' behest, "Go, work to-day in my vineyard," especially when the Guiding Finger points to some difficult undertaking. It requires even more grace patiently to acquiesce in the Master's will, when it bids us "Come apart . . . and rest awhile."

It is interesting to note that when Chris calls us away from the world's crowded thoroughfare to the quiet seclusion of a sick room, the message is not "Go ye apar t"—such would be a withdrawal into a wilderness indeed—but "Come ye apart;" though thou art shut out from the world, thou art shut in with Me, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee."

So, whether on the hill-tops high and fair
I dwell, or in the sunless valleys where
The shadows lie, what matter?
He is there.

(1) The Voice of Pain is heard in the sick room. Exemption from pain is no sign of virtue, for earth's greatest sufferers are often amongst God's choicest saints.

Pain, mental or physical, is not an unmitigated evil, neither is it permitted to come upon us to embitter life; it is frequently God's angel sent to woo souls back to the Father's home. Pain is an effective teacher; many have learned lessons in the school of suffering which have greatly enriched their life. A great sufferer once said, "God has put me on my back that I may learn to look up." Christ Himself "was made perfect through suffering," and his followers must enter with Him into the dark shades of Gethsemane, ere the higher heights of Christian experience can be reached.

All those who journey, soon or late
Must pass within the garden's gate;
Must kneel alone in darkness there
And battle with some fierce despair.

Human pain and sorrow command tender sympathy, but Christ "trod the winepress alone; and of the people there was none with" Him.

Men, faithless, slept when Jesus wept
In agony.
And let his cry unheard go by
In His Gethsemane.

In our season of distress the Divine Presence is manifested, and when pain lays its heavy hand upon us, and we sink, we only fall into a loving Father's embrace, for "underneath are the everlasting arms."

When men weep, Christ does not sleep;
He stoops to see
Each falling tear, each sigh to hear
In their Gethsemane.

(2) The voice of pain is softened by the sweet Voice of Peace. Pain—Peace. From a human standpoint the two conditions are as wide apart as the poles, but God intends them to blend harmoniously together.

Unmarred happiness and unalloyed joy would pall sooner or later unceasing pain would kill. God mingles the bitter with the sweet, and the sweet with the bitter, that we may look up to Him in loving trust in every condition of life, for his Presence doubles every joy, and sweetens even the bitter cup of woe.

Dr. Payson, when racked with pain, said, "I have great pain, but I have great peace."

As the Master stilled the turbulent waters of the Lake of Galilee with his "Peace, be still!" so his sweetly whispered "Peace" soothes pain, and lulls weary souls to rest on the bosom of Infinite Love.

(3) The Voice of Patience is another voice frequently heard in the sick room. Patience is the outcome of a quiet confidence in God. The knowledge that He orders all things for the ultimate good of his people, is sufficient to command man's unwavering and unbounded trust. Impatience and irritability of spirit will draw closely the blinds of the soul, so that no ray of Heaven's light can penetrate to refresh and enlighten, and no thought of the "afterward" which affliction shall yield can find a place amidst the murmurings of an antagonistic will. Pain is assuaged, and the restless heart is stilled, by this grace of Patience.

(4) The Voice of Resignation is but the echo of the voice of Patience. "Not as I will, but as Thou wilt." Herein lies the secret of peace in suffering. We may not fight against God, nor presume to dictate to Him. God has his plan for every life, and, howsoe'er we fret and murmur, his will concerning us remains unaltered. "He doeth all things well"; blessed are they who bow in meek submission to the Divine will.

> God pity those who cannot say
> "Not mine, but thine"; who only pray
> "Let this cup pass," and cannot see
> The purpose in Gethsemane.

(5) The Voice of Prayer is also heard. Amid the rush and turmoil of the world's busy life, too often prayer is neglected. No time to pray; such is the ready excuse of the indifferent multitude, and even the sincere follower of Christ is apt to become so engrossed in the pursuit of business and the demands of social life, that prayer is deemed a burden instead of a delight, a duty to be performed rather than a privilege to be treasured and enjoyed.

Christ calls for a halt in the journey of life, "Be still." The solitude of the sick room affords ample time and opportunity for quiet communion with God.

> "Laid aside by illness!" thus they say on earth
> "Set apart for stillness!" thus they sing in heaven.

The lessons thus learned by the wayside must be consistently lived out when we resume our place on life's highway. The voices heard in the silence should be whispered to other hearts; so shall they be braver because we have suffered, and more Christlike because we have been "apart" with the Master.

The fierceness of the battle will not be abated, daily cares and burdens will crowd about our path as aforetime; the shadow of pain and sorrow will rest upon us as God wills; but deep down in the soul will be the sweet consciousness of a Living Presence, which shall grant us victory in the day of battle, which shall lighten every care, share the wearisome burden, and render even pain sweet. With the smile of God resting upon us, filled with his peace, and strengthened by communion and converse with our Master, we shall pursue our way, gratefully saying, "It is good for me that I have been afflicted."

Is Church Attendance Declining?—IV.

By Rev. J. GUINNESS ROGERS, D.D.

THERE seems to me to be nothing in the general aspect of our church life at present to warrant the pessimistic utterances in which some have indulged on the question which these papers have discussed. We have to deal everywhere with a spirit of unrest which is really nothing more than a desire for advance, but which in its intensity is apt to become somewhat feverish.

So eager is this longing for progress, coupled with a somewhat unreasoning persuasion that the beginning of a new century must be marked by some new developments, that there is an impatience with existing institutions, and a sensitiveness to their defects, which the facts, at all events when contemplated in their broader aspect, do not justify.

I have not, I hope, ignored unwelcome realities. There is much in connection with Sunday observance and church attendance which we have to deplore. But it is all the more necessary on that account that we should not allow ourselves to be so depressed as to interfere with a fair judgment of the entire situation.

There are certain points which may strike the eye, even of the casual observer, and produce an unfavourable impression far in excess of what a more careful examination would warrant. In London, and in most of our large centres of population, there are churches and chapels which once were crowded, but are now all but deserted. It is very easy for a casual observer, especially if he have an unfriendly bias, to point triumphantly to these as signs that the churches are losing their hold upon the people. In reality the drift of population explains the change. That is itself an important factor, and it may be doubted whether the churches have yet proved themselves equal to the solution of the difficult problem which it presents. But the earnestness with which they are treating them is an evidence of vitality. Into the questions they suggest, however, I must not intrude here. I have to do only with the one point, that the changed aspect of churches in such positions as I have indicated, is due more to social or economic causes than to any change of religious opinion.

THE PAST AND THE PRESENT.

The more I enter into the comparison between the former times and the present, the less satisfactory and the more unprofitable does such an exercise appear. Its results, whatever they be, do not affect the truth of the Gospel or the duty of the churches in regard to it. It is for us to look chiefly to the way in which the Church is meeting its obligation. It is certain that the changed condition of society must necessitate a corresponding change of methods.

The pulpit is no longer able to command the attention of men as it did even in my own early days. I remember, when little more than a boy, listening to Robert Stephen McAll, of Manchester, for two hours at a stretch. Strange to tell, I was not wearied, and there were no outward and visible signs of weariness in the congregation. A third part of the time would suffice to weary an audience to-day, except in the case of very extraordinary preachers.

The change is not unhealthy if it be not pressed too far. It is true a ten-minute sermon may be extremely effective, but it needs remarkable skill to make it so. With an ordinary man such a service is apt to degenerate into a mere function, marked by correctitude, and possibly even by elegance and good taste, but utterly lacking in force and application. For effect, in a brief appeal of this kind, it is necessary that a preacher's own heart be on fire, and that he should be addressing a congregation which, to some extent at least, is in a similar state of preparation. In the absence of this, the exercise may easily become little better than a form which has to be properly observed, but to which neither preacher nor hearer attaches much importance. To reduce the proclamation of the Gospel to this, is, in my judgment, little short of sheer profanation. If it is to be a power, the sermon must be a living word coming from a believing and loving heart. Granted this, and a short sermon may be like one of the stones from the sling of the shepherd-boy, by which David vanquished the champion of the Philistines.

THE ESSENTIAL ELEMENT.

Far more important than any question of method is that of spirit. The candid friends who have been giving their advice to churches and pastors with such freedom have many ideas as to improvements in the worship and in the preaching by which larger congregations might be attracted. We are all very prone to suppose that our likes and dislikes are shared by numbers, and so our several mentors have full confidence in the success of the expedient which they themselves recommend.

Whether in ritual or preaching, the great need of the times is Evangelical simplicity combined with spiritual fervour. That is an expressive warning which the Apostle addresses to the Corinthian Church: "I fear lest, by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve in his craftiness, your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity and the purity that is toward Christ." Given these two qualities, and there can be no question as to the result.

It would be a mere platitude to say that there is to-day a considerable upheaval of religious opinion, and it is possible that the mind of the preacher may be unduly affected by it. He may be too anxious to try every prophet who comes professing to give an answer to all the problems of the age; too ready to meet every objector who has his own patent arguments with which to overthrow Revelation; in a word, to be so intent on strengthening the defence of the Gospel, as to forget that it has no defence so strong as the message itself. There is at times a necessity for repelling the assaults which are made upon the Faith. To-day the questions raised by the higher critics are continually being pressed, and have to be answered. It is a noticeable fact that so many of the most acute and able among them are simple believers in the old Gospel, and it is for them to explain how the two positions are to be reconciled.

AN IMPERATIVE NECESSITY.

It is not the business of a preacher to expound the theories of the critics to congregations who have no competence to understand the real points at issue, and who certainly are not likely to be greatly helped by the teachings of men who understand the subject but little better than themselves. Even less is a preacher of the Gospel to proceed upon the assumption that the twentieth century is looking out for a new faith, or a new version of the old one. That has been through the ages, and will be in the ages to come, the mighty power of God unto salvation.

Therefore, the preacher's own faith in its power is the first and most essential qualification for the discharge of his duty. In fact, there is no lesson so necessary for the hour, none which sets forth more clearly the plain path of duty, or in obedience to which there is so certain a promise of success, as that which is conveyed to us in the words of the Apostle which I have quoted, as they come floating down the centuries. To-day, as in his day, the human heart is liable to be drawn away from the simplicity that is towards Christ; and to-day, as then, the one effectual corrective is the loyal determination, by which the Apostle achieved all his successes, "to know nothing but Jesus Christ and Him crucified." What is involved in this, I must reserve for another article.

Samuel and Saul.

A Great Disappointment.

(1 Sam. vii.-viii.)

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

THE supreme test of character is disappointment and apparent failure. When the flowing stream is with us, and our plans are ripening into fruition, it is easy enough to be at our best. But what we really are does not appear under such conditions. Let the tide turn against us, let men avert their faces and refuse our counsels, let us be driven to stand on the defence against a world in arms—then our true metal is approved. We are now to see how Samuel bore himself in the face of a keen disappointment. This at least may be said of him, as of old it was said of Job, that he still held fast his integrity.

I. How the Disappointment Befel.—During the twenty years that followed the glorious victory of Aphek, Samuel set himself to build up in the hearts of his fellow-countrymen something of that profound belief in the Reign of the Divine King which we know as the Theocracy, and which was so dear to all devout Hebrews.

A CHERISHED IDEAL.

His headquarters and home were at Ramah, the scene of his happy childhood's years. Thence he went on itinerating journeys, and wherever he came, Samuel strove to act only as the representative and agent of the Divine King. Who was he but the messenger and minister of the Lord of Hosts? With all the force of his character and eloquence of his speech he insisted that the people were the subjects of Jehovah, owing allegiance to Him alone, and receiving from Him direction in times of perplexity, and deliverance in days of battle. They needed no king—Jehovah was King; no officials but those who uttered His messages; no code of laws but those that emanated from Him. It was a beautiful and inspiring conception; and as he went to and fro throughout the land of Israel, still upon his lips, like a musical refrain, the words were constantly being breathed, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth."

The same object was in his mind, as he instituted the schools of the prophets. To Samuel's wise interpretation of his times, we must attribute the institution of these seats of learning. The priesthood had forfeited its right to stand between Jehovah and his people. Eli and his sons had failed too abjectly and entirely to realize the purpose for which their office was instituted, to encourage the hope of the resuscitation of the priestly order. It was clear that some other religious body must be called into existence; the times demanded an order of men who should be trained in the law of God, who should be fitted to interpret the holy oracles to the people, and from the midst of whom men should arise from time to time to tell in the light what they had heard in the darkness, to proclaim on the housetops what God had whispered to their ears in secret. We find these schools flourishing in the days of Elijah and Elisha—some apparently on the same sites, where they had been instituted by Samuel (x. 3, 4, 5; xix. 23, 24; 2 Kings ii.).

As Samuel laboriously built up these institutions, he had but one purpose in his heart. It was his eager desire to imbue the minds of his countrymen with his own sublime conceptions of the Divine Kingship; and how would he do it better than by these young and ardent disciples? And it must have been a constant inspiration to them to live in contact with this great and illustrious man, who was statesman and saint in one, whom they revered for the loftiness of his character, whilst they felt the inspiration of his high ideals. They saw how respected he was in his own city, by young and old (ix. 12, 13); how accessible he was to all who needed his assistance (v. 9); how mightily he wrestled and prevailed in prayer (vii. 17; viii. 10, 21, 27); and they counted it their highest honour to be associated with him in the regeneration of their national life.

THE CAUSE OF FAILURE.

But the failure to realize his high purpose seems to have befallen through the failure of his sons. As Samuel became old, he was less able to administer justice, and continue to act as the adviser of his people in their national and domestic affairs. The burden of administering the government, in the name of the unseen King, became too heavy for him, and he appointed his sons to assist him on the extreme frontiers of the South country. The experiment of delegating to them a part of his authority proved, however, to be a disastrous failure. "They walked not in his ways, but turned aside after lucre, and took bribes, and perverted judgment."

This precipitated the catastrophe; and "all the elders of Israel," who evidently formed a kind of representative and popular assembly, came to Samuel at Ramah, to urge that he should make more satisfactory and permanent arrangements for the perpetuation of his authority. "They said unto him, Behold thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways; now make us a king to judge us like all the nations"

Looked at from the human standpoint, there was much to warrant the request. The Philistines were pushing their outposts into the heart of the country (xiii. 3, 5); Nahash, the Ammonite, was a dangerous neighbour on the Eastern frontier (xi. 1); there was fear that disintegration might again separate the people on Samuel's death. But, on the other hand, the request shattered the prophet's hopes. It showed him that his ideal was too lofty and spiritual for the people to appreciate and maintain. They could not believe only in the invisible; they must have the outward symbols and splendour of royalty.

THE DEMAND FOR THE TANGIBLE.

This is the universal failure of the heart of man. It is always craving for the sensuous and visible. Like the children of Israel, with their cry, "Make us gods, which may go before us," men demand something which they may see and handle, and before which they may prostrate themselves. Hence all spiritual worship shows a tendency to become materialistic. It is hard to believe that God is a Spirit, and that He must be worshipped in spirit and in truth; it is easier to enter into debate, whether "in this mountain or in Jerusalem men ought to worship."

These paragraphs are being written in a land where this fact is strikingly illustrated. The national Church was the earliest product of Apostolic days—the Church of Athanasius, Cyril, and Chrysostom. From the first it recited the prayers and read the Scriptures in the tongue of the people, eschewed images, and insisted on spiritual worship. Yet now its churches are full of the pictures of the saints, before which women burn candles and men cross themselves; the Holy of Holies is shut off from the common foot by golden gates; the deep bass of the reader mingles with the exquisite voices of boys in rendering the service in an almost unknown tongue—everything that can appeal to the sense is called into requisition. Apparently the people love to have it so, for they stand in dense crowds on the spacious pavements, following each invocation of the Divine Name with profuse genuflections and obeisance. As I turn from these ornate and splendid symbols to other gatherings of God's people, in which the eye has nothing to allure, or the ear to attract, where the thought is centred on God, and the only splendour is in those great conceptions that elevate and ennoble, I do not wonder that the nature of the ordinary man rebels and cries out for something more suited to the common levels of daily experience.

To combat desires like these, the Epistle to the Hebrews was written, that our minds and hearts might thither ascend, and there continually dwell, where the Lord has gone before us. For us, not a mount that can be touched, but a mount not less certainly—Mount Zion; not a city, whose minarets and monuments catch the rays of the rising and setting sun, but a city as surely, whose streets we may walk each day—the heavenly Jerusalem; not the festal crowds of worshippers that jostled each other in their climb to the Temple of Solomon, but fellow-worshippers equally real and numerous—the innumerable hosts of angels, the spirits of just men made perfect, the general assembly of church of the first-born, with whom we come into contact at each hour of prayer.

II.—How Samuel Bore his Disappointment. "The thing displeased Samuel when they said, Give us a king to judge us." It was not so much that they had rejected himself, but that they had rejected God—that He should not be King over them. They had failed to grasp the great conception, and had fallen to the level of the nations around. The one hope that had arisen in his soul, and been nurtured by the dew and sun of every summer, was frustrated, and it was clear that there could never be the realization of his cherished dream, since it was impossible to imagine circumstances more favourable for giving it effect. If it failed in Israel, it would fail entirely—unless, indeed, the Divine Kingdom could be set up, which could never pass away.

Under these bitter circumstances he made for the one Harbour of Refuge, the one assured safeguard for all broken hearts and wrecked lives, for all that labour and are heavy laden—"Samuel prayed unto the Lord."

OUR OWN IDEALS.

By how many disappointed ones these words may be read! Women whose young hearts were filled on their marriage day with high and buoyant hope, as they dreamed of an ideal life of love and blessedness, but who are mourning over the withered vows, the broken promises, the irrecoverable sense of trust and peace! Men that meant to effect such great things by their lives, to succeed in business, to lead society, to mould and fashion the State! Ministers who, as they knelt on the threshold of their sacred calling, saw visions and dreamed dreams of consecration, tenderness, shepherd-care, and parental solicitude, which have vanished, as the pictures of foliage reflected in deep lakes when a breath of wind stirs the surface of the water! What are such to do? Whither can they go? What resort is there for broken hearts?

There is no answer to these questions but that suggested by Samuel's action, when he prayed unto the Lord. Go to Him, and tell everything—what you hoped, how you endeavoured, how you failed. Weep your tears out at his feet. He can understand, can sympathize, can bind and heal. There is Balm in Gilead, there is a Physician there. There is help for the helpless, and comfort for the comfortless. To tell God everything is to be far along the road to peace; and where you cannot tell, where the sobs choke the utterance, there the Father seeth, knoweth, and comforteth, as one whom his mother comforteth.

Then the Lord answered his servant. He always does, and will, answer. The voice may be so soft and low as to be almost inaudible; but it will be there. The words may not quite chime in with our notions at first. Unlike the prophet's roll, they may be bitter in the mouth, but they will be sweet to the heart. "Be careful for nothing, but in everything by prayer and supplication; with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God, and the peace of God that passeth all understanding shall guard your hearts and your thoughts in Christ Jesus."

SUNDAY, March 2. Genesis xxxvi.

WHAT glimpses of old-world life are given in this enumeration of names—the clan moving slowly with the brown Bedouin tents, and vast herds and flocks covering an immense stretch of country; the practice of polygamy; the glad discovery of hot springs; the tendence of the asses by the sons of the sheikh; the long lines of chieftains succeeding to power, and exercising authority in the desert lands toward the sun-rising; the final settlement of Esau in Mount Seir, which is Edom!

Notice the statement of verse 31 that Edom had a settled government before there reigned any king over the children of Israel. Esau's descendants escaped the bondage of Egypt, the forty years' wandering, the conflicts of Canaan, the unsettled and stormy times of the Judges. There was nothing like these in their even and regular growth. Their history reminds us of the words of the Psalmist: "I was envious when I saw the prosperity of the wicked . . . they are not in trouble as other men." But then Edom was destined to vanish from the face of the earth, whilst Israel was being prepared to teach the world of Jehovah. If you will consider these things, and their counterpart in your own life, from the viewpoint of God's sanctuary, you will understand.

MONDAY, March 3. Genesis xxxvii.

From the first, Joseph was separate from his brethren (xlix. 26). Separate in his father's love, in the long-sleeved tunic that he wore, in his antagonism to his brother's sins, in his closer attachment to his father and Benjamin, and in his dreams of future greatness. There was a necessary aloofness in outward life, because his spirit dwelt apart. Yet it was this separation, with all the heart-burning and jealousy it caused, that enabled him to render such conspicuous service to his kith and kin.

I do not think that any of us should seek separation as an end in itself. Our one aim must be to live in fellowship with the risen Lord. Such hourly fellowship will soon produce its own results. Our former associates will feel that there is a great gulf between them and us. Unconsciously to ourselves, as we purify ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, and are made holy in the fear of God, we shall be drawn away from scenes and associations that once fascinated us; but presently we shall be able to procure the supplies of corn which shall save our dearest in the hour of need.

Our Lord also was separated from his brethren. He was the only-begotten of the Father. His greatness and glory were prognosticated from his birth, and shone before his eyes when He stooped to wash his disciples' feet. He came unto his own, but his own received Him not. They said, one to another, "Come, let us kill Him, that the inheritance may be ours." With wicked hands they crucified and slew Him, and He was buried in the pit of another Joseph's tomb. But God raised Him up, having loosed the pains of death, because it was not possible for Him to be holden by it.

To any who mourn, this story says: Weep not as those that have no hope. Thy children shall be restored to thee. Thou shalt again clasp thy Joseph to thine heart. Bright blue skies shall presently be over thee, where the dark clouds have been.

TUESDAY, March 4. Genesis xxxviii.

Our every-day experience shows that the scenes of this chapter do not altogether belong to a bygone age. Any survey of human life must result in the conviction that the nature of man is still deeply depraved. But in this there is a great difference—viz., that men cannot sin in these Christian lands without a sense of guilt. It may not be universal, but in some form or another it is one of the most general of human experiences. The mood of the soul which results in penitence is to be found amongst high and low, rich and poor, and herein we find one of the highest results of the Christian conscience. Even those who do not profess Christianity bear witness to the sense of sin. Let us ever cultivate that sensitiveness, and allow ourselves to be always touched and rebuked by it; and let us be sure to express this sense of guilt in words of contrition and confession to God, and to man when he has suffered by our misdoings.

But why should the flesh be so strong? Ah, that is the problem of the ages! But let it be remembered that the mysterious law of heredity has, without doubt, immensely increased the difficulty of our case. When man was first made, the physical nature had not been the constant vehicle of sinful passion and indulgence, and in its innocent impulses instantly recognized the restraint and curb of the soul.

But if on the one side, the flesh has become more fierce and ungovernable by the centuries of licence which lie behind, let it be borne in mind, on the other, that never in the early days were there such Divine reinforcements of Holy Spirit-power as are within our reach today. If we walk in the Spirit we shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh. If our temptations are great, the power of God is greater still.

WEDNESDAY, March 5. Genesis xxxix.

What a blessed thing it is when the Lord is evidently with his servant (vv. 2, 21, 23). It is easily discerned by those who come into contact with us (3; xxi. 22; xxvi. 28). Stephen makes special reference to this, as the inner secret of Joseph's life (Acts vii. 9). You need never be alone. I am writing this in a far-distant Russian town, face to face with large opportunities of work, but unable to speak a word of the language, and not at all sure of my interpreter; but my soul is absolutely stayed on the Presence of the Divine Helper.

But if we are to know God's helping favour and grace, we must be pure in heart and life. The temptation to yield to the flesh will come to us in its higher or lower forms, and upon our behaviour in the hour of temptation will depend all the future. If Joseph had yielded, he would never have risen to save Egypt and his father's house. When our Lord was anointed of the Holy Spirit, He was led into the wilderness to be tempted, and the first assault was a suggestion to gratify his hungry sense. This He repelled as Joseph did his, by an instant reference to God. God alone, He said in effect, shall determine when I shall eat and how.

To do right does not always secure earthly renown, but on the contrary our feet are hurt with fetters, and we are tried by the word of the Lord. But if we are constant, patient, and trustful, the King will send and loose us. God will vindicate us. Be still, and leave all in his hands (Psa. cv. 18).

THURSDAY, March 6. Genesis xl.

These two men, the chief butler and chief baker, remind us of the two thieves crucified on either side of our Lord; to the one of whom He was a savour of life unto life; to the other, of death unto death. Wherever we may be, "we have a fellowship of hearts to keep and cultivate; and a work of lowly love to do for Him on whom we wait." Like Joseph in the prison, and like our blessed Lord on the cross, let us ever be on the outlook for opportunities of doing good, and of alleviating the sin and sorrow of the world. When the soul has been comforted and succoured in temptation, it is able to administer to others of that comfort and help with which it has been comforted of God. It was because Joseph had drunk so deeply of the cup of God's salvation that he could help these two men so efficiently (2 Cor. i. 4).

In dealing with the souls of men, it is good to seek some opportunity of serving and helping them by acts of Christian courtesy before you approach the main object of your solicitude. Notice how tenderly Joseph ministered unto these two men, and caught the expression of sadness on their faces. His was a quick sympathy, which elicited the secret anxiety of their hearts. The world is full of bitterness. Few are the faces that are not shadowed with sadness, or the lives that do not at one time or another descend into the valley, where death spreads out his dark wing. Let us be on the look-out for such; not for any benefit that may accrue to us—indeed, it is as likely as not that the chief butler will forget us—but because we are children of the Father, who wipes away tears from off all faces, and turns the shadow of death into the morning.

FRIDAY, March 7. Genesis xli.

God, says the martyr Stephen, was with Joseph, and delivered him out of all his afflictions, and gave him favour and wisdom before Pharaoh, king of Egypt. What a corroboration of the words of Asaph—"Neither from the east, nor from the west, nor yet from the south cometh promotion (lifting up, R.V.), but God is the Judge; He pulleth down one and lifteth up another" (Ps. lxxv. 6, 7)! This is the reiterated conviction of God's saints (1 Sam. ii. 6-8). Only be ready, clean in heart and life, gentle and humble, strong and trustful, and God will send for you. "They brought him hastily" (14).

Notwithstanding the great urgency of the royal summons, and the speed with which the events of his life crowded one on another, Joseph seems to have been kept in perfect peace. "He shaved himself, and changed his raiment." There was no thought of pleading his own cause. He was apparently only interested in allaying Pharaoh's anxiety, as he had aforetime lost himself in the case of his two poor friends. But the Spirit of God was evidently within him (v. 38).

If these words are read by any who are in depressed circumstances, let them not be always scheming how to emancipate themselves. But, with "a heart at leisure from itself" and with no thought of any advantage that may accrue, let them set themselves to make "the hold" in which they are imprisoned a little happier for others. Let them have a single eye and a single purpose. God will see to their interests, and so great a flood of joy shall succeed the long drought, that they will forget their trials (Manasseh), and they will become fruitful in the land of their affliction (Ephraim), besides becoming the saviour in some small measure of others (Zaphnath-paaneah).

SATURDAY, March 8. Genesis xlii.

The true interpretation of Joseph's treatment of his brethren can only be found in the supposition that he repeated towards them, as nearly as possible, the behaviour that they had shown to himself at the pit's mouth—and this with no thought of retaliation, but that their conscience might be awakened; that he might see whether they would deal any differently with Benjamin to the manner in which they had dealt with him; and that he might be sure of their genuine repentance before he absolutely trusted himself to them. His purpose was secured when they said, one to another, "We are verily guilty concerning our brother."

Each of us is endowed with conscience, the faculty by which we can instantly taste and test the rightness and wrongness of things. But, with most of us, conscience sadly needs education. We sometimes hear professing Christians speak, and see them act, in a way which would be impossible if conscience were only a little trained to its high and holy function. Sometimes conscience is weak where it should be strong; morbid where it should be healthy; tithing mint, cummin, and anise, and neglecting the weightier matters of God's will. The training of conscience is afforded by the Holy Spirit and the Word of God, by contact with high-souled men and women, and by the daily exercise, of which the Apostle speaks, to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man. See that you are purged from an evil conscience, through the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus; otherwise with you, as with Joseph's brethren, it may awaken from a sleep of thirty years, and cry, "Verily guilty, verily guilty" (v. 21). See also Heb. x. 22; and Acts xxiii. 1; xxiv. 16.

Say not that all things are against thee; they are working on thy behalf. Be of good cheer. All things work together for good to them that ove God.

"One-by-One" Band.

THE monthly praise-meeting was held at the "Welcome Mission," Portsmouth, recently, when letters came from many parts, telling of the conversion of some 200 persons through the ministry of the individual. It was an inspiration to believing prayer, as people, living in different parts of our own and other lands, occupying different social positions, and connected with various sections of the Christian Church, told out the blessed truth that our God hears and answers prayer.

A preacher who has over fifty names on his "Throne of Grace" book, for daily prayer, told of the conversion of seven.

A Sunday-school teacher wrote: "Since I joined the 'One-by-One' Band, the Lord has answered my prayers for two lads for whom I had definitely prayed for some months."

A Bible-Class leader: "My class was started for some twelve who had been converted at a mission held here last February. Since then others have joined, and we now muster forty. Most of these were not Christians, and we have been praying for them one by one. Last Sunday the Lord came mightily upon them, when about half the number professed saving faith in Christ. Oh, it was good to be there, to see the reward of work, and the answer to many prayers!"

A Clergyman writes: "We have been led by the Spirit to hold little prayer-meetings for each Sunday-school class separately every day, and much blessing is resulting."

A Lad writes: "Praise God for saving my chum."

A Gentleman writes: "I have heard of several very interesting cases lately, of young converts praying for and being the means of winning their companions, or of those in the same workshop, to Christ. Gipsy Smith had a mission in Edinburgh last week. In one of his meetings a lad told me he had brought his 'chum' (who was at his side) to the meeting, wishing him to be a Christian. I had the joy of leading the 'chum' to Christ in the after meeting."

Sister Amy writes: "Last night we had our annual church rally. It was the most spiritual and delightful meeting of the kind that I have ever been to, and several who spoke mentioned the 'One-by-One' work, and before us were two who had been won during the week by this same effort. A sister who has prayed for her husband for years, who at first (immediately after her conversion) stood over her with clenched fists threatening to strike her if she prayed, desires to give thanks to God for his conversion. On Sunday night he came out very boldly for Jesus."

A Seaman on H.M.S. Angler writes: "I can testify of his great love to me. Dear friend, thank God that He ever put it into the minds of his children to adopt the method of the 'One-by-One' movement. I have been blessed abundantly by God's Spirit since I joined the 'One-by-One' Band. By praying for one man personally, it seems to draw you nearer God, because you pray definitely. I have had the pleasure of pointing two or three to Christ. . . . It is only two months since one Sunday afternoon (after we had been praying for weeks for the conversion of the elder scholars) all the select-class girls, seven in all, stayed back after school, and gave themselves to God and his service. I could tell of a few more instances where God has answered prayer more fully than we could ask or think.

From H.M.S. Diadem another writes: "I have some good news for you. Praise the Lord for it with thanksgiving! Since we have been in Chatham this Christmas we have had the great joy of seeing five souls come to Christ. I have had a prayer in my new 'Throne of Grace' book under God's guidance to save my shipmates, and He has saved three since then."

A Warrant-officer writes from Sheerness: "I have much joy in being able to write you news of my first really definite conversion. One month ago a man who was keeping watch with me seemed material for the 'One-by-One' method, so I asked him if he knew the Lord Jesus. He replied, 'No, that is a thing I have never troubled about.' So I had the joy of telling him of Jesus and his love. The man listened, then said he would believe in Jesus, and now is rejoicing that he is a sinner saved by grace."

A Member writes from Halstead: "I want to send a note of praise for answered prayer . . . four prayed-for ones have come out in whole-hearted consecration, and are being much used by God. One could tell of many other glorious answers" . . .

From Coventry one writes: "You will be glad to know that the Lord has sent three answers to petitions since I entered names in the 'Throne of Grace' book."

A Member writes from Tottenham: "I am thankful to say that in the spring of the year a relative was converted, for whom I had prayed for forty-eight years."

Home Missionary Circle.

THE hon. organizing secretary of this movement, Mr. A. E. Sims, has recently received a call to the Wesley Central Hall, Portsmouth, and this has necessitated cancelling other evangelistic engagements. The prayers of all Circle members are requested on behalf of God's servant, that in this important sphere of labour affording such wide scope for the operation of the H.M.C. principles, many "outsiders" may be reached and won to Christ.

Testimonies have been received from various quarters as to the success attending H.M.C. methods:—

From Essex: "We are having 'open-airs' now. Our Circle is growing. Faith is increasing. Fervour is deepening. Boldness is coming. Praise the Lord!"

From Sidmouth one writes: "I was very glad to see in THE CHRISTIAN the account of the H.M.C. The idea as out-lived is excellent, and there is much scope for all the members' activities."

A Missionary on furlough from Siam says: "Please accept my thanks for your very kind explanation. I am sure I feel very much with you the need of leading sleepy Christians to seek definitely the salvation of others. I can only pray the Lord to bless your efforts to this glorious end."

A Secretary reports: "Our weekly meetings are enjoyed and found so helpful by those who attend them. We have taken up the work of visiting.

From another Secretary: "Our meetings are splendid, and calculated to 'bring out' workers, besides stimulating all Christians who meet to individual effort in Christ's cause.

Secretaries are notified that it may be optional with the members of a circle to substitute a collection of free-will offerings at stated periods, in the place of the monthly subscriptions of one penny. The only expenses involved by the movement are those connected with papers and postage.

Individual Christians (where circles do not exist) are heartily welcomed to membership. Many isolated workers have found the link a cheer and an inspiration. Information concerning the movement may be had (two stamps) from Mr. A. E. Sims, Hope Gospel Mission, Portsmouth, Hants.

Drury Lane and Seven Dials.—In the course of his annual address to the congregation and friends of Christ Church, St. Giles, the vicar, Rev. S. A. Griffiths, reports that the mission work, social agencies, as well as the efforts among children, show signs of increasing vitality. One of the most important features of the work is an extensive system of visitation among the poor, and the cases which come under notice often reveal poverty of the direst nature. The following are a few of those relieved in one day. Man, wife, and child; husband in infirmary with consumption; wife subject to fits. Man, wife, and two children; husband in consumption at home. Widow, with six children; mother ill; eldest son who partly supported her is taken away with diphtheria. Communications for the vicar may be addressed to Christ Church Vestry, Endell Street, W.C.

Bible League Conference.

THE Bible League, an organization having for its object the promotion of the reverential study of the Holy Scriptures, and the resistance of the varied attacks made upon their inspiration and infallibility as the Word of God, held a conference at Oxford on Monday and Tuesday of last week. Rev. Dr. Wace presided, and Professor Margoliouth, Canon Clayton (Rural Dean of Oxford), Rev. F. E. Spencer, Rev. James Douglas, Canon Girdlestone, Rev. Chancellor J. J. Lias, and Dr. Wright were among the speakers. The Conference sermon was preached in St. Aldate's on Tuesday morning by Prebendary Webb-Peploe.

Dr. WACE, in his opening address, referred to the anxiety caused among earnest men and women by the present-day school of criticism both of Germany and of this country. The "illusions," as he called them, had taken a strong hold he said on modern thought, and the object of the League was to supply in some measure an antidote. One result, he contended, must follow if the attacks remain unchallenged—the plain man's confidence in his Bible would be destroyed.

Canon CLAYTON followed, pressing home still more strongly the effect on those who had no solid views—disbelief and irreligion were promoted. Professor MARGOLIOUTH pointed out with his usual skill the gaps in the evidence against the genuineness of the Old Testament Scriptures. Rev. JAMES DOUGLAS, in speaking of the Psalms in the light of the Higher Criticism, pleaded for the supernatural element in the Bible.

Prebendary WEBB-PEPLOE spoke as a parish clergyman who had to meet every day the difficulties of those who were puzzled by the ingenious conjectures of modern criticism. He claimed the whole Book as a Divine revelation, and ridiculed the idea that to worship the Spirit that lay behind the letter of the Book was Bibliolatry. If the Bible was God's revelation they could not give up a single part of it. They took the Old Testament from the mouth of Christ, and dared not say less than that whatever He accepted must be true for them that followed.

Dealing with "Bible History and Babylonian Monuments," Rev. JOHN TUCKWELL declared that he was not there to defend the Word of God—that no more needed his defence than the sun in the heavens—but his own faith in it, and the faith of a large number of other Christian people whose faith he shared. In doing so, he gave an interesting review of archæological evidence which had been almost neglected. Professor BURROWS emphasized the need for such conferences, because of the widespread supposition that the question is, like many others, open to differences of opinion—a supposition which, however, ignored the stupendous issues involved. He showed the importance of the need for every effort, by writing and speaking, to make the real facts known. Canon CHRISTOPHER expressed thankfulness that the deliberations had been free from anything of a personal or vituperative character, as some of "the Higher Critics" of Oxford were his personal friends, and, he believed, servants of God.

Uncivilized Nations and the Drink.—Friends of missionaries and their work in the New Hebrides will learn with deep satisfaction of the passing by Congress of the Gillett-Lodge Bill. The measure was drawn two years ago by the Reform Bureau, with the advice of Congressman F. H. Gillett, who introduced it in the House, and Senator H. C. Lodge introduced and pressed it in the Senate. Dr. Paton has pleaded for such legislation for nine years. The Bill forbids any American to sell intoxicants, opium, or firearms in any island of the Pacific that is not under the government or protectorate of a civilized power. The Bill is valuable not only in removing a stain from the nation's honour, and a hindrance to missionary enterprise, but especially in furnishing encouragement to press to completion the treaty Secretary Hay has promised to undertake, to make the benefits conferred by the Bill permanent in the Pacific, and to extend the same protection to all aboriginal races.

The Late Mr. Richard Spragg.

THE removal by death of Mr. Richard Spragg from the ranks of aggressive Christian workers leaves a keen sense of personal loss in the hearts of many to whose conversion he has been used of God. He was a plain man of the people who, without any advantages of education or training, was yet gifted with a readiness of expression and force of character which gave him great influence over those with whom he came into contact. All his powers were consecrated for many years to the one object of glorifying God by testifying for the Lord Jesus Christ.

A deeply pathetic interest surrounds the story of his childhood. Born in 1839, near Madeley, in Shropshire, as one of a family of ten, his father seemed to bear to the child from his earliest years a feeling of positive hatred. When about the age of seven the boy narrowly escaped being killed by a garden spade which was thrown by his parent when under the influence of drink. The mother's heart was long torn at the treatment to which Richard was subjected. This culminated by his being turned out of the family home when still a young boy, and forbidden to return.

Finding refuge in the house of a shoemaker, he said himself that his education began by being sent down a coal mine to draw small waggons where there was not room for a horse or an ass. Surrounded by influences of the most mischievous character, the boy made several changes without apparently meeting with anyone who cared more for him than if he had been one of the animals to whom the heavier loads fell. A tramp of twenty-three miles took him to West Bromwich, where for the first time he found himself among men who were shocked at the idea of a child so youthful in appearance going down the shaft to work.

Looking back in after years, he marvelled at the goodness of the Lord in keeping him safe when many beside whom he worked met with serious and fatal accidents, though at the time he knew nothing of this, having none to tell him of the love of God. At the last mine in which he worked he felt himself driven forward one day by a gust of wind, and the next instant a piece of coal weighing several tons fell where he had been standing. Yet a few minutes after he was ignorantly swearing and laughing at such "a slice of luck." After another narrow escape he burst into such a torrent of oaths that a man who shared the escape wept, and declared that he had never heard such a man, and would never again go down a mine where he knew Richard Spragg to be, a determination to which he adhered.

Learning that his father had met with an accident which resulted in the breaking of one of his legs, Richard felt it to be his duty to go and see him. About the same period he made the acquaintance of his future wife, who from the first used her influence to get him to give up the work in the mines. His first change was to working as a hammerman, his marriage following soon after. Drinking, accompanied by dog and cock fighting, continued, however, and he went from bad to worse.

During an absence of her husband for two years in London, Mrs. Spragg came under Gospel influences. Having learned the joyful news of salvation for herself, she could not rest until her husband should also know something of the way of life, and made her way from West Bromwich to London. Going to his place of employment she besought him to return with her. He did so, but the spiritual light and darkness in the home did not agree, and the suffering wife found her sorrow multiplied as well as her joy. Richard ordered her to stop both speaking to him about Christ and chapel-going; but nothing could stop her praying. For a number of years he wandered from town to town, his wife never losing hope of his reclamation.

He was living in Kilburn when he came into contact with Mr. W. R. Lane. Meeting the evangelist in a shop kept by an acquaintance, he said, "They say you are a preacher, just tell me what you have got to preach about." The conversation which followed was more than Mr. Spragg could stand, so he fled from the shop. His friend could not get away so easily, and the result of Mr. Lane's words was such that a doctor was sent for to prescribe for the mental depression which followed. A few days later the shopkeeper was at Kensal Hall, where Mr. Lane was preaching, and there found the Saviour. Seeking out Mr. Spragg, he told what the Lord had done for him, and did not rest till after much difficulty his friend too had heard the preacher and had been convicted of sin. Fourteen weeks of a terrible experience followed. By-and-by the idea was instilled into his mind that there was no hope for him, and he calmly planned to commit suicide. He bade a number of friends good-bye, and was in the act of putting an end to his life when a voice seemed to say to him, "The Blood." Throwing the knife away, he fell on his knees crying out, "O Lord God, I believe the blood of Jesus Christ thy Son can cleanse me!"

Peace came to his soul, and for wife as well as husband a new life began. The new convert could not sleep the first night for joy; and went to work the next morning leaping, shouting, and praising God. The next evening he began testifying at the corner of the street to the grace of Jesus Christ. Opposition was fierce on the part of those among whom he had lived his sinful life. For eleven years more he continued to labour in the factory, in the midst of much contradiction and persecution. Never having learned to read, he applied himself earnestly to it; and in a few weeks could make out his favourite texts.

Throughout his Christian career Mr. Spragg was a thorough believer in the value of tract distribution, and the experiences which he was from time to time enabled to relate abundantly justified him in the position. In 1893, he began to devote himself entirely to the seeking of souls for his Master. He was privileged to see the good seed bearing fruit, trophies of grace being won from among those who seemed most hopeless.

Opportunities for service were opened in many directions. Several places he visited with the Gospel have now Christian workers in their midst who owe their conversion (under God) to the simple, clear presentation of the Gospel message by him, and in different cases whole families were converted to God. In conducting missions he showed great powers of adaptability in dealing with varying audiences. His greatest strength lay in dealing with individuals. Walking along the street, in a railway carriage, or wherever he might be, he was ready with a word of counsel or warning.

Mr. Spragg's second wife has been left with a boy unprovided for, and a number of Christian friends are making an effort to provide her with the means of self-support. Those desirous of taking part in this are desired to communicate with Mr. H. A. Punnett, 119, St. John's Road, St. John's, S.E.

Dr. Newman Hall at Rest.

AMID tokens of universal and heartfelt sorrow, Dr. Newman Hall was laid to rest on Saturday in Abney Park Cemetery. Seeing that the departed minister had for so many years shepherded the flock at Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road, it was only fitting that a funeral service should be held at the scene of his former labours. The church was filled in every part, and the service was marked by intense feeling and solemnity.

Among the numerous organizations which sent deputations were the Congregational Union, London Congregational Union, London Missionary Society, Y.M.C.A., National Council of Evangelical Free Churches, London City Mission, Ragged School Union, National Temperance League, &c. The pulpit and lectern were draped with purple and white, and a large number of wreaths and floral designs were sent by sorrowing relatives and friends.

While the funeral procession wended its way up the central aisle of the church, Rev. F. B. Meyer recited the opening sentences of the Burial Service. Psalm xc. having been chanted by the choir, Canon Fleming read the usual portions of Scripture. Then followed the singing of a hymn of Newman Hall's compiling, "My times are in Thy hand," and Pastor Thomas Spurgeon led in prayer. God was praised for the noble life and service of the one He had taken to be with Himself, for the Word he preached and printed, and for the souls who have been sanctified and established through that Word applied by the Holy Ghost.

After the singing of another hymn, Rev. F. B. Meyer gave a brief address, in the course of which he said that the church in which they were assembled would ever be an enduring memorial to their departed friend and brother. There was hardly a section of the Christian Church, or a branch of philanthropic work conducted in the city, which was not represented in the audience. He was glad to see clergymen, Free Church ministers, and leaders in Christian service joining with the workingmen and women of the district in testifying to the esteem in which they held the one who had been removed from their midst by death. The names of few religious leaders are more widely known and more deeply revered than his throughout the world. They could not regard his passing away as the conclusion of his service. Death was not finality, but the stepping-stone to fuller usefulness and higher service above. Referring to the last few days of Dr. Hall's illness, Mr. Meyer read some of the words which fell from his lips while waiting God's time for release from earth. On being asked if he had any message for the many ministers who were inquiring about him, he replied, "Tell them to preach Christ and Him crucified—there is nothing better." Asked if he suffered any pain, he answered, "No pain; nothing to interfere with the solemnity of dying."

The hymn written by Dr. Newman Hall on the occasion of the death of Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, and set to music by Mrs. Newman Hall, was then sung by the choir:—

The weary pilgrim rests at last,
The shadowed valley has been passed,
All pain and care away are cast:
At Home.

As the coffin was borne from the church the choir rendered, with much tenderness, "Blest are the departed," and the mournful congregation slowly dispersed, many proceeding to Abney Park to witness the interment.

In several of the Congregational Churches on last Lord's Day, touching reference was made to the wide and useful ministry of Dr. Newman Hall. Rev. F. B. Meyer, in the course of his sermon, dwelt upon some of the noble characteristics in the life of his predecessor; while Dr. Guinness Rogers, preaching at Lavender Hill, referred to the unbroken fellowship which had existed for fifty years between Dr. Newman Hall and himself. He felt that the highest tribute he could pay to his departed fellow-worker was to describe him as "emphatically a preacher of the Gospel."

A Fisher of Men.

Rev. J. E. WATTS-DITCHFIELD.

THE extensions and improvements which have been wrought during the past four years in connection with the Church of St. James the Less, Bethnal Green, are of so remarkable a character, and have proved so fruitful in beneficial results, that they call for the earnest attention of all whose hearts are stirred by the godless condition of the masses.

It is by no means easy to transform a neglected sanctuary, in a district whose distinguishing characteristic is sordid poverty, into a flourishing centre of Christian work; but by the Divine blessing this, and indeed very much more, has been accomplished since 1897. The outlay for church extension movements, apart from working expenses, has amounted to over £30,000, and that this large sum has been wisely and economically administered will be evident to any who examine the buildings and the operations maintained therein.

The vicar, Rev. J. E. Watts-Ditchfield, has been distinguished throughout his career by a remarkable faculty of enlisting and retaining the attention and affection of working-men. While curate of St. Peter's, Upper Holloway, he conducted Sunday Afternoon Services for Men, which immediately attained wide popularity throughout the northern districts of the Metropolis; and since then similar results have followed from a like endeavour at Bethnal Green. The methods adopted to secure and sustain a congregation are refreshing in their directness and efficacy. Mr. Watts-Ditchfield's views on the subject may be gathered from his strong and appealing book, entitled "Fishers of Men," wherein he says:—

"Never give any man up as hopeless. 'Until he found it,' the shepherd went on; and so must we. If ninety-nine efforts fail, we must try one hundred. Wherever you meet a man, speak to him. I make it an absolute rule to bid every man 'good day' whom I meet in the parish, whether I know him or not. In this way I never pass a man by who has been to the service on Sunday. To shake a man by the hand on Sunday and pass him by unnoticed on Thursday, is disastrous.

"Follow men everywhere. I have gone up ladders to men slating a roof with my cards, and, if the subject happened to be appropriate, as 'The Man on the Roof,' it generally tells. Men like to feel you take pains and spare no trouble to reach them. Even if, for the moment, you are received with a grunt, it is not lost labour in the long run. We should be always on the look-out for opportunities."

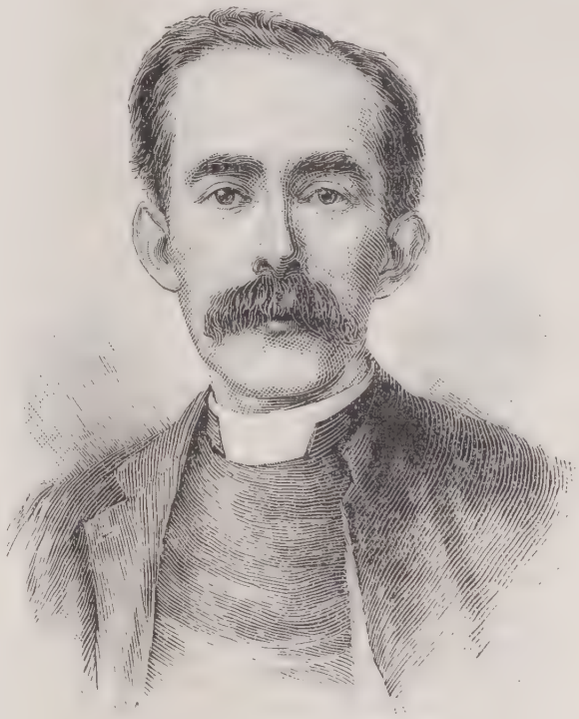
Working on such common-sense lines and with untiring industry, Mr. Watts-Ditchfield has hundreds of men in church every Sunday afternoon; varied and striking as the topics are, the end in view is always purely evangelistic, and it is encouraging to know that many who have been gathered into the fold of Christ as a result of the Men's Meeting have been inspired with a glowing enthusiasm for the Gospel cause. The Men's Committee is the centre from which practically the whole of the church operations are directed and supplied with willing workers.

A POOR MAN'S PARK.

The transformation that has taken place in the old churchyard, is typical of many others at St. James-the-Less. The condition of the rank and dismal spot may be imagined from the fact that it was the latest to be closed of all burial grounds in London proper. Many a pungent pen described the horrors of such places, aroused the indignation of the people, and led the way to reform; but it may be doubted if any other ground had such a record as this, that in the four days prior to its closing, no fewer than 1,600 funerals took place. With decorum and reverence, the spot has been made into a picturesque recreation ground, the green sward of which comes as a grateful relief to the eye that has become accustomed to the monotony of the brick-and-mortar desert of Bethnal Green. There are flower-beds and comfortable seats, while on the large stretches of asphalte Gospel meetings are held, at which the attendance reached very large numbers during last summer.

A MAGNIFICENT PILE.

On the far side of the recreation-ground stands a huge but handsome three-storied edifice described by the present Bishop of London as "the best block of church buildings in the Metropolis." It comprises accommodation for a number of church undertakings almost bewildering in their variety, while both in general effect and detail of plan there is evidence of tastefulness of design and utility of arrangement. The centre is occupied by the Parish Hall, with class-rooms grouped round, and so planned that the partitions may be withdrawn and the entire floor space thrown into one. Many other rooms are in regular use. The capacious parlour where weekly prayer-meetings are held is an ideal gathering place, and in the schools some hundreds of young people receive a sound education. The uppermost floor is devoted to a school for cookery, in which the fittings are probably unique. For demonstration lectures, gas stoves and a kitchener are provided; but with that practical turn which characterizes the management, small "cottage" stoves are provided, and the simple utensils common to the humble homes of the district, so that the girls who are instructed may learn to make the best use of quite ordinary means. In other meeting-rooms the young women's guild, the various Bible-classes, and other societies come together. The most encouraging feature of all the operations carried on in this busy hive of industry, is that the basis of all is Evangelical truth; the specific aim is not merely to educate the people, but to evangelize them.



REV. J. E. WATTS-DITCHFIELD.
From Photograph by Mr. Gorsuch, 48, Junction Road, Upper Holloway.

Turning to the Parish Church, we find that it has been entirely remodelled. Mr. Watts-Ditchfield, while abhorring ritualism and ornate ceremonial, has made the interior of the building "a thing of beauty," combining simplicity with tastefulness, while the dinginess of the exterior is, at any rate, lessened by the surrounding flower-beds and grass plots.

The building stands upon historic ground, close to the site of the residence of the cruel Edmund Bonner, who so fully utilized his power as Bishop of London to keep the fires of Smithfield burning. Especial interest, therefore, attaches to the pronounced Protestantism which prevails at St. James-the-Less.

The attendances have increased considerably of late; the number of communicants on Easter days during the past four years may be taken as typical of the progress made, the figures being: 1898, 185 communicants; 1899, 264; 1900, 410; 1901, 486. The directly religious work, pastoral and evangelistic, goes steadily forward. The missions conducted during Lent and Advent, as well as the homely gatherings held each Lord's Day evening after service, are times of reaping. On Saturdays, too, the vicar is "at home" to men who seek spiritual advice, when two large rooms have to be requisitioned to accommodate the many inquirers. Mrs. Watts-Ditchfield also deals helpfully with the women, many of whom have been pointed to the Lord Jesus Christ.

Parts of the premises, formerly used as an infant-school, but now superseded by the new buildings, have been fitted up for the purposes of a medical mission. Dr. Harford-Battersby, of Livingstone College, brings his experience and skill to the directorship of the operations, having the assistance of specialists in eye and skin diseases. The register shows a record of 10,000 applicants per annum. Other parts of the old school are devoted to a men's club (with a reading-room and a refreshment bar), and a technical education hall in which young men receive practical training in cabinet-making and other useful industries.

FOR "THE DEEPEST DOWN."

Yet another important development is the Workmen's Hotel, in Ames Street, Bethnal Green. Mr. Watts-Ditchfield has purchased three houses typical of the slums, and metamorphosed them into a clean and comfortable lodging-house for men. A glance at the neighbourhood from the roof is in itself sufficient to demonstrate the desirability of such a place of refuge; only a few weeks since, this same roof was occupied by a forge, an old-clothes emporium, and a collection of hen coops. Seventy-five beds are provided, as well as bathing and washing accommodation of an improved character, while at the food bar cheap and nourishing meals are in high demand. The institution was opened recently by Lady Wimborne, and at once sprang into popularity.

With his resourceful enterprise, Mr. Watts-Ditchfield pursued his intention to reach those "deepest down" among the forlorn denizens of the slums. He secured a derelict dissenting chapel, reconstructed or renovated the premises, and opened it as a kind of "Ragged Church," the motto of which should be, he says, "No respectable person wanted," since it is essentially for the poorest of the poor. One of the curates is in charge, assisted by a city missionary. The next step to be taken will be for the children of the back streets. While the Workmen's Hotel was being prepared, the ground floor was opened as a Sunday-school exclusively for the children living in the street. The success of the experiment was so pronounced that Mr. Watts-Ditchfield entertains good hopes of shepherding the neglected children of the district, street by street. Much might be said, too, of the temperance propaganda in which Mr. Watts-Ditchfield, as a total abstainer, takes a deep interest; also of the open-air Gospel meetings, and of many other departments of work, all or most of which are developments of the past four years.

AN EVANGELICAL SUCCESSION.

The natural fear that in days to come this splendid citadel of Evangelicalism might be captured by some representative of sacerdotalism, has been removed by the action of the late and present Bishops of London. Dr. Creighton had expressed his intention to transfer the patronage, hitherto vested in the See of London, to a body of seven trustees. Dr. Winnington-Ingram has confirmed the arrangement, and the appointment of such stalwart Protestants as Revs. Dr. Wace and E. A. Stuart on the Trust is a sufficient guarantee for the thoroughness with which the plan is being carried out. The advances and developments which have here been briefly outlined, have necessarily involved a large financial outlay, both for capital expenditure, and for the maintenance of so many institutions in satisfactory order.

The burden is necessarily a heavy one, and it is to be hoped that in view of the sterling Christian character of the agencies, Mr. Watts-Ditchfield may receive the measure of support which he needs, and in the administration of which it is evident that he will consistently follow his high ambition of winning souls for the Saviour.

They Spake of His Decease.

(Luke ix. 31.)

LORD JESUS! We have need to climb
The solemn heights of prayer,
Forget the hideous sights of time,
And see thy beauty there.

We need to learn that many a theme
Of vast importance here
Is held in very light esteem
In heaven's eternal sphere.

While that which least attention finds
Amid earth's rush and roar
Is just the work which angel minds
Are eager to explore.

Forgive our sullen questionings
And contradictions rude,
And lead us to the light that springs
Where Thou art understood.

Transfiguration days are given
To thy disciples still,
With glimpses of a glorious heaven
Our memories to fill;

To send us singing through the night
Of loneliness and loss,
And in Transfiguration light
To make us see thy Cross;

To raise us from the world's unrest,
And give our spirits peace;
To hear the voices of the blest
Who speak of thy decease.

Those who "Immanuel's Land" attain
With one accord declare:
"The Lamb of God for sinners slain
Is 'all the glory' there."

Then lead us past the gilded show
That tempts us from thy side,
And past the love that will not know
Christ and Him crucified.

George Yard Mission.

THE good work with which the late Mr. George Holland was so honourably associated goes steadily forward, under noble patronage, and with the help of devoted workers. From time to time new friends are being raised up to take an interest in the mission, with its many agencies for the good of the poor in a densely-populated district of Whitechapel. Recently the PRINCESS OF WALES who, as "Princess May" was an occasional visitor at the Mission quarters years ago, has shown definite interest in the work, and consented to be its patroness. In token of her sympathy, her Royal Highness sent a beautiful portrait of herself, which was promptly given a place of honour in the hall of the Mission.

This gracious act suggested a function for the good of the people, and it was hoped, for the encouragement of all engaged in the work. Accordingly, on Thursday last the members of the Mothers' Meeting gathered in large numbers, accepting with much enthusiasm an invitation to tea, and to a meeting for the formal unveiling of the handsome portrait.

The MARQUIS OF NORTHAMPTON presided, and in genial terms described the circumstances under which the patronage of her Royal Highness was granted. The workers were convinced that the associations of bygone days, when she visited George Yard with her mother, the lamented Duchess of Teck, were still dear to the Princess; so Colonel Hayne, the superintendent, boldly put her the question through the post whether she would be patroness of the Mission. The reply was favourable, as was also another, that Her Royal Highness should send her picture for display in the Mission. The Princess expressed her willingness thus to honour the Mission in very hearty terms.

The picture was unveiled in a few appropriate words by the COUNTESS OF HARROWBY, who recalled the interest of the lamented Duchess of Teck in the Mission, and the unremitting labours of the late Mr. George Holland. The picture was signed "Victoria Mary" by the Princess herself; and hearty cheers in honour of her Royal Highness were given by the large audience of women. Songs were sung by several ladies, and an earnest Gospel address was delivered by Rev. D. B. HANKIN, of Mildmay.

Liverpool Sheltering Homes.

AFTER another winter's work among the orphan and destitute children of this city, we are sending the sixtieth band of young emigrants from the Sheltering Homes to our Home in Canada.

Our work loses none of its interest as the years go by, and as we have rescued the children composing this present family, many of them from lives of absolute need, and often direst temptation, and have endeavoured to surround them with home care and protection, it has been our sincere desire to influence them through the teachings of God's Word to receive the Lord Jesus as their Saviour and Friend.

A short time ago, a special evangelistic mission was conducted in our schoolroom by Mr. Worthington, of Liverpool, with the happy result that among the older ones, many of them having heard the Saviour "knocking" and his voice pleading for admission, have opened their hearts that He might come in.

We shall be glad of the prayerful interest of your readers and our old friends in these young people, as they leave us for new surroundings with increased opportunities. The expenses for each child—outfit and emigration—amount to £10. LOUISA BIRT.

The After-Care Association for poor persons discharged recovered from asylums for the insane has made steady progress during the past year. At the annual meeting a few days ago the Archbishop of Canterbury warmly urged its claims on the Christian public. Among the other speakers were the Bishop of Barking, Dr. Nicolson, C.B., Archdeacon Sinclair, and Mr. Bagot (Commissioner in Lunacy). The secretary is Mr. H. Thornhill Roxby, Church House, Dean's Yard, Westminster, S.W.

Mount Hermon Orphans.

IT is with much sorrow that I have to record the passing away of my beloved mother, Mrs. Mary Ann Parry, of the Mount Hermon Girls' Orphan Homes, Kilburn, N.W., which occurred quite suddenly, from heart failure, in the last week of January. For nearly twenty-five years she had been connected with this work amongst orphans, the whole of the management of the Homes devolving upon her on the decease, in 1887, of her cousin, Miss Mary Ann Cole, who founded the work in 1864. Although latterly her health had greatly failed, yet she bravely "continued at her post," through much weakness and suffering. We were all hoping that she was recovering from a fourth attack of rheumatic fever, when suddenly the call came, and God's weary worker and faithful servant passed into the King's presence, and entered into her rest and her reward.

She was truly a "mother in Israel." Each little orphan child in Mount Hermon knew and felt that she had an individual love, a mother's love that she might call her own. Most gentle, loving, and tender of heart; of a meek and quiet spirit, and with a simple and childlike faith in the living Lord—God blessed her, and made her a blessing, for "her children rise up and call her blessed."

The trustees of the Homes and others have expressed a wish that I should carry on the work; but while doing so for the present, I am unable to do so permanently, owing to pressing and urgent home duties. May I ask through your columns for the prayers of God's people, that his will may be made manifest as to the future of the work. We have now about eighty children in the Homes, and the work at present is free from all encumbrance of debt or mortgage. We praise God for this. May the Lord raise up someone who, with a living faith in Him, may seek to carry on the work on the same lines as hitherto; one possessing a mother's heart for these now doubly-orphaned little ones; one who, by the terms of the Trust Deed, must hold "sound doctrine," and seek firstly the spiritual welfare of the children committed to her charge.—

(Mrs.) MARY P. HARRIS.

The King's Own Mission.

THE seventh anniversary of the King's Own Mission, St. James' Hall, Kennington, S.E., was celebrated on February 9 and 10. The attendances were far in advance of any of the previous annual gatherings.

Mr. F. F. Belsey's blackboard address on the Sunday evening was deeply interesting; nearly the whole of the congregation remained to the after meeting, when Mr. Belsey gave a further talk, particularly addressed to parents.

At the public meeting on the following day, Mr. E. Unwin presided. Reports of the work done during the past year—which was one of blessing and progress—were given by Mr. A. W. Hart and Mr. O. L. Heatley. Rev. T. Nicholson, of Bromley, gave an encouraging address, in which he characterized the work of the Mission as solid, sound, and spiritual. Sister Nellie, who has been a loyal and devoted worker from the inception of the work, followed with a solo, after which Mr. Heatley heartily thanked God for the band of stalwart workers engaged in the many-sided operations of the mission.

Artillery Lane Mission.—The report for 1901 of the numerous agencies which centre in this Mission in Spitalfields is of an encouraging nature. Perhaps the most touching phase of the work is the breakfast given to the poor. Many of the hungry ones in their need wait for an hour before the time of admittance. After breakfast the Gospel is earnestly and lovingly proclaimed. The close attention and expressions of thanks indicate that the message is not given in vain. The gatherings for mothers, the work of visitation, and the meetings in lodging-houses have been maintained with many signs of growing interest in spiritual things on the part of the people of the district. Copies of the annual report may be obtained from the secretary, Mr. C. C. Barrick, 12, Summerhill Road, South Tottenham.

Other Lands.

A Remarkable Movement.

ONE of the most interesting experiences I have had during my Russian tour is intercourse with Baron Uexküll, of Réval, in the province of Esthonia, about twelve hours' journey from St. Petersburg, from whom I have received the following information:—

In the year 1700 the Pope directed the Knights of St. John to bring the Roman Catholic religion to these provinces of Livonia and Esthonia, situated on the Baltic. This they did with fire and sword, so that the people, nominally at least, accepted the sway of the Romish Church. The provinces were afterwards conquered by the Germans, and subsequently by Sweden, and were among the first to receive the Reformation. The upper and educated classes are thus Germans and Lutherans.

Two hundred years ago, when the provinces became incorporated in the Russian Empire, liberty was given to the Lutheran Church on condition that no attempt was made to proselytize from the Greek Church; and also to the Moravian Church, which had been founded by the personal efforts of Count Zinzendorf. In addition to these, the Baptists were granted liberty, their work, however, being confined to the poorer classes, who are the lineal descendants of the original inhabitants, and still speak the Histonian language.

Baron Uexküll was the representative of one of the old German families, and to the age of thirty lived a proud, godless, and reckless life. Under the pressure of severe sorrow he was led to the study of the Bible, and ultimately found the blessedness of full salvation; and God opened his mouth to bear witness to the truth as it was in Jesus. He was successively put out of the Lutheran and Moravian Churches; many of his former friends and acquaintances turned their backs on him; and he was accounted as the off-scouring of all things for Christ's sake—the more so as he sought believer's baptism at the hands of another Christian brother.

A little before this time, a remarkable movement had been inaugurated among the Esthonian peasants on one of the islands of the Baltic, and had subsequently spread to the mainland. Some Swedish missionaries had begun to preach the simple Gospel message, insisting that baptism could not impart saving grace, and proclaiming the Gospel of the grace of God. A fire was kindled which spread to the mainland, and though, at the instance of the Russian Government, the missionaries were recalled, it continued to burn with undiminished ardour. The peasants attended the Lutheran churches at the stated hours of service, but, in addition, held meetings in their own houses for testimony and prayer, these gatherings being characterized by marvellous manifestations of the power of the Holy Spirit.

This movement spread throughout the country, and came to the estates of the Baron, and he went among the simple people, counting them his brethren, joining in their meetings, and opening to them the Word of God. It was an unheard-of thing that a wealthy nobleman should cast in his lot with the despised people of God!

The Baron next began to go through the country, preaching the Gospel in the villages, and wherever he went he was followed by vast numbers of people. This so excited the anger of the Lutheran clergy that they denounced him to the police, and he was constantly being brought before the local authorities and fined. He also held meetings in his own house for the breaking of bread and the ministry of the Word; but for two years, as often as twice a month these gatherings would be broken up by the police, who would take some to prison, and inflict fines on others.

Finally it became so difficult to continue the work in the face of the Lutheran clergy and the police, that the congregations appealed to be tolerated by the Government as Baptists, and when it was required that some responsible person should be nominated as pastor, the Baron was chosen to that office; and he is now the recognised pastor of the church, which assembles in his house, and is able to marry, bury, or baptize. In this way he has perfect liberty to preach in all Baptist churches throughout Russia, and is greatly honoured of God. Wherever he goes, the place of meeting is crowded, and many souls are being constantly brought to the Lord.

At the present time, whilst I am in Réval, the Esthonian Parliament is in session, of which Baron Uexküll is a member. He attends its meetings during the day, and at night is preaching in the Baptist Church, from which many are turned away on each occasion, not being able to gain admittance for the crowds.

He is, therefore, not only able to minister to his own people, but powerfully to shape the policy of the Baptist churches, the pastors of which are, for the most part, simple and uneducated men; and it is impossible to forecast all the future possibilities to which this movement may grow. But it is very remarkable, at a time when the Lutheran Church of this land has lost its evangelistic fervour, and is inclined to substitute forms and rites for the living power of Christ, that God has raised up this devoted nobleman to preach the Gospel in all its simplicity, and is renewing among the peasantry those marvellous manifestations which attended the first preaching of the Gospel, when He bore witness to the message of salvation "with signs and wonders and gifts of the Holy Ghost."

To have come across a movement like this is intensely interesting. "The gift of tongues" is heard quite often in the meetings, specially in the villages, but also in the towns. Here, at Réval, the pastor of the Baptish church tells me that they often break out in his meetings. They are most often uttered by young women, less frequently by men. When they are interpreted they are found to mean: "Jesus is coming soon; Jesus is near. Be ready; be not idle." When they are heard, unbelievers who may be in the audience are greatly awed. A gentleman who was present on one occasion was deeply impressed by the fact that those who spoke were quite ordinary people until they were uplifted, as it were, by a trance, and then spoke with so much fluency and refinement. Many memories were stirred by this recital, of the beginning of the Irvingite Church, and of the very remarkable scenes and voices that filled Edward Irving with so much awe and yearning.

South African Native Girls.

MISS ANNA M. COOTE, of whose interesting work among coloured children in South Africa mention has already been made in these columns, has been conducting meetings in Dublin and neighbourhood. One great need to which she has been calling attention is that of a resident medical man. There are 6,000 souls on the location, and in the hot summer weather there is great danger and discomfort to poor fever-stricken sufferers, toiling all the way to the town, under the broiling heat of the sun, often only to die after being received into hospital. Here is mission work of a noble order, meriting for any medical man with time and means at his disposal, and willing to be used in God's service.

Miss Coote's training as a hospital nurse is of great importance in her mission work. In a letter sent home, some time ago, for The Nurses' Journal, she writes:—

"Many of the boys and girls are very delicate. They have a hard life. I am the first European missionary who has lived on this location. I know every man, woman, and child, and their names."

Miss Coote hopes soon to return to her work again. She is anxious to establish a training home for native girls, where these young lives would be sheltered until they are of an age suitable to enter on domestic service.

Spanish Tract Society.

HAVING been converted along with his brother just before the Spanish Revolution of 1868, when Queen Isabella was dethroned, Sr. Luis Lopez Rodriguez had his youthful Christian ardour from the first turned in the direction of tract distribution.

The only tract at first available was one entitled, "Andres Dunn." From Madrid, Pastor Rodriguez went to work for God in Barcelona, and formed the first Y.M.C.A. in that city. Finding his work crippled for lack of tracts, he wrote to various heads of missions in Spain for help, but in vain. Providentially an English tract fell into his hands, giving the address of the Religious Tract Society in London. Promptly availing himself of the information, he appealed for a grant. Great was his joy on receiving a kind reply, accompanied by a parcel of Spanish tracts.

From Barcelona the pastor went to Figueras, where up to the present date he has acted as director of the Evangelistic Mission, for the evangelization of the entire province (pop. 400,000). In order to supply his itinerating evangelists and other workers with tracts, he was obliged to publish on his own account, as grants from societies were exhausted in the course of a week or two. His enthusiasm in tract distribution soon became widely known, and appeals poured in from all parts of Spain for attractive and well-illustrated leaflets.

This has now led to the formation of the Spanish Religious Tract and Book Society, and the aim in view is to supply the needs not only of Spain, but of the Canary Islands, Balearic Isles, Tangier, Ifri, Cape Non, Tetuan, Ceuta, Gomera, Alhucemas, Melilla, and the Zaffarin Islands; the district between the Cameroons and the Muni River; the Spanish Protectorate from Cape Bojador to Cape Blanco, Fernando Po, Annobom, Coriso, and Eloby Islands; Cuba, Porto Rico, South America, the Philippines, Marianne and Caroline Islands.

A large number of well-illustrated tracts and books have already been published. The translations being done by Spanish writers, the errors of too literal translations are avoided, which greatly adds to the attractiveness of the Society's publications. Catalogues are supplied gratis on application to Pastor Lopez Rodriguez, Figueras, Prov. Gerona, Spain.

Cuba and the Philippines are specially needy spheres, and funds are required to meet the demand. The hon. treasurer is General Battersby, Lyncroft, Weybridge.

The Evangelization of Peru.

IT is gratifying to learn of the continued blessing which is attending the efforts of God's servants in the evangelization of Peru. Notwithstanding the ever-varying forms which Romish opposition takes in this country, it is evident that the spirit of inquiry which has been manifesting itself is spreading in many directions, and the prospects of the Mission are distinctly encouraging it. Mr. Carlos H. Bright, in the course of a brief summary of the year's progress, writes:—

"The printing plant I removed to Huacho, and there fixed my residence, leaving things in Lima to the care of other brethren. But they having now removed to Ica, I have to see to the two branches in Lima and Huacho, leaving them to follow up the work in Nazca. Our last baptism was two months ago. In Huacho the work has become very promising. I can safely say several souls have been converted, and are asking baptism. We have a goodly number of regular listeners at our weekly meetings. Our last meeting in the country stirred up the priests to most bitter opposition. They have publicly preached death against us, and have called the people 'brutes' for allowing us to live here. Our native helpers have sold among the people a great many Bibles and Testaments. Amid much that tries our faith as to material things, the way in which the Gospel is spreading into the interior—in places near and far rejoices our hearts." Mr. Bright may be addressed Apartado 84, Lima, Peru, South America.

Memorial to Child Martyrs.

SOME of my readers will recall with sad interest the account which Mr. Alexander R. Saunders sent me of the sufferings of his dear little ones during the time of persecution in China. Isabel and Jessie were taken home from the midst of their trials to be with the Lord Jesus Christ, whom they loved so much. Their father and mother came home to this country for a time, and now in the good providence of God the way has been opened up for them to return to the home from which they were driven. A few friends who were deeply interested in the story of the "Two Child Martyrs" have proposed that a suitable memorial should be erected in the city of P'ing-yao, where they will be long lovingly remembered.

When they were asked what form they would like this to take, Mr. and Mrs. Saunders suggested that nothing would be more appreciated than the erection of a central meeting place or hall where all the native Christians of the district could be gathered together. This has been agreed to, and if any of my nephews and nieces would like to have a share in the building I shall be glad to receive their contributions and to send them to the proper quarter.

I give you below an extract from Mr. Saunders' book—A God of Deliverances (1s. Morgan & Scott)—containing a fuller account of the sufferings and death of the dear children.

"What caused us more pain than all our hardships was to see the children's sufferings. When we had started upon this long and weary journey they had been well and hearty, and we can well remember the merry way our little Isabel, during the early stages of our journey, had called out for mien mien (dough strips) when we reached the inns. But the merry laugh had gone, and appetite had failed. She could digest nothing we could now give her. For a time she took raw eggs beaten up in a little hot water, but she soon turned against this. She, called so early to her fellowship in suffering with the Great Shepherd of the sheep, was very patient under her heavy load of trials. She would quietly sip a little water, and then, when her mother folded a piece of rag (used during the day to cover her head), and said, 'Now, darling, come and lie down,' she would lay her weary head upon this poor pillow and go to sleep.

"On July 26 we were lodged in a filthy prison where men were smoking opium nearly the whole night. Repeatedly baby would ask for milk, but we could only give her water. We were thankful to have that. When the water was finished, she became unconscious, and in the morning Miss Guthrie called me, and, bursting into tears, she told me baby would not live till night. Ah! how we longed for quiet and rest to nurse our little darling, but we were ruthlessly told we must go on.

"Was it possible? Must we mount those springless carts with a dying baby, to be rumbled mercilessly throughout a blazing July day? Mrs. Saunders, though hardly able to sit up, insisted on nursing her child. The little one never regained consciousness again, except when the cart was jolted more than usual in being pulled off a ferry-boat outside the city of Yen-ch'eng, when she called 'Mama.'

"At noon we stopped at a little road-side inn for dinner. While there we thought she was passing away, and with tears in our eyes we said, 'The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away,' and Miss Guthrie prayed, 'Lord, give us grace to say Blessed be the Name of the Lord,' and by his grace we are enabled to say so from our hearts. Our darling was still breathing when the order came to mount our carts and start. We pleaded that we might be allowed to wait until the little one had breathed her last, but our escort would not yield. We pointed to the dying child, hoping its piteous condition might touch their hard hearts, but all in vain. Broken-hearted, and with spirits bowed down with grief, we mounted once again those springless carts, knowing that our dying child, in whom was centred all our love and pity, must still endure the terrible jolting of the road. Could anguish be more keen?

"Miss Guthrie kindly came into our cart, and as she was better able to sit up than Mrs. Saunders, she nursed the little one. Our eyes were never off our precious darling during the whole afternoon. About three miles from our stopping-place, at Si-ping, the carters stopped to drink tea. In the other cart little Edith Cooper was singing, 'Suffer little children to come unto Me,' and during that brief song our sweet pet heard the call from the Saviour Himself, and her weary spirit sped its flight to realms of endless day. On the evening of July 27, just as the sun was sinking, the little body was laid to rest 'till He come.'"

The Old Life and the New.

A LITTLE girl had a great desire to join the church; consequently she went to the minister, asking to be received into the church. He inquired if she had experienced a change of heart, and she answered, "Yes." The minister inquired further, "Were you a sinner before?" "Yes." "Are you a sinner now?" Again she answered, "Yes." "Where, then, is the difference between your former and your present condition?" After some moments' meditation she said, "Before I was converted to Christ I was a sinner that runs after sin; now I am a sinner that runs away from sin."—Mission Friend.

Birds of Passage.

The little birds trust God, for they go singing
From northern woods where autumn winds have blown,
With joyous faith their trackless pathway winging,
To summer lands of song, afar, unknown.

And if He cares for them through wintry weather,
And will not disappoint one little bird,
Will He not be as true a heavenly Father
To every soul that trusts his holy Word?

Let us go singing, then, and not go sighing,
Since we are sure our times are in his hand.
Why should we weep and fear, and call it dying?
'Tis only flitting to a summer land.

The Joys of Service (Acts viii. 1-8).

WHAT a contrast between these two paragraphs! The one of destruction (1-3), the other of construction (4-8); that the work of the devil, this of God. Anyone may destroy. It needs no genius. A madman may fire a cathedral which it has taken many long years to build; a street boy may throw a stone which will break a costly and beautiful painted window; a fool may ask a damaging question which will task many wise men to answer. To construct is the work of the Holy Spirit, who is always guiding the redemptive and reparative processes of the Divine heart. If Saul wastes the church, Philip is inspired to rebuild and extend it. Indeed, such is the wisdom and skill of God that He makes the wrath of man to praise Him, while He restrains the remainder, and thus the malignity of the persecutor only scatters the glowing embers further afield.

When Stephen, the foremost of the deacons, has fallen, Philip, the next, takes his place (v. 5). His soul was filled with the Messianic glory of the Saviour. He went down to Samaria, and proclaimed the Christ. The earliest preachers emphasized the Resurrection, and showed how the risen glory of Jesus fulfilled the dreams and prophecies of all the Old Testament saints. "God hath made Him both Lord and Christ, this Jesus whom ye crucified" (ii. 36). It is not enough to preach doctrine, you must proclaim a person; and let that person be He who liveth, and was dead, and who, behold, is alive for evermore.

The Samaritans had been led to expect the Advent of the Christ. In her conversation with the Master, the woman at Sychar had expressly said, "I know that Messiah cometh, which is called the Christ." And again, "Is not this the Christ?" (John iv. 25, 29). A work of preparation had evidently been on foot among them; and Philip was but another link in the Divinely-ordered chain of events. It is blessed beyond description to see God's work in preparing the soil for the seed, and then sending the sower (John iv. 36).

It is interesting, also, to compare these golden days with another episode in the history of our Lord's life. Not far from this spot James and John had suggested that fire should be called from heaven to consume some villagers who had shown themselves hostile to their Master. They had not known his gentle spirit, which took its vengeance not by the fire of destruction, but by that of the Holy Spirit (Luke ix. 54, 55; compare vv 14, 15).

What joy comes to a city when Christ is preached! Then unclean demons go forth, against their will ("crying with a loud voice"), while the palsied and lame are healed. It is a happy thing to be the instrument of such blessing; and it is also happy for those who are blessed. Satan has sought to impress men with the idea that Christianity is a thing of gloom, whereas it is joyous and joy-making. I have been much moved by the music of some countries which I have visited, especially of the coloured people of the Southern States, of the natives of India, and of other subject races in Europe—the minor chords are always so pathetic and sad. How different to the joyful songs and liberty which burst from the throats of the free and imperial races! Similarly, the heart that is oppressed by Satan and sin groans and cries out in its misery; whereas those who know Christ as their Victor Emmanuel, Emancipator, rejoice with exceeding great joy. "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy" . . . Let each of us do our best to bring joy into the circle in which we live. F. B. M.

C.E. NOTES.

The Japanese C.E. organ is entitled "The Endeavour," and is printed partly in Japanese and partly in English. The January issue opens with the declaration: "We have no better inheritance from the old century than Christian Endeavour. We can assume the duties of the new century in no more promising manner than by carrying the true spirit of Christian Endeavour with us into every act, or than by holding constantly before us the high motto of our organization."

* * *

Rev. Robert E. Speer, secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, U.S.A., reports that there are 5,603 young people's Christian Endeavour societies (216 Intermediate, and 3,353 Junior) connected with the Presbyterian Church. Of this number 2,561 contributed to foreign missions in the past year. Of the 3,569 Intermediate and Junior societies, 636 contributed. The total amount given by all the societies was 46,625dols. Nearly the whole of this amount goes directly to the support of missionaries. Eighty missionaries are supported in this way, and are at work in Japan, Korea, China, Siam, Laos, India, Persia, Syria, Africa, the Philippines, Mexico, Chili, Brazil, and Columbia.

International S.S. Lesson.

Sunday, March 9, 1902.

Subject—"The Disciples Scattered" (Acts viii. 3-17).
Golden Text—Acts viii. 4.

IN to-day's lesson note: (I). The effects of the "great persecution" which ensued on the death of Stephen; (II.) The results of the Gospel of Christ preached by Philip in Samaria; (III.) The characters of three noted men—Philip, the evangelist; Saul, the persecutor; and Simon, the sorcerer.

I. Persecution scatters the seed and the sowers. "Marching orders" (Matt. x. 23), Samaria (Acts viii. 5, 25), Antioch (xi. 19, 20), Ethiopia (viii. 27, 29), new churches formed (viii. 14, 17, 25). Believers added to the Lord; Saul secured (ix. 4-16).

Persecution drives the true believer nearer to God, so that faith takes firmer hold, just as the wind and storm cause the roots of the cedar to grow more deeply into the soil. "Rooted" (Eph. iii. 17, 18; Col. i. 23). "Who" (Rom. xi. 34-36). "Endureth" (James i. 12). God's cause prospers not only in spite of, but by means of, man's opposition. Satan rouses missionaries when he tries to make martyrs.

Samaria (vv. 5 to 16).

Without doubt Philip, Stephen's colleague, was guided to Samaria by Divine wisdom; not to hide himself or worship God more safely, but to preach Christ. He found the Samaritans ignorant, superstitious, and deluded, in affliction and possessed, but eager to listen. Philip went to Samaria—(a) in direct line of obedience (Acts i. 8); (b) among a people prepared to receive and expecting a Messiah; Sychar (John iv. 5, 39-42); (c) to the safest place from Saul and his colleagues, owing to the invincible antipathy between Jews and Samaritans (Matt. x. 16).

II. Results of Philip's "preaching Christ" in Samaria. (a) The people, "with one accord," "gave heed"; "believed and were baptized, both men and women." (b) The sick and possessed were healed, superstition dispelled (v. 12), its agents exposed. (c) The city filled with joy.

Later, Peter and John were sent from Jerusalem for the "laying on of hands" and the gift of the Holy Ghost (vv. 14-18).

III. Philip, the servant of Christ; Saul, the open enemy; Simon, the false friend. All three were men of power and influence, with set aims, but their motives and aims vastly different.

Philip. A faithful witness for Christ, and a valiant standard-bearer for God. Into his heart had shined "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (2 Cor. iv. 6, 7), and "the power" he possessed was "of God." The gift of the Holy Ghost. The "earthen vessel" was a willing instrument for the service of God.

Saul ("making havoc"). "Like a wild boar in a vineyard." With great mental and physical powers, courage, and zeal (almost to madness), but blind and dark (1 Tim. i. 13). "The light" had not shined (2 Cor. iv. 6, 7). Willing tool in the hands of the enemies of the Cross of Christ (Acts ix. 13-21; xxii. 4; xxvi. 10, 11).

Both were men of strong faith—Philip, in the Son of God; Saul, in the traditions of his Church. He had to be brought face to face with the Saviour, for "no man" (John xiv. 16, with Matt. xi. 27).

Simon, a man of energy and ambition, but all for self. In business deceitful (vv. 9, 11), in religion unreal, in profession of faith, in desire for spiritual gifts. Self could be written in capital letters over all his life, and even over his faith (Jer. xlviii. 10).

What was there lacking in Simon's faith? (v. 13). Repentance towards God. He did believe, doubtless, that Jesus came as the Saviour of the world, and that He gave his disciples wonderful powers. But he did not believe in Christ unto righteousness (Rom. x. 10), or Peter would not have said vv. 21 and 22.

Compare and contrast the three men, and ask where each man's faith landed him. You may trust to your watch to catch a train; but if your watch is wrong, however strong your faith is in it, you will miss the train.

Lessons.—To whatever place the Lord sends you, ask Him if He has a message for you to deliver for Him in that place. (The little Samaritan maid, 2 Kings v. 3.)

Religious teaching can instruct the mind, but cannot change the heart. The Spirit of God only can do that, and lead the soul to Christ for salvation.

Literature for South African Blockhouses.—May I explain that the War Office grants us permission to send monthly a box of books direct to our Camp Soldiers' Homes? The address, "Mr. Palmer (Transvaal), care of Misses Perks, Soldiers' Homes, Winchester," is correct for this month (February) only. I shall gladly send further information to those who may desire it.—(Mrs.) M. S. Osborn Howe, Weldeck House, Charles Road, St. Leonards-on-Sea.

Settlers in the Klondike.

THE name of Bishop Bompas, of Selkirk, is a household word in all Evangelical circles. As is well known, the heroic missionary veteran has only once returned to civilized regions since he went out to the frozen North West Territory of Canada, and that single occasion was twenty-seven years ago, when he was consecrated Bishop. Since then he has laboured without intermission among the Red Indians, facing constant privations for the work's sake.

During the last few years he has been confronted with the problem of providing for spiritual ministrations among the 20,000 white people who have invaded the Klondike in search of gold. The Colonial and Continental Church Society has aided his efforts, in addition to which his family and friends have generously subscribed to the work, and some other subscriptions have been given. The latter source of income has now failed, and the Bishop writes to us that the mission amongst the miners is threatened with "disaster and ruin," instead of being extended, as it needs. He has already a deficit of some hundreds of pounds to face.

The Society feels that the Christian public need only to know the facts, and they will come to the rescue of the noble-hearted and now aged Bishop, whose very devotion to his work has precluded him from the ordinary means of raising money in England. The committee have voted a special additional grant of £50, and appeal for generous aid.

The Study of the Bible.

SIR,—A theological professor, deservedly held in high esteem for his personal character and his generally sound and wholesome teaching, is reported to have said in a recent address on The Study of the Bible:—

"We must not read the Bible superstitiously. The Bible is not infallible. It is inspired in its general spirit, in its central Gospel, but not in the details of its letter. The New Testament writers, for instance, all expected that our Lord would return to earth in their own day."

First, let me ask, how is an ordinary and uncritical reader to distinguish between the inspiration of the Bible "in its general spirit, its central Gospel," and its non-inspiration "in the details of its letter?" Who could confidently sit down to a dish of food, partly wholesome, partly unwholesome, both kinds being mixed together, without any sign to distinguish the one from the other?

The instance given in illustration of this view is incorrect as to fact, and would be inapposite if it were correct.

From John xxi. 18, 19 we learn that the Lord Jesus, after his resurrection, signified to Peter by what death that Apostle should glorify God. And while the saying went abroad that John should not die, but tarry till Jesus should come, the evangelist was careful to show that this saying was without foundation (21-23).

In his Second Epistle Peter speaks of putting off this tabernacle, as the Lord Jesus Christ had shown him, and he endeavoured that after his decease (lit. exodus) those to whom he wrote might have his warnings and counsels in remembrance.

It is, therefore, evident that not only Peter, but his fellow-apostles, and not only they, but all who read his Second Epistle, did not expect that the Lord would return to earth in Peter's own day.

The Apostle Paul prophesied of departure from the faith in the latter times; and of perilous times in the last days. Peter also foretold that scoffers should come in the last days. These prophecies surely required for their fulfilment more than one lifetime before the Lord's return. Paul also wrote to his beloved Timothy, "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand." Therefore he, and Timothy, and all who read those Epistles, knew that these were "latter times" and "last days" which Paul did not expect to live to see; and still less did he expect that the Lord would return to earth in his own day.

But even if the New Testament writers had "expected that the Lord would return to earth in their own day," that would not suggest, much less prove, the non-inspiration of their writings, for no one contends that they were themselves personally infallible.
—Yours in the love of the truth,

W. Mason,

The Christian Temperance Campaign.

DUBLIN, ST. ALBANS, AND MILDMAY.

ADDITIONAL testimonies to the far-reaching effects of Rev. Dr. J. Q. A. Henry's recent mission in Dublin is borne by letters received from Mr. H. B. Dawson, who writes: "Dr. Henry's mission was a decided success. The pledges taken amount to nearly 1,500, and they are still dropping in, but this represents, to my mind, the lesser part of the work done by Dr. Henry. The main value lay in the way in which he stirred up the churches to deeper earnestness in the temperance cause. The unity of the churches was remarkable and encouraging. . . . The impression made upon the Christian community has been profound. Numbers are now taking a stand for total abstinence work who have hitherto held aloof. Many will follow Dr. Henry with their prayers. God be praised for his coming to do this great service."

One of the gratifying fruits of a mission by Dr. Henry, in city or town, is the manifest promotion of Christian union, attending preparation for and prosecution of the campaign. For instance, Mr. W. H. Brown, secretary of the local committee for the three-days' mission held last week in connection with the St. Albans Temperance Union, says that the organizers of what has proved to be a most successful effort are immensely indebted to the people for ready help by way of finance and personal labour. Ministers and members of all the Churches have put their hands to the work with hearty goodwill, and have reaped a rich reward by seeing temperance gatherings in St. Albans which, for numbers and enthusiasm, have never been surpassed.

The Campaign opened on Tuesday week with a meeting at 5.30; and it was an inspiring sight to find the Drill Hall filled by some 2,000 children representing the schools and Bands of Hope. After the Chairman, Rev. G. H. P. Glossop, had heartily wished the missioner and his helpers God-speed, Dr. Henry gave a powerful address. The children's interest and delight found spontaneous expression.

REPRESSION AND SUPPRESSION.

An eager and expectant throng besieged the hall at 8 p.m., Rev. the Hon. Robert Grimston, who presided, warmly welcoming the speaker and the Jubilee Singers. In stirring and outspoken fashion Dr. Henry showed that the time has come when Christian people must do more for the repression and suppression of evils connected with drink, which threaten the very existence of the Church of God. Seeing that the public-house has outrun the Church, temperance reform should find an advocate in every pulpit. The churches are the best organizations to build up a healthy local public sentiment, out of which will come legislation to lessen temptation, and the proper enforcement of existing law.

Another great meeting was gathered on the Wednesday afternoon. The chairman, Councillor W. S. Green, said one could not listen to the songs of the Jubilee Singers without feeling stirred to earnest determination to do more for the lifting of the frightful burdens from drink's victims. The possibilities of consecrated womanhood for the furtherance of the temperance reform, for encouragement of the wavering and overborne, and for deliverance of the people from the power of evil were graphically illustrated by Dr. Henry as he recounted the story of Deborah's victory over Sisera.

In the evening, Rev. C. M. Hardy, speaking from the chair, said the drink must be destroyed, while those engaged in the traffic must be restored to purity and integrity. With undiminished vigour, and a force of reasoning which must have carried conviction to the most indifferent, Dr. Henry showed that expert testimony and the logic of current events in all parts of the world are against the use of alcohol.

The address on Thursday afternoon, when Rev. H. B. Worthington, presided, was a soul-stirring exposure of varied complicity with evil-doing in connection with the drink traffic. The speaker gave a faithful warning against the holding of brewery shares.

Dr. Henry's well-earned reputation in St. Albans secured a full Drill Hall, and much enthusiasm for his farewell on Thursday night. The optimistic and cheering speech of Councillor A. Faulkner, as chairman, indicated the affectionate esteem which speaker and singers gain wherever they go. Dr. Henry presented overwhelming arguments in favour of total abstinence, while reviewing the comparative status of temperance work in the United States and Great Britain. The result of the mission in new pledges is—adults, 260; children, 1,300.

Of the St. Albans meetings an esteemed correspondent writes in the course of an enthusiastic letter:—"We all feel that the temperance cause in this historic city has had a great upward lift through the visit of Dr. Henry and the Fisk Jubilee Singers. For the children's gathering the various schools were marshalled and came in procession to the hall, and we had a glorious meeting. I have rarely seen a finer sight. As a result we got 1,300 pledges, the back of the admission ticket having a pledge printed upon it. We are following them all up, and hope to get a large proportion allied to the various Bands of Hope."

MILDMAY CONFERENCE HALL.

It was like a home-coming for Dr. Henry to be at Mildmay Conference Hall once more last week. He had gained such a hold upon the hearts of the people during his visit at the end of September, and Christian friends know so well the eminently useful character of his special work, that a warm welcome was assured for him and the Jubilee Singers as they stepped upon the platform on Friday night. There was a good attendance, and interest was very marked. Colonel Morton voiced a general welcome, and closed with earnest words, inviting prayerful and active co-operation in the present effort.

In the course of a comprehensive review of the position and strength of the enemy which the godly temperance reformer has to fight, Dr. Henry said that, from a merely human point of view, the struggle would appear to be a hopeless one; but our trust is in God, and to him that believeth all things are possible. The tyranny of an abnormal and acquired appetite, having its roots in sensual self-indulgence, was vividly contrasted with the liberty and blessedness of the law of self-sacrifice in the interests of truth, righteousness, manhood and brotherhood. Some startling facts were advanced as to the extent to which the people, including many men identified with the ministry of our churches, have, by investment, become identified with the liquor business. The power of social custom, the pitiable condition of the poorer classes of society, indiscriminate medical prescriptions, and governmental protection, were other difficulties mentioned. The inspiration of our confidence and enthusiasm is in the fact that God is against the drink.

The mission was continued on Saturday night. Dr. Henry's address, founded upon Ezek. vii. 23, dealt with the importance of redeeming our cities from evil, and with the close relation of drink to every vice and crime in these great centres.

Sabbath was the closing day of the brief mission at Mildmay; and the good audiences that were gathered listened to discourses manifestly accompanied by a full measure of spiritual power. A beautiful setting of "Art thou weary?" sung by the Jubilee Singers, was in itself a full Gospel message. In the afternoon, Dr. Henry treated the story of Hadad (1 Kings xi. 22) as an illustration of discontent with evil wrought in the heart of man by the Holy Spirit. In the evening he delivered a solemn and impressive message drawn from the higher and lower aspects of Ahithophel's character, as revealed in 2 Sam. xvii. 23, with a strong application at the close touching the claims of total abstinence.

FUTURE MEETINGS.

Ipswich, Feb. 28-March 2; Watford, March 4-6; Macclesfield, April 1-3; Redhill, April 4-6.

Welsh Notes.

A FEW weeks ago the Pembrokeshire Calvinistic Methodist monthly meeting passed a resolution in favour of the adoption of unfermented wine for Communion purposes, and the Pembrokeshire Baptists have now taken a similar course.

The first Nonconformist orphanage in Wales—indeed, if we mistake not, the first Protestant institution of the kind in the Principality—has just been opened at Pontnewydd, Carnarvonshire. The governors are now advertizing for applications for admission. No mention is made in their advertisement of any limitation of the benefits of the institution to children of particular creed.

The annual meetings of the North Wales Free Church Council are to be held this year on April 28 and 29 at Flint. The Conference sermon will be preached by Rev. Hugh Jones, chairman of the Welsh Wesleyan Synod. Mrs. Benham, organizing secretary of the Girls Guild, and Rev. Dr. Monro Gibson are amongst the special speakers expected. Two papers are to be read by North Wales ministers on "The Sunday School."

The Congregationalists of Merionethshire at their last quarterly meetings passed a resolution in which they declared that "the practice of raising money for religious purposes by means of a 'prize drawing' is contrary to the spirit of the teaching of the New Testament, injurious to public morals, a violation of the traditions of the denomination, and tends to foster the spirit of gambling which is on the increase in our country; and for the same reason condemns also the practice of 'raffling' in bazaars."

An item of considerable interest and encouragement to Temperance workers occurs in the annual report of the Denbighshire Good Templars' District Lodge. Acting upon instructions, the secretary had forwarded to the tradesmen in the district holding grocers' licences an earnest appeal that they would give up the sale of drink as soon as practicable. The appeal was entirely successful, and the two firms have expressed their determination to give up the licences at once.

The founder of the Young People's Christian Union of Wales has just issued an earnest appeal for increased support for the organization of which he is also secretary. One of the chief objects is the federation of all young people's societies. The writer urges also the holding of meetings for the furtherance of the leading principles of the Young People's Christian Union, viz. (1) to counteract the indifference of the age with regard to the regular use of God's Word as the rule and standard of conduct; (2) to draw attention to, and to urge the perusal of, healthy literature; (3) to teach the principles of Nonconformity.

One of the finest mission halls in North Wales was opened at Wrexham on Friday, February 14, under the auspices of the Welsh Forward Movement. The new hall was originally the home of the British School, but has been altered and fitted for its new purposes at a cost of £4,000. The work of the Movement in Wrexham since its commencement in 1898 has been attended with a large measure of success; and, under the more favourable conditions now secured, it is hoped that its success will abound more and more.

Barbican Mission to the Jews.—Rev. Prebendary Webb-Peploe writes to the effect that a sum of £700 is needed for the general fund of the mission. "The work has greatly increased during the year, thus necessitating increased expenditure. We have not a penny of reserve fund, and unless our friends rally to our support, it will inevitably lead to a curtailment of the work.

Release of Miss Stone.—This lady and her companion, Madame Trilka, have at length been released at Strumnitza. It is now nearly six months since the telegram from Constantinople announced their capture, and all that time Miss Stone has been cut off from her friends and the world more completely than in a siege. How and when the enormous ransom was paid remains a secret.

Assistance for Ladies in Reduced Circumstances.—The Annual Report of the Society for the Assistance of Ladies in Reduced Circumstances is a statement that will awaken in many hearts feelings of sympathy for their less fortunate sisters. The Society aims at helping poor ladies who find it difficult to provide for their daily needs, and impossible to save anything towards the future, and many of the cases are a revelation pitiable in the extreme. One has been a teacher for thirty years, but now, owing to failing sight and health, is almost penniless. A governess for thirty-seven years, whose husband died early, finds herself at the age of sixty-six without means, and unable to earn anything. Another, in delicate health, is entirely dependent on what she can earn by marking handkerchiefs. The kindness of friends interested in the Society will be acknowledged by Miss Smallwood, The Lees, Great Malvern, who will also be glad to forward copies of the annual report.

Obituary.

MAJOR H. M. CONRAN, IXWORTH.

THE call to his eternal rest came to Major H. M. Conran, when seated by the fire in his study, on Lord's Day, February 23. Having been born in 1813, at Hopton, Suffolk, he had lived a long and useful Christian life. The last words which were heard from his lips—"May the glory of the Lord cover the whole earth"—were characteristic of the spirit which permeated his whole career. Of his missionary labours and interests at home and abroad we hope to give some account in an early issue, accompanied by a portrait.

REV. H. WOODHOUSE DEARDEN.

By the death of Rev. Henry Woodhouse Dearden, which took place on Monday last at Cambridge, in his seventy-third year, the evangelical party loses one who has done it good service both as a parish clergyman and with his pen. In 1861 Archbishop Sumner nominated him to the vicarge of St. Paul's, Maidstone, which he occupied till 1877, when he accepted from evangelical trustees the important and onerous charge of St. John's, Upper Holloway. His last cure was that of Southborough, Kent, which is also in the gift of an Evangelical trust, and which, owing to failing health, he held only from 1887 to 1893. He then retired from active pastoral work, save that in recent years he assisted as curate of St. Sepulchre's, the "Round Church," in Cambridge. In 1896 he published what in Evangelical circles has been regarded as a most useful handbook, entitled "Church Teaching." He was also the author of "Modern Romanism."

MR. W. W. PAGE, MOORCOTT, OXON.

On the 15th of the month, Mr. W. W. Page, of Moorcott, Oxon., entered into rest in the eighty-seventh year of his age. During a long life he had been a devoted and earnest worker in the cause of Christ. While following his business in the Civil Service he was ever ready as a preacher of the Gospel, and a teacher of the young in the Sunday-school. He became a member of Church Street Baptist Church, Blackfriars, S.E., under the pastoral care of Rev. J. Upton. For some time he was president of the young men's class at Maze Pond, when the venerable J. Aldis was pastor; and later became an elder at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, and a member of the committee of the Baptish Irish Mission. Much of his life was spent in the country and in several villages of Kent he sustained continuous service, as well as in Oxfordshire and Buckinghamshire. After a very active career he retired to the small hamlet of Moorcott, where he exerted great influence for good. Though better and more widely known to a former generation, he will be greatly missed in the locality.

REV. GEORGE C. NEEDHAM.

Many readers will learn with regret of the death of Rev. George Carter Needham, who passed away suddenly on February 16 at his home in Narberth, a suburb of Philadelphia. He had just returned from an evangelistic tour in Tennessee, and was expecting to visit Chicago at an early date.

Mr. Needham was born in Ireland fifty-six years ago. At the age of twenty he gave up a promising business career to become an evangelist. He preached in different parts of Great Britain till 1868, when he proceeded to Boston, bearing letters of introduction from Mr. Spurgeon. He formed a warm friendship with Mr. Moody, with whom and Mr. Sankey he frequently co-operated. He spent two years in Chicago doing pastoral work in connection with Mr. Moody's work in that city. Mr. Needham had preached in the most prominent cities of eighteen States, his labours being conspicuously fruitful in Portland, Me., Indianapolis, Providence, R.I., Richmond, Va., as well as in Halifax, Nova Scotia, and many Canadian cities. The greater part of his time was spent in evangelistic tours. His home was a rendezvous for tired evangelists, overworked preachers, and returned missionaries. Mr. Needham was the writer of a number of books, some of which have attained large circulation.

ROGER MARTIN.

MRS. DR. LEE.

It is with great sorrow that I inform you that our Heavenly Father has called home our dear friend, Mrs. Dr. Lee. She was the daughter of the distinguished missionary, Dr. Cyrus Hamlin, and it was through her untiring efforts that he was led to write part of his missionary experiences in Turkey. Some twelve years ago she became the wife of a missionary, Dr. Lucas O. Lee, and came to live in Marash, where her life has been spent in unwearying service for the Armenian people.

She began the orphan work here, which has been, and is being, blessed to so many. Everywhere she went she sought out the sick, the poor, and needy, and it was her joy to bring relief. Of late her efforts were directed to promoting a deeper spiritual life among the members of the churches, and some of her last conversations with the native preachers and with many of the leading women will long be remembered.

The orphans feel that they have lost their dearest earthly friend, because they know how earnestly she ever sought their highest good. At the same time, we are confident that her labour of love is not ended; the gracious seeds of truth which she was so constantly sowing have fallen into the prepared soil of many hearts. Join with us in prayer that fruit may be seen in many consecrating themselves to work for Christ. I would commend to your prayers also the sorrowing husband, and the dear and only child.

Marash. AGNES C. SALMOND.

The Late Hon. John Waldegrave.

MANY friends of the late Hon. John Waldegrave (whose early death occurred in South Africa a few months ago) will be interested to know that a movement is on foot to establish a Soldiers' Home as a memorial to him in the Transvaal. It may be remembered that Mr. Waldegrave volunteered as a trooper in the Imperial Yeomanry, and after a year's active service, during which he bore much unaccustomed hardship, with courage and cheerfulness he died of dysentery at Lichtenburg.

The chief feature of the home will be a comfortably furnished reading-room of a cheerful and homelike character, where the men could find opportunity for reading and recreation, and where they would be sure of a hearty welcome. There would be a separate room where Bible classes would be held, and a bar for the supply of refreshments and non-alcoholic drinks.

Mr. Alister Fraser, Williams Deacon's Bank, Limited, 20, Birchin Lane, E.C., is the treasurer of the undertaking.

A Wise Enactment.—A Bill has just been passed by the Manx House of Keys dealing with the evil of juvenile smoking. It prohibits the smoking of tobacco by young people under fourteen years of age, and the sale to them of cigarettes. There can be no doubt as to the wisdow of this legislation, and it would be to the advantage of the rising generation if the British Parliament enacted a similar restrictive measure.

Japanese Sailors.—At the approaching coronation of King Edward, three Japanese cruisers will be at anchor in British waters. They will bring about a thousand men to take part in the coronation ceremony. Miss McLean hopes to be ready to meet this company, as she has met so many during recent years in connection with her mission work—a work which has been so blessed that pastors from "the Land of the Rising Sun" have testified that the books given and the words spoken are at length "beginning to tell" in the navy of Japan. Friends are asked to prepare without delay at least a thousand book-bags of the familiar size and shape; also to supply the needful Japanese New Testaments and other Gospel literature. Parcels may be sent to Miss McLean, Japanese Christian Institute, Tilbury Dock, Essex.

University Notes.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.]

CAMBRIDGE.

TEMPERANCE work has been very much to the fore in Cambridge lately. The Cambridge United Temperance Council held a great rally on Sunday, February 9, when Mrs. Barney, of New Jersey, U.S., gave an address in the afternoon to children on "Snares and Traps," and in the evening to workers and friends of temperance on "Work That Tells." The chair was taken in the evening by Professor G. Sims Woodhead (President of the C.U.T.C.).

On the Tuesday following, the local branch of the National British Women's T.A. held its annual meeting, when Mrs. Barney and Miss Peckover were the chief speakers. Last Saturday the Archbishop of Canterbury visited Cambridge to speak on behalf of the National Temperance League. In the afternoon he addressed a large meeting of students in the Debating Hall of the University Union Society.

OXFORD.

THE Annual Report of the Oxford Y.M.C.A. has just been issued, and states that the year 1901 will be held memorable on account of the great national conference held in our midst. Delegates were present from all parts of the world. With devout thankfulness to God they record the great blessing which attended the Conference throughout. The report concludes with the following words:—"The coming missions in Oxford fill us with great expectation of earnest work being zealously carried out in our midst. And now having occupied the new building of the Association for ten years, we feel the future is bright with promise of continued blessing on this effort for the extension of Christ's Kingdom among young men.

An important discussion on the employment of children out of school hours took place at the Christian Social Union on Tuesday night. Some important and interesting facts were elucidated. Referring to the Factory Acts, Rev. C. J. Fletcher, who opened the discussion, said that frequently when an evil had been driven out by the door it returned by the window. The minimum age for factory children had been raised, and their hours of work restricted. Education, too, was compulsory, but parents spoilt all by employing their children out of school hours, and the result was that instead of pale and wasted factory children, we now have children in school dull and sleepy from overwork.

Scottish Notes.

THE usual half-yearly meetings of Christians have been arranged to be held in Glasgow, March 29-April 1. While much of the time available will be devoted to the ministry of the Word, full opportunity will also be afforded for reports on the Lord's work at home and abroad.

The Scottish "Monthly Visitor" Tract Society issued during the past year 5,137,790 copies, being an increase of 53,362 over 1900. In Edinburgh the circulation had been 59,912 monthly, an increase of 1,452. At the sixty-ninth annual meeting, held a few days ago, Rev. R. S. Calderwood (Tolbooth Parish) regarded the increasing success of the Society as an evidence that the old prejudice against tract distribution had largely disappeared. He spoke highly of the usefulness of the "Visitor" in his own experience in a country district, and also gave illustrations of good attending its distribution in the city.

The trustees of the Duff Missionary Lectureship—which was founded to commemorate the late Rev. Dr. Duff—in 1899 appointed Rev. Dr. Stewart of Lovedale as Lecturer for the quadriennium 1899-1903. Owing to the war in South Africa the delivery of the lectures has been delayed, but Dr. Stewart, who has now returned to this country, proposes to give the first of the series in Edinburgh on Wednesday, February 26, and in Glasgow on Sunday, March 2. The subject is understood to be "Africa and African Missions," and is to be treated from a broad and undenominational standpoint. The Freemasons' Hall in Edinburgh and the Berkeley Hall, Glasgow, have been engaged for these lectures.

At the recent annual business meeting of the Glasgow United Evangelistic Association deep gratitude was expressed for the success attending two series of special exhibition services conducted by Rev. John McNeill and Mr. William M. Oatts. The total income for 1891 had been £23,744 11s. 9d., and the expenditure £21,915 6s. 6d. The children's committee announced the following figures:—Average attendance at Sabbath dinner, 1,912; helped in the day refuges, 698; fresh air fortnights given, 8,673; sent into the country for a day, 4,003; helped through the Inquiry Committee and otherwise, 950; taken the pledge at Tent Hall Band of Hope since 1888, 2,569. Weary workers given a period of rest, 262; mothers sent to the coast for a day, 2,090.

Evangelistic.

Mr. R. S. Bradbrook at Merton.

An eleven-days' mission has just been held by Mr. R. S. Bradbrook at the Hope Mission, Merton, and it has been a time of blessing and rejoicing, indeed, so interested were the people at the first night's meeting that it was prolonged considerably; at the close many came out on the Lord's side. A remarkable feature of the mission was the number of young people who decided for Christ at the Sunday afternoon services. The week-evening services were marked by deep earnestness, and many, we believe, were brought into the Light. E. E. S.

Littledean, Glos.

A fruitful mission has just been brought to a close at Littledean, Glos. In the summer of 1900 Messrs. Coates and Bentley, of the Ross Bible Carriage and Tent Mission, visited the village with their Gospel tent, and were used of God in winning souls for Christ. The success of this visit led them to hold a three-weeks' mission in the National Schoolroom in January, 1901, when there was again a good harvest of souls; and now they have conducted similar services in the same building for a whole month. As on previous occasions, there have been full meetings, and a splendid spirit of hearing has been manifest.

Wm. R. T. Cullis.

Mr. Chas. E. Barraclough at King's Lynn.

The second visit of Mr. C. E. Barraclough to our church from February 2 to 12 has been a season of rich blessing. His faithful preaching of the Gospel proved to be the power of God unto the salvation of many. Night by night the meetings increased in spiritual fervour and impressiveness. The children's meetings on Sunday afternoons were marked by evidences of Divine power, and a whole class of elder girls came out for blessing. One of the most pleasing features of the mission was the number who publicly testified to receiving Christ as their Saviour on the occasion of Mr. Barraclough's visit fifteen months ago. Despite the inclement weather, and the many "special events" taking place at the same time, the meetings were well attended. Altogether the mission has given spiritual stimulus and encouragement.

(Rev.) Charles Houghton, Union Church.

National Mission to Young People.

Services in connection with the National Mission to Young People were held for the Bethnal Green district, N.E., in the Congregational Church, Bethnal Green Road, February 28. Mr. Arthur E. Jennings was missioner; he commenced with a conference with about 150 officers, teachers, and other workers in Sunday schools. The meetings for children under the age of fourteen, which were held nightly from seven to eight, were well attended throughout the week, as also were the gatherings, at 8.30 p.m., for young people over fourteen. On several evenings, in addition to the addresses by Mr. Jennings, Madame Annie Ryall sang the Gospel message. Close attention was paid, and during the services about ninety young people signed the "decision card." Good results are following, by God's blessing, to the schools and to many a home in the district.

J. Austin Barrat, Hon. Secretary.

Mr. James Dixon at Coleraine.

A mission has been held recently in the Methodist Church, Coleraine, by Mr. James Dixon, of Belfast. This was the third visit of the evangelist to the town, and it was gratifying to see the joyful greeting accorded him by those converted under his earnest ministry. From the first Sunday the spacious church was crowded, many on several occasions having to be turned away. Mr. Dixon has an impressive way of conducting after meetings, and, judging from the responsive testimonies, many hearts, were moved to make the great surrender to the Lord Jesus Christ. Mr. Dixon's two lectures attracted and moved immense audiences. I write this grateful report of Mr. Dixon's mission with an overflowing heart, and with the hope that those of all churches labouring in congested populations may know what a capable and honoured keeper is available in this devoted fellow labourer.

Robt. Jamieson, Methodist Minister.

Wesleyan Church, Marple.

A fifteen days' mission has just been concluded in the Wesleyan Church, Marple. The meetings were conducted by Mr. Charles Noakes, of the Evangelization Society, who was assisted by Rev. W. A. Bird, resident minister.

The weather was severe, but the people came through the snow to the meetings, and large audiences gathered even on week nights. From the first there was evidence of the workings of the Holy Spirit. Many were led to the Lord Jesus Christ. The preaching of the evangelist was pointed and powerful. On the last day of the mission a meeting was held for converts, when Mr. Noakes addressed a large company. On a subsequent evening a thanksgiving meeting was held, addressed by Mr. Bird, when a large audience gathered. The mission has left a profound impression on the church and the town. C. W. B.

Mr. T. Swanston Smith at Wingrave, Bucks.

An eight-days' mission has been conducted by Mr. T. Swanston Smith, of the Evangelization Society, in the Congregational Union Church, Wingrave, Bucks.

The greatest interest was taken in the mission, and, notwithstanding the severe weather, there were large audiences, the number increasing as the mission proceeded.

The spirit of hearing and inquiry was manifestly present. The Lord's people were quickened and refreshed by the earnest and continued application of the Word of God delivered in the power of the Holy Ghost; while some, hitherto undecided, were led to accept the Lord Jesus Christ as their Saviour.

The hearty and persuasive Gospel preaching and unremitting labours of Mr. Smith were highly appreciated, both by the pastor and the deacons of the church.

J. Barton, Pastor.

The Boy Preacher.

The interest aroused in the vicinity of the West London Tabernacle by the mission of Mr. Jack Cooke has intensified during the past week, and large numbers of people have heard the fluent and forcible young preacher with profit.

On Sunday last the Tabernacle was crowded in the morning, and at night a remarkable scene was witnessed, when, after the building had been packed to the doors, some hundreds of persons were disappointed in their efforts to gain admission. The address dealt largely with infidel objections to Christianity, and was listened to with earnest attention.

Mr. Cooke and Rev. J. R. Coutts have devoted much time and care to the spiritual direction of inquirers, and the friends at the Tabernacle are much encouraged by the fruitful character of the mission and its effect upon the district. Mr. Cooke will conclude the services to-morrow (Friday), and after a brief rest is to undertake a mission at Dr. Barnardo's well-known hall, the Edinburgh Castle, Rhodeswell Road, Limehouse, E.

Mr. William Forbes closed, last week, two months of mission work among theatrical employees in the provinces.

A brief note from the Weaver Brothers, who are conducting a mission at Peterhead, says: "We are having great crowds and great blessing."

An eight days' mission has been conducted by Mr. Bob Johnson at the Congregational Church, Woodham Ferris, Essex. The missioner's bright singing and striking addresses rendered the services both attractive and impressive.

On Saturday, February 22, Mr. Leonard Weaver commenced a ten-days' mission at the Public Hall, Netherton, under the Dudley Free Church Council. The mission was preceded by a week of prayer. Mr. Weaver has also promised to conduct meetings in six of the local churches. Sunday evening the hall was crowded out, many being turned away, and at the close of the meeting several professed to accept the Lord Jesus Christ. G. R. W.

At Magdalen Road Mission Hall, Oxford, Mr. John B. Rochfort, of the Evangelization Society, concluded recently a fifteen days' mission. Believers have been wonderfully blessed and strengthened. Mr. Rochfort's plain, simple dealing with Gospel truths has attracted many. The congregations were large, the hall being filled each Sunday; while the Bible readings on week-days were also well attended. A number of the unconverted received blessing.

In connection with the National Mission to Young People services were held February 1-24 at Edmonton, N., in a number of chapels and halls. Mr. Montagu Goodman was at Tanner's End Mission, Mr. Herbert Stuart at Angel Road, while other devoted workers laboured at the Gospel Union Hall, Fore Street Schools, and the Congregational Church, Mr. A. E. Jennings and Madame Annie Ryall taking a leading part. The Mission was rich in blessing, and afforded much encouragement to the friends who had the organization of the effort in hand.

Rev. J. T. Vine has conducted a mission at Penge Tabernacle, February 9-16. Large congregations were present at all the services, and many inquirers were dealt with. One cheering feature of the week's work was the large number of Sunday-school scholars and Bible class members who gave themselves to Christ. Mr. Vine also conducted Bible readings on three afternoons, which were seasons of great refreshing. The friends at Penge have been much cheered by the mission.

Mrs. J. B. Horton has been conducting services in the town and neighbourhood of Blaenavon, first of all for the Primitive Methodist Churches, and then in connection with the National Mission to Young People. A large number of hearers were impressed. Rev. John Leach (Primitive Methodist), who forwards these particulars, adds: "The meetings for women only have been exceptionally refreshing, and the teaching on the higher Christian life have awakened deep concern among the churches for fulness of blessing."

Oxford Town Hall was crowded on the afternoon of Sunday week for the first of the mission services which Gipsy Smith has conducted under the auspices of the Oxford and District Free Church Council. The "Importance of Prayer" was Mr. Smith's subject, and he contended that the weak spot of Church life is its prayer-meeting. The services have been well attended during the week, and if the voice of Mr. Smith reaches none but the ears of the pastors and Church members, it must tell, under God, upon the life of Nonconformity in the city.

A representative gathering of workers and converts connected with the London Tent Campaign was held on Tuesday week at Kensington Park Hall, W. Mr. A. Garstin presided, and among others who took part were Mr. Leonard Weaver, Mr. G. R. Williams (secretary), Miss Grace Pettman, Mrs. Darlow Sarjeant, and a number of friends from various parts of London who take an active interest in the campaign. Mr. Weaver spoke upon "Preparations for Soul Winning," and the occasion was one of deep heart searching. The Stratford male choir and a specially constituted local choir sang the Gospel.

A united mission conducted recently at Chattanooga by Rev. G. C. Needham proved highly encouraging. A local paper, describing the final meeting in the large Auditorium, says: "There was not a vacant seat in the building, and large numbers stood in the aisles throughout the services. The audience was an exceptionally attentive one, and not a whisper disturbed the words of the speaker, as everyone was held intent upon the sermon. Mr. Needham impressed his words upon the mind of his audience with powerful and vividly pictured reminiscences of incidents that had occurred in his own experience. After the sermon large numbers came forward for the prayers and advice of the evangelist.

Evangelists' Engagements.

Requests for Prayer.

For a month's mission in Norfolk, commencing March 2, to be conducted by Mr. James J. Scroggie.

For services in the Railway Mission Hall, Wisbech, to be held during the last three weeks in March by Mr. F. Chapman, of the Evangelization Society.

About Books.

REV. F. B. MEYER'S "ABRAHAM."

ONE of the most useful purposes served by the careful study of Scripture biography is the dispelling of the common idea that the men whose victories and failures are narrated in Scripture enjoyed privileges and opportunities which are within the reach of only a select few. In Abraham: Or the Obedience of Faith—the most recent volume in the attractive reissue of Rev. F. B. Meyer's Scripture Biographies (2s. 6d. Morgan & Scott.)—the author has pourtrayed in graphic fashion the steps by which, "Out of materials which were by no means extraordinary, God built up a character with which He could hold fellowship as friend with friend; and a life which has exerted a profound influence on all after-time."

The deepest lesson to be learned from the experience of this, "the first great character that arrests our attention in the grey dawn of history," is summed up in the words—"Wherever faith is, it is the link with Omnipotence; the channel for the Divine communications; the wire along which the Fire of Heaven may travel. And as it is used according to the promptings of the Divine Spirit, and in obedience to his commands, it will grow. It grew in Abraham. It will grow in us." Yet it is clearly shown in incident after incident that the snares into which he fell were the results of failure of faith that God could or would keep his promises. The repeated presentation of Sarah as his sister, with intent to deceive, is confessed on the second occasion to have been a sin so long cherished that it had been planned thirty years before.

Though the Lord blessed Abraham, and made him great in the eyes of the surrounding nations, his path was one of cross-bearing and chastening planned by Divine love. Those who have only aspired to follow "the friend of God" afar off will be encouraged as they read to draw nigh; and will realize the fulness of the promises to which they become heirs when they are numbered among Abraham's spiritual seed. The book will be a valuable acquisition alike to plain men and women who love the Word of God in simplicity, and to preachers or teachers who desire guidance in the interpretation of the things of God to the unlearned.

ANNUAL VOLUMES.

As the organ of the Mildmay Mission to the Jews, the 1901 volume of Trusting and Toiling (2s. Marshall Bros.) brings the reader up to date with information anent Christian effort among God's ancient people. The bearing of Scripture truth on such work and workers is well brought out in numerous addresses and articles.

The volume of The Reaper shows it again to be "a magazine for the promotion of spiritual life, Scriptural doctrine, and consecrated service." Among much that is valuable a special value attaches to Rev. D. M. McIntyre's series of articles on "The Authority of Scripture." The children's page is well supplied with bright and well-chosen incident. (2s. 64, Bothwell Street, Glasgow.)

Regions Beyond, the organ of the various institutions which have Harley House, Bow, E., for their working headquarters, is a magazine of great practical interest. The annual volume, including last year's parts, is a budget of facts and arguments on foreign missions and the enforcement of their claims upon Christians in the homelands. There are many illustrations. The volume should be in all Sunday-school libraries, as its pages should prove of great service to young people in Bible classes and Christian Endeavour Societies in affording help towards the writing of papers on the evangelization of the world. (4s. Partridge.)

Ireland gives us two monthlies that should be widely read by all who would understand Roman Catholicism in living actuality; and the volumes containing last year's parts are a valuable budget of informing and readable matter. The Christian Irishman (Office: 16, Upper Sackville Street, Dublin) advocates the Protestantism of a Scriptural creed and a Christian life. Among its most useful contents we note a series of articles on "Developments of Roman Catholicism." The Catholic (Office: 51b, Dawson Street, Dublin) is edited by Rev. Thomas Connellan, and in its pages we find all that is interesting as regards the movements of Romish priests in the direction of Gospel light and personal liberty. Popish controversialists find their match in the editor and his helpers in testimony for Christ. (1s. 6d. each.)

The Little Heartsease Text Book gives a portion of Scripture for every day in the year, each page being tinted and ornamented with a floral design. (6d. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.)

Notes on the Epistle to the Hebrews. By A. O. Molesworth. (6d. Glasgow: Pickering & Inglis.) This is a paraphrase with notes. Much thought has been expended on the work, which is sure to prove of value to students of Holy Scripture.

Waymarks, a religious and literary journal in unity with the testimony of the early Quakers, is a deeply interesting monthly (2s. 6d. per annum, post free. J. E. Southall, 149, Dock Street, Newport, Mon.). The pages are designed to illustrate Christian experience, "whether by means of pieces written by those who have long since passed away, or by other productions composed in view of the peculiar conditions and dangers of the day in which we live."

Times of Retirement is a volume of Devotional Mediations by Dr. George Matheson. The readings are brief and suggestive; some of them very beautiful. The author is one from whom we expect visions and dreams, as well as exposition on independent lines. These pages are after his peculiar style, and singularly full of thought. The volume is enriched by a biographical sketch of Dr. Matheson from the pen of Rev. D. Macmillan. (3s. 6d. Nisbet.)

The mutual duties and responsibilities of parents and children, brothers and sisters, lovers, husbands and wives, masters and servants, ladies and gentlemen, friends and acquaintances, preachers and hearers, are presented in frank and helpful fashion by Rev. C. Sylvester Horne in Relationships of Life (3s. 6d. H. R. Allenson). The sermons were originally preached to the young men and women of the author's congregation, but have a message well worthy of a wider audience.

The few whose memories of Christian service go back to the middle of the nineteenth century will welcome the reminiscences which Mr. Gordon Forlong has recorded in London (spiritually) since 1850. What I Have Seen! The recalling of the great work accomplished by the seventh Earl of Shaftesbury, while still Lord Ashley, Rev. Capel Molyneux, and Charles H. Spurgeon as "the Boy Preacher," will bring encouragement also to those who are inclined to despond at lack of progress. (2d. Morgan & Scott.)

Among the attractive publications of Mr. Ernest Nister is Bible Stories, retold by L. L. Weedon, with an introduction by the Bishop of Ripon (6s. 6d.). The simple language will endear the book to youthful readers, while the numerous beautiful plates (some of them coloured) will make an additional appeal of no ordinary kind to their hearts. The juvenile library must be very well stored indeed to which this will not be a most welcome addition.

It is a long time since we read such a helpful little book as Suggestions on Prayer, by Lucy H. M. Soulsby. (1s. nett. Longmans.) The pages are intensely spiritual; they are also as practical as their theme is important. On the subject of "Rushing into prayer," the author writes: "Should we not do better if we fought the battle with wandering thoughts before we began to pray, and began by arriving, in some small degree, at that silent consciousness of the Divine Presence which, in itself, is worship?" We are confident that this little book has a message for many a soul that yearns to know more of God; and an indisposition to endorse every form of statement should not stand in the way of a cordial commendation of the pages to earnest Christian workers.

Papers on Life and Advent Truth, and other Bible themes. By William Laing. (5s. Edinburgh: The Darien Press, Bristo Place.) This is a memorial volume, with a portrait of the writer and a sketch of his remarkable life. Mr. Laing held distinctive views with firm consistency, but he was no sectarian. Occupied in business throughout the week, he was no less fully employed on recurring Lord's Days expounding the Scriptures, and for many years he was a prolific writer on the various themes that engaged his earnest thought. The title of the volume specifies two of these, in terms that are somewhat technical. "Life" means "life in Christ," or what are known as "Conditionalist" views; "Advent" means the doctrine of the Lord's personal return to earth to reign in righteousness. Among the other topics treated are: Salvation from Sin and its Consequences, Resurrection, Israel, Baptism; and nearly half the book (of over 500 large pages) is devoted to exhortations, expositions, and general papers, in which the controversial element is less pronounced. There are several telling chapters against the fallacies of Universalism. Whatever one may think of some of the views expressed, one cannot but think well of the good man whose memory is honoured by this very suggestive volume.

A special interest attaches at present to Newman Hall: An Autobiography. (6s. Cassell). Putting pen to paper on his eighty-first birthday, the author has given not only a narrative of his own growth in grace and Christian service, but at the same time many informing and interesting side-lights on the public and religious life of England in the nineteenth century. Among the landmarks of his career the stories of his conversion, of the gradual realization of a call to the ministry, and of several crises in his ministerial career, are vividly told. The persons whom Dr. Hall knew, included many of his greatest contemporaries; and in not a few cases, their brief appearances in these pages are instances of keen insight and skilful description. Recalling a gathering of the clergy of London held on Mr. Moody's invitation, the following colloquy is given: "'Please tell us what your object is?'—'To preach the Gospel.' 'What do you do with converts?'—'Leave them with Christ to take care of.' 'Would it not be well to print your views of the Gospel that we might know?—'They're in print already; you'll find them in the Fifty-third of Isaiah.'" The volume is a monument of much-blessed Christian life and ministry, the reading of which is calculated to be a source of profit to very many.

An important contribution has been made by Rev. Hugh Black to the discussion of the problem suggested by the opposing ideals of culture and self-denial, and which in one form or other has to be faced and settled by every thoughtful mind. Each of these ideals has been proved times and again to the satisfaction of its opponents to be false, yet the professing Church of Christ is as much divided as ever on the question whether He calls to asceticism and renunciation or to the cultivation for the highest ends of all the powers and capacities of our nature. Mr. Black has aimed in Culture and Restraint (6s. Hodder & Stoughton) to show that these are not irreconcilable opposites, but in the deepest and truest sense complementary; that there is no self-denial at all in the giving up of what the Christian forsakes, because the outward is only dispensed with that the inward may be enriched. "To say that religion means shrinkage and the attenuation of life is to consider a few peddling details, and to be blind to the result. The result is not ebb, but flow." The true ideal is found in the fact that from Christ Himself self-denial always meant a larger good, self-repression a truer self-expression. The book will have a special value for those who seek not to have points decided for them, but such guidance as will enable them to decide their own duty to God and man. None can read it without feeling that the author has delivered an important message to his fellows.

*Hast Thou Faith?

By the late Bishop J. C. RYLE.

FAITH, simply faith, is the only thing required in order that you and I may be forgiven. God asks us to come to Jesus as sinners with our sins, to trust in Him, rest on Him, lean on Him, confide in Him, commit our souls to Him, and, forsaking all other hope, cleave only to Him This is all and everything that God asks for. Let a man only do this, and he shall be saved; his iniquities shall be completely pardoned, and his transgressions entirely taken away. Every man and woman that so trusts is at once wholly forgiven, and reckoned perfectly righteous; his sins are clean gone, and his soul is justified in God's sight, however bad and guilty he may have been. In himself he deserves nothing but hell; but he believes on Jesus, and is saved.

Faith is the only thing required, not knowledge. A man may be a poor, unlearned sinner, and know little of books; but if he sees enough to find the foot of the cross, and trusts in Jesus for pardon, I will engage he shall not miss heaven. To know Christ is the corner-stone of all religious knowledge.

Faith, I say, and not conversion. A man may have been walking in the broad way up to the very hour he first hears the Gospel; but if in that hearing he is awakened to feel his danger, and wants to be saved, let him come to Christ at once, and wait for nothing. That very coming is conversion.

Faith, I repeat, and not holiness. A man may feel all full of sin, and unworthy to be saved; but let him not tarry outside the ark till he is better; let him come to Christ without delay, just as he is. Afterwards he shall be holy.

Reader, I call upon you to let nothing move you from this strong ground—that faith in Christ is the only thing needed for your justification. Stand firm here if you value your soul's peace.

* From Gospel Gems, by Bishop Ryle, Major Whittle, Cheyne Brady, and others (1s. 6d. 'Drummond's Tract Depot, Stirling). In this handy volume are gathered twenty-eight of the most telling Gospel appeals, gathered from the published utterances of workers whom God has greatly owned by giving them souls for their hire. It abounds in illustration of the most forcible kind, and will be a welcome addition to the equipment of evangelistic workers, both as a storehouse of suggestion and as a gift to follow up the spoken word.

Irish Notes.

THE Belfast City Council has just taken a step in advance with regard to suppression of betting and gambling in the streets. It has adopted a bye-law by which it is enacted that any person found using the streets of Belfast for bookmaking, betting, or wagering will be liable to a penalty of £5. This is the result of putting Christian men on the Council, and it is hoped the measure will have some effect in stamping out gambling in its various forms in the city.

At a meeting of the Church Association of Ireland, just held in Belfast, Ritualistic innovations were strongly condemned, and resolutions protesting against the establishment of a sectarian university, and the alteration of the Royal Declaration of the Coronation Oath, and also against the appointment of Canon Gore to the Bishopric of Worcester were adopted.

Nearly all the Roman Catholic bishops of Ireland have, in their Lenten pastorals, called attention to the ruin and havoc caused by strong drink, and one of them, Cardinal Logue, of Armagh, has said that if the Roman Catholics of Ireland would bind themselves together even for one year to dispense with drink, and would pay the amount saved into a common fund, the sum would establish and endow a university which would be the admiration of Europe. No doubt this is so. About £12,000,000 is spent annually in Ireland on drink, two-thirds of which, at least, is spent by Roman Catholics. Besides, nearly all the public-houses of the country are in the hands of Roman Catholics, Protestants in most instances having gone out of the trade; and many of the public-houses, it is known, are the property of the Roman Catholic Church itself. There is, therefore, no likelihood that Cardinal Logue's wish will be carried out. Still, it is a hopeful sign of the times to find the Roman Catholic bishops speaking out so strongly and plainly on the matter, and their words will undoubtedly have some effect.

Personalia.

Rev. F. B. Meyer has returned to London after his visit to St. Petersburg much refreshed by the happy fellowship of Christians in the Russian Empire.

By climbing down a fire-escape Mr. Ira D. Sankey recently managed to escape being burned to death in a fire at Battle Creek, which destroyed a sanatorium in which our esteemed friend was staying. One life was lost in the conflagration, which did damage estimated at nearly £100,000.

As the result of exposure and suffering during the recent troublous times, Rev. William H. Murray (the well-known friend of the blind in China) is himself now deprived of the sight of one eye, and partially also of the other. He is now on his way to London to undergo special treatment, in the hope of recovery.

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan's engagements for his visit to this country in the autumn are now fixed. He is to spend three weeks in London preaching at the City Temple, at East Dulwich, Holloway, Stratford Conference Hall, Harringay, and probably in the West End. In the provinces he will visit Newcastle-on-Tyne, Leeds, Bradford, Bristol, Cardiff and Liverpool, for a series of meetings in each place, and will further visit a number of his former scenes of labour for one day only.

Rev. Albert Swift is arranging to conduct a party of Mr. Campbell Morgan's friends on a short tour through Canada, spending some days at Northfield during the Conference. Mr. and Mrs. Morgan will then join the party for the return journey. There are still some vacancies, and Mr. Swift will be glad to know of any who would feel at home in such company, and who might desire to go. Full particulars will be sent on application to him at 112, East Dulwich Grove, S.E.

The Cry of the Children.—The latest published records of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, which are for November last, throw a very painful light upon the miserable lot of myriads of little ones in civilised England. In thirty days no fewer than 2,601 complaints, including 2,190 of neglect and starvation, were received by the Society, and in 2,485 of these investigation showed that the charges were well founded. The deaths of twenty-five children were traced to cruelty, 7,022 children were found to be "involved in suffering," and it was ascertained that 1,651 children were insured for no less a sum than £8,955. The latter fact speaks volumes. This is not considered a "bad" record by the Society, for it seems that cruelty to children is subject to rise and fall, and that November is not a month in which the rate is high. What lies behind all this may be inferred from the fact that the Society requires 160 more inspectors, but cannot afford to employ them, as it is already hampered in its praiseworthy work for want of funds.

The Churches.

Church of England.

The council of the Church Association, having considered, in conjunction with legal advisers, the desirability of appealing against the judgment of the King's Bench as to the confirmation of the election of Canon Gore to the see of Worcester, has decided not to carry the case further.

Rev. Dr. Eyre, vicar of All Saints, Scarborough, states that it is his desire and that of the churchwardens to remove from the church the "Stations of the Cross," placed there during the incumbency of Dr. Baker. Dr. Eyre will appeal to a mass meeting of the parishioners with a view to carrying at the vestry a vote for "applying to the Consistory Court for the removal of these dreadful disfigurements."

A large model of the Tabernacle of Israel in the Wilderness (⅛in. to the cubit) was exhibited in the parish room, Melvin Street, connected with Holy Trinity Church, Anerley, and nine lectures were given by Mr. Herbert R. Francis, of Gloucester, on February 10 to 14 inclusive. Those who were able to be present, in spite of the very cold and inclement weather, were much edified, and were struck with the Scripturalness of all that was said and with the depth of Gospel teaching to be found in these inspired "patterns of heavenly things."

Canon Sutton, vicar of Aston, is to be congratulated on the success of his sixth "Thank-offering Sunday." The amount realized, with a few sums given afterwards, comes to about £650; all but the odd £50 being given by those who, either by residence or by business, are connected with the parish. This happy result not only relieves the Canon of anxiety as to the meeting of current expenses, but also will help to wipe off a substantial part of the debt incident to the remarkable efforts in the direction of church extension in the parish which have been made in recent years.

The C.M.S. Lay Workers' Union for London is arranging to hold a Convention of C.M.S. Lay Workers at Exeter Hall on the Society's birthday, April 12. There will be three sessions—at 11.30 a.m., 3 p.m., and 6.30 p.m. respectively. The main purpose of the convention is thus stated: "To endeavour solemnly to realize before God the greatness and glory of the mission which Christ has committed to his Church in the evangelization of the world, the enormous nature of the task, and the demand on the individual Christian for unwearied prayer, diligence, and self-denial in carrying out the Master's command to 'preach the Gospel to every creature.'" The Archbishop of Canterbury has promised to preside at the evening meeting.

Congregational.

The Dulwich Grove Church (Rev. Albert Swift) has now 320 members on the roll, a net increase of eighty-seven in the course of last year.

Rev. Frederick Barnes has intimated his intention to retire in the course of this year from the pastorate of Northgate Church, Chester, a position he has occupied for twenty-three years. Mr. Barnes, who has been chairman of the Cheshire Congregational Union, will this year complete forty years' service as a Congregational minister.

Ilkley Church (Rev. F. H. Blanchford) has just presented its pastor with a life insurance policy. The wish of the church is to make some provision for its minister's old age, and so it has secured a policy which matures in twenty years, and at the end of that period will be worth £1,000. The church has pledged itself to pay the annual premiums as long as Mr. Blanchford remains its minister.

The fortieth annual meeting of the Arundel Square Church, N., was held on Thursday last, Mr. C. W. Toms, of Kensington, presiding. The secretary's report showed that the various institutions and societies in connection with the church were in a prosperous condition, and the treasurer's statement was very satisfactory. Addresses were given by the chairman, Rev. James J. Ellis, of Poplar, and the pastor, Dr. C. Garnett.

At Hither Green Rev. F. J. Trick has celebrated his first anniversary as pastor. The report given at the public meeting stated that the church was only started three years ago in a small room. Two years saw them in a building in Torrindon Road, which will hold about 350. This building adjoins the site for the permanent church, and is intended for the Sunday school and lecture hall. There is a membership of 102. In the three years about £1,000 has been raised.

At Sheffield the sum of £852 has been promised towards the £2,000 the associated Churches are raising for the Darnall and Crookes new chapels. The Sheffield city boundary has recently been considerably enlarged, bringing up the population within the borough to over 400,000. Owing to facilities for reaching the outskirts provided by the electric trams, the suburbs are growing fast. The Congregational Association executive are making inquiries respecting eligible sites for new chapels.

Baptist.

Rev. Dr. Maclaren is devoting much time and energy to the furtherance of the Twentieth Century Fund. His recent public gatherings at Glasgow were highly enthusiastic, and the financial result over £750. Dr. Maclaren has also visited Bradford and other centres.

At the annual meeting of the church at Hornsey Rise, N. (Pastor J. E. Joynes) the secretary reported the addition of fifty members during the past year, that all the societies are flourishing, and that the work is in a promising condition. Mr. M. Buchanan presided, and Revs. J. J. Bristow and S. G. Morris delivered addresses.

The fourth anniversary of the settlement of Rev. James Seager at the church at Dorchester was recently celebrated. The reports showed that the attendance at Lord's Day and week evening services shows a considerable improvement, especially the latter, the mid-week meetings being of a most encouraging character. The work of the Sunday school is in a state of healthy activity.

The Huddersfield district of the Yorkshire Baptist Association at their last quarterly meeting decided to recommend a mission in all their churches to Sunday-school scholars and young people. The pastors of the churches proffered their services, and a well-organized series of meetings for the young will be held in nearly all the churches conducted by the district ministers during this month and next.

At the anniversary celebrations recently held in connection with the church at Wood Green, N., Alderman George White, M.P., presided at a public meeting, and gave an address on the church's duty in relation to the number of non-church-going people. Amongst the speakers who took part in the proceedings were Revs. A. F. Riley, H. S. Smith, and J. W. Watson. The annual report showed that good work has been undertaken during the year, and progress made. There are 348 members on the roll, making over 700 additions under the present pastorate (Rev. W. Winston Haines). In connection with the schools and young people's societies there are over 900 children.

Some friends who have been working a mission at Clacton-on-Sea have now formed themselves into a church, and, having secured a site in one of the best positions in the town, propose to at once build thereon a school-chapel, seating about 350 persons. For this scheme about £1,600 will be required, and it is necessary to raise this amount at once, so as to have the building ready for the coming season, and because the present hall will then cease to be available. Rev. Thomas Spurgeon and Archibald G. Brown give the effort their hearty commendation. There is no other Baptist church in the town. Mr. H. L. Groom, Ellesmere, Ellis Road, Clacton-on-Sea, the treasurer, writes: "The town being a comparatively poor one, we have to look to friends outside, and seek kind interest and help."

Methodist.

The oldest minister in full circuit work is Rev. Gifford Dorey, of Filey, who entered the ministry in 1846. The oldest superannuated minister, Rev. Richard Rymer, is still hale and hearty. He entered the ministry in 1829, and regularly attends the morning service at Mostyn Road, London.

Presbyterian.

At Hartlepool (St. John's) very encouraging reports were given at the annual meeting on all branches of the church work. The membership now amounts to 210, being a net increase of 120 during the past three years. The condition of the church life was never healthier or more vigorous than it is at present.

The annual meeting of the church at Bexhill was held in Lecture Hall on February 13. All the reports submitted were of a most satisfactory and encouraging nature. The minister (Rev. T. Foster Edwards) presided, and reviewed the work of the year. Since this congregation met for the first time in August, in their new buildings, marked progress has been made. Twenty-two new names have been added to the roll, and the prospects are bright.

Salvation Army.

The annual week of prayer and self-denial is to be held March 1-8. In the course of a telling appeal for support General Booth says: "We have now 7,368 corps, led by 15,389 officers and persons wholly employed in Salvation Army work, in forty-seven different countries and colonies, besides 48,430 local officers. Our fifty-nine newspapers and magazines, printed in twenty-two languages, have a circulation of 1,013,020 per issue. The Army is a great temperance society, a vast organization for the support of law and order, and supports a growing missionary work among the heathen."

Mr. D. S. Hyslop, of the Protestant Alliance, has conducted a number of meetings of late in which interest in the Protestant cause was stimulated, and instruction imparted. At gatherings in St. Matthew's Church, Westminster, and in the Baptist Schoolroom, Church Road, Acton, Mr. Hyslop's addresses gave much faction, while a lecture at Bignold Hall, Forest Gate, on February 13, was attended by a number of Romanists, who engaged in conversation with the lecturer after the meeting.

The following encouraging jotting is from the log of the In Memoriam Mission yawl Clareen, Falmouth Harbour:—"During the recent stormy weather, about 100 vessels found shelter in the harbour. Fifteen were sailing under the Bethel flag, the captains being members of the Falmouth branch of the "Floating Endeavour," and nearly fifty were commanded by temperance skippers. The bright services held at the Bethel and Institute, were largely attended and much help given to Mr. Badger by a band of earnest Christian masters and men. At one testimony meeting, thirty-five witnessed for Christ."

Fallen Asleep.

At St. Helier's, Major P. H. Hewitt, a devoted supporter of the Protestant cause. In his ninety-first year, Rev. Edmund B. Warters, who entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1834, and was almost the oldest minister of the Connexion. He travelled for forty-six years, and his ministry is remembered with affectionate appreciation.—Rev. R. G. Graham, superintendent of the Sunderland First Circuit of the Primitive Methodist Church. Mr. Graham would shortly have succeeded to the position of General Committee secretary, to which office he had been designated by a recent Conference. He had been chosen to give the Hartley lecture at the annual Conference, and had written much for the Connexional magazines.

Secretaries' Prayer Union.—Last Thursday at Exeter Hall an address was given by Lord Kinnaird, who spoke encouraging words to the members, who represent many of the religious and philanthropic agencies of London. His lordship found "the weary worker" exemplified in the prophet Elijah, who, notwithstanding his wonderful experiences on Carmel, fled, at the threat of Jezebel, for his very life; and yet, strange to say, longed to lay down his life so as to escape from its burdens! The question, "What doest thou here, Elijah?" the whirlwind, the earthquake, the fire, and the still small voice were all shown to have lessons for active Christian workers who, in the stress of modern life, are so liable to become weary. There was much prayer during the proceedings, which were presided over by Mr. H. Bristow Wallen.

The Christian.

☞ To avoid delay it is requested that all letters relating to business matters should be addressed to the firm, Messrs. Morgan and Scott, and not to its individual members. Letters of a personal nature should in every case be so marked.

Communications for The Christian should be addressed to the Editor, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C. All Advertisements should be sent to Messrs. John Haddon and Co., Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

☞ The Publishers request that all orders for The Christian by post, and remittances for same, be addressed to "The Christian" Postal Department, Bouverie House, Salisbury Square, London, E.C. Cheques and Post Orders to be made payable to Messrs. John Haddon and Co. at that address. (For Subscription rates, see Page 1 of Cover.) Postcard or stamped envelope should be enclosed if receipt is desired.

Notes & Comments

Spade Work in Religion. The watchword of "Efficiency" which has recently been raised in political circles is equally applicable to religious service. There is a great deal of slipshod work in the Master's vineyard. There, too, "spade-work" is unpopular, and there is a rush for positions which are ornamental rather than useful. The habit of leaving town frequently for week-ends at the seaside or in the country, is a cause of great disturbance in those offices whose efficiency depends on steady devotion and regular attendance. Many Sunday-school superintendents are often distracted by the problem of absentee teachers and scattered classes.

Dillettante Workers. Then, too, there is the casual and spasmodic manner in which many people take up other Christian work. They undertake to give regular help at a "society" or "guild," or what not; but instead of regarding that engagement as an unalterable weekly fixture, they allow the most trifling matters to interfere, until at last they come only when they have nothing else to do, leaving their co-workers at their wits' end. Lack of system deteriorates into systematic lack. It is only those who are "faithful in that which is least" to whose care God can commit "that which is greater." God's work demands the highest powers put to the best exercise in a spirit of ungrudging devotion and love. Those who give Him the mere tags and remnants of their time and effort, are like the men who, having put their hand to the plough, keep looking back, and who are unworthy of the kingdom of God.

Task or Delight? Work undertaken for God may degenerate into a hard task, or be maintained, as it is generally begun, as a delightful service—a continual pleasure. It is a fatal day for any Christian soul when the brightness and fascination of service for the Divine Master evaporate, leaving behind only the residuum of a task which has to be carried through. The outstanding thing about our Lord's own service upon earth was the pleasure with which He undertook his mission of love. "I delight to do thy will, O God." "How am I straitened until it be accomplished!" "With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you." "Who for the joy that was set before Him, endured the cross." All this is full of significance for ourselves. We are called to follow in his steps, and to serve as He served. Service of this kind is the only service that pleases Him, or does us any good. Every heart needs careful watching upon this point; service may easily degenerate into a weary burden.

The Charm of Illustrativeness. A correspondent writes in a contemporary on "Why are Sermons Dull?" and finds the answer in the fact that most preachers deal with abstractions rather than with concrete realities. "We hear sermons on love, on brotherliness, on having faith, on growing in grace, and the like, but there is a painful poverty of illustrative examples and of practical counsel how to crystallize nebulous principles, which none of us think of disputing, into practice in our homes, our businesses, our social circles, and our politics." There is, we fear, too much truth in this charge. The great preachers have been full of illustrative material. Jesus, in announcing the laws of the Kingdom of God, always spoke in particular. The Gospels teem with "concrete realities," enforced by figures of speech and parables. He who knew what was in man, knew that the way to human hearts was through the door of imagery. Those who study his method of teaching and preaching will have small encouragement to deal merely with "generalities."

A Worthy Sire. In these days of unwise departures from old standards of conduct and morals, including the admirable and desirable one of respect for parents, it is quite refreshing to come upon Rev. Dr. Maclaren's recent sketch of his father and mother, a study worthy to stand by the side of Ruskin's touching tribute to his worthy parents. The picture of the strongly-gifted young man who, under the influence of the Evangelical Movement in Scotland nearly a century ago, gave himself to Christ, and who became a Baptist pastor, is a noble one, and it almost goes without saying that the preaching of the father of such a son was not only intellectually clear, but "richly Scriptural, expository, and instructive, and, withal, earnestly evangelistic." Dr. Maclaren says that his father's preaching affected him powerfully when young, and that the effect abides with him still; and perhaps that is a greater tribute than the statement that the preacher afterwards became one of the first founders of South Australia.

The Most Effective Protest. In the course of a statesmanlike speech last week Dr. Maclaren focussed his suggestions concerning temperance reform into one practical sentence—Take your temperance to the polling-booth. There is very much we all can do in the way of exercising personal influence over men, by our example, by training our children in the right way, and by attacking in every form the dire foe of our nation; but we can strike a really effective blow for sobriety at the polling-booth. Christian people should keep this thing before them always, so that whenever an election comes they will not be drawn aside into voting upon a secondary issue. The enemy has always gained an advantage by the introduction of side issues, which have divided the forces of righteousness. No temporary digression in national affairs should blind us to the pressing domestic reforms which have too long gone by default.

Adorning the Doctrine. The apostolic injunction to Christian men and women to "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things," is a very striking one, and is full of suggestion for us all. There is a very real sense in which Christian doctrine is independent of any human adornment; its own native splendour betrays the Divinity of its origin, and is its own best commendation. But there is a very real sense also, in which the attractiveness of the Gospel depends, to a large extent, upon the way in which we deal with it. God preaches his Gospel directly through the Bible, and indirectly through the lives of redeemed men and women. He would have men take knowledge of us that we have been with Jesus. And we only really adorn the Gospel when we demonstrate, in our entire nature, a beautiful harmony between the doctrine we profess and the life that we live. A picture is adorned when it is placed in the most appropriate setting, and a doctrine is adorned when its setting in a human life throws it into the fullest relief. We cannot receive the Gospel neutrally; we either adorn it or disgrace it.

The Light in the Cloud. It is as depressing for a human spirit continually to contemplate the clouds in the moral world, as it is for a human eye to behold for long the clouds of the physical sky. The clouds always have a sobering effect, and depression, too long continued, is baneful. We must look out for the light in the cloud, and the prophecy which it gives of a blue sky presently. The elements of hope ought to occupy a large space in the outlook of a Christian worker; it is the elixir vitæ which delivers the spirit from collapse. It is noticeable that the Apostle Paul, immediately after he has depicted the blackest hour of the world's life—the manifestation of the Man of Sin—turns suddenly to the thought of the triumph of the work of God, and gives thanks for the evidence he beholds of the operations of grace. All who for Christ's sake are immersed in service which brings them into contact with the worst in life, may keep themselves from sinking down by hailing in spirit the coming triumph of God.

The Last Great Historian. Among the benefactors of the nation the name of the late Dr. S. R. Gardiner will not readily be forgotten. His patient and conscientious study of Puritan England, as embodied in his monumental history of those troubled times, has planted the truth on sure foundations. The recrudescence of Ritualism in the Church of England had caused a revulsion against the noble picture of Cromwell and his times given in Carlyle's great work, and would have done much to neutralize its effects, were it not for the closely reasoned and accurate books of Dr. Gardiner, who has demonstrated in detail the priceless debt, politically and religiously, which we owe to the strong men who saved England from slipping back under the yoke of Rome. A true knowledge of the past is a precious safeguard against a revival of its errors and tyrannies.

Religion among the Working Classes. A leading secularist recently stated with evident regret that he was afraid that the working-men of England are far more religious than they were a generation ago. Twenty years since, the utterances of secularists had a certain note of triumph in them; they clearly believed that the future was with them as far as the working classes were concerned. The above confession tells a very different story. The speaker frankly puts down the fact to the credit of "Bible-reading in Board-schools." "If we could only get the Bible banished from the elementary schools, it would be all right." This statement may be commended to those extremists who, on the one side, speak of the "Godless" School Board system, and who, on the other, would omit the Book from the school curriculum. Another strong religious influence which is bearing fruit is the P.S.A. movement, with its 300,000 adherents, its adult schools, its temperance and kindred societies. It is not open unbelief, but indifference that is the chief enemy to the truth.

Mass or Communion? The Church Times, in a leading article last week, set itself to answer, with commendable frankness, a question which many "anxious correspondents" had addressed to it, upon the perplexing "teaching and practice of the clergy in regard to the Holy Sacrifice." In reply to the formal question, "What is the essential difference between the English Communion service and the Roman Mass?" a short, sharp answer is given:—

There is no essential difference. The two things are identical in all but their accidental features.

And, later, in dealing with non-communicating attendance:—

There is, therefore, on this head, no difference of teaching between Rome and England, nor need there be any difference of practice.

There is no mistaking the meaning of the article, which might, without impropriety, have come from the pen of a Jesuit, so far as its Roman teaching is concerned. But it will occur to ordinary people to ask how this amazing statement can, even remotely, be reconciled either with the Thirty-nine Articles, or with the Prayer Book Communion Service? By what method of interpretation is a man entitled to say "there is no essential difference," when, in unmistakable language, the Prayer Book says there is all the difference in the world? Is it surprising that "anxious correspondents" seek a little light in the midst of such glaring contradictions? And what can be expected of the flock when the shepherds are so grievously astray?

Poisoning the Source. An article in the Daily Chronicle last week lifts the veil from many a home, and shows how the sources of life are poisoned. Whoever wrote it evidently has the entrée to a large number of middle and better-class families, and his revelation of the extent to which boys and girls receive a home training in our national vice of gambling is lamentable to the last degree. Many innocent games are tainted with gaming in "a minor sort of way." Boys and girls play with their parents and friends for a few coppers, or a little silver, and children under fifteen take the keenest interest in betting on horse races, saving up their money for a "quiet gamble." This is all done with the consent of the parents, and even with their distinct encouragement! It is an extraordinary state of things, and we need not wonder at the writer's statement that:—

With girls, the consequences are very serious. In their womanhood it blunts sensitiveness, deadens ideals, and feeds them with an incurable craving for excitement.

We hear of professing Christians, too—and not a few of them—who play cards with their children, sometimes for small stakes. Such parents ought to understand that they are making it very easy for their boys and girls to take the plunge, in later life, into the worst of excesses.

Crime in Liverpool. The twenty-first annual report just issued by the Head Constable of Liverpool is interesting reading, showing, as it does, how it has been possible almost to stamp out certain classes of offences which are not in any way connected with drink, such, for instance, as robbery with violence. In that city, as elsewhere, a wise leniency in regard to first offenders has resulted in a marked diminution in the number of offences. The drink traffic, however, plays its usual part in providing work for the police and the bench. With no fewer than 2,155 licensed houses, 232 beerhouses, and 146 off-licences, it is by no means surprising that there were 3,647 "drunken cases" in the year, the wonder being that there were not more. Of course, a slight reduction has followed the new practice of sending the habitual drunkard out of the way of licensed temptation for prolonged periods. Yet it seems an anomaly that the State should foster in every way the downfall of these unfortunates, and then punish them severely for falling.

Alien Immigrants and Crime. The growing agitation in favour of legislation for the restriction of the great influx of destitute aliens, certainly has a strong basis of painful experience under it. At the recent Clerkenwell Sessions, as at previous ones, no less than twenty-five per cent. of the prisoners charged with serious offences were foreigners from the East End, and it is said a similar condition of things obtains at other police-courts. It is not a difficult matter to understand this large percentage, when it is borne in mind that, according to the Board of Trade returns, the number of destitute aliens arriving in London reaches, some months, nearly 5,000, and also that most of them are forced to live in surroundings both revolting and indecent. Much mock sentiment has been wrapped round the question; the plain fact behind it is, that these undesirable immigrants oust our own poor people from employment and home.

The Outlook In Japan. The New York Independent contains an article by Mr. J. H. de Forest on present-day thought in Japan. It supplements the facts given in a recent note in these columns regarding the progress of missions in that country. In addition to the open converts to Christianity that are to be found in increasing numbers among the governing and educated classes, he points out the good results of Christian thought as shown in scores of books on ethics, religion, philosophy, and fiction, which go through edition after edition. Some of the ablest papers in the Empire are edited by Christians. Two recent novels, based on the Christian conception of a noble life, and freely quoting the words of Christ, are having a large circulation. By this means, the fallow ground is being broken up, and Japan is being providentially prepared for the reception of the truth. If our alliance with the Japanese helps to open their minds and hearts to the Gospel, its religious benefits will put its political results in the shade.

The Convulsion in Spain. The recent outbreaks in Spain, Italy, and Hungary are far more serious au fond than they appear to be even on the surface. These riots and disturbances are symptoms of fundamental convulsion which is inevitable in the struggle between slavery and freedom. It is obvious to everybody that these Anarchist movements are most pronounced in the Latin kingdoms, where clericalism has held undisputed sway; in view of which fact, the disturbances themselves are easy to understand. Where superstition reigns, the poor are compelled to groan under their burden, fear holds them in thrall; but when the spell of superstition is broken, men make an effort to gain their liberty, and, being without true religious control, the reaction is bound to be dangerous. Spain, in particular, is growing more and more antagonistic to clericalism, and unless its disappearing faith in the priest is replaced by a true faith in the Saviour, the country will yet become the theatre of serious conflicts.

Another Drink Trick.

A CASE before the courts last week emphasizes the necessity of unceasing vigilance to keep pace with the wiles of the drink traffic. May a member of a bona fide club obtain drink by sending his wife to fetch it and bring it to him at home? This was the question referred by the Wolverhampton justices to the Court of the King's Bench. The decision of the Lord Chief Justice, arrived at "with great reluctance," was that the act was legal;

> but he trusted that magistrates would not in any way encourage the practice of bona fide clubs delivering liquor to members off the premises.

Mr. Justice Darling went further. While concurring (also with great reluctance) on the legal point, he declared that—

> It was a most inexpedient thing, and if it could be stopped he should be very glad to learn that it had been put an end to, because, if a man could send his wife to a club to fetch liquor, he might send any one else as his agent, including his children, to fetch liquor from his club in an open jug, a thing that was forbidden in the case of a public-house. He hoped that someone in Parliament would watch the matter, because considerable harm might be done.

Apart from the question of legality, there is no reason why a club member should have club liquor taken home to him any more than the club magazines or a club easy chair. The material benefits afforded by a club are essentially for use upon the premises, and if the law, as it stands, is not strong enough to enforce this in the case of drink, it is a matter to which temperance M.P.'s should give their urgent attention.

Mr. Justice Channell, in agreeing with his colleagues, said that:—

> If a case came before him in which it appeared that members of a club might take liquor away from the premises, it would go far to convince him that it was not a bona fide club.

It is high time that legislation was applied to clubs, and there is certainly good ground for action now in preventing their rules from defeating the essential purpose of the existing laws.

A Child Convict.—The recent sentence of ten years' transportation passed upon the lad Kershaw, only thirteen years of age, brings forcibly to mind some of the grave defects of the criminal system. Justice Bucknill refrained from sending the boy to a reformatory on the ground that he would be so young when released as to be "a danger to society." But unhappily penal servitude is so far from being curative that there is little if any room for hope that when Kershaw is sent out at twenty-three years old he will have been dealt with so wisely and kindly as to ensure his becoming a respectable citizen.

Indian Problems.

BY THE EDITOR.

WE repeatedly hear complaints that the native police are notoriously addicted to bribery and corruption. One whose love for truth we cannot doubt, told us the following incident:—The dhobi (washerman) reported one day to this gentleman's wife that some of her laundry had been stolen from him. The lady summoned the police to his help. A little time after, the dhobi's wife came to her crying, and said: "They threaten to charge my husband with the theft if he does not pay them six rupees. Whatever shall we do?" The lady had some trouble to understand at first whom the pronoun "they" designated. The woman was finally given the money, with the instruction that she should go to the police station and notify the official of the money being ready at home; and that in the meantime she should let the lady's husband and another gentleman hide themselves in her cottage, so as to be able to hear any conversation that might be carried on.

The instructions were followed out. The woman returned home with a policeman, sent by his superior. This man now required his due. "Whom do you want it for?" asked the dhobi. "Why, three rupees for the chief, two rupees for the next officer, and don't you think that I deserve at least one rupee for my own trouble?"

As it] is disgraceful to a man to receive money from a woman's hand, the wife gave it to her husband who held it out to the policeman. Just as the latter was in the act of taking it, the gentleman appeared on the scene, and the silver coins fell to the floor. "Why don't you pick them up?" he asked; but the man was dumb-stricken.

The case thus put before the local police-court was dismissed. Our friend then applied to a superior court with a European official at its head, and the result was: Three months' imprisonment for the lowest in rank, while the chief culprits remained unpunished. Truth would find cases of justices' justice to pillory here, as well as at home.

THE HIRE OF THE LABOURERS.

The native police are said to be the weakest part of the Indian administration. They are not paid "a living wage," and this is enough to account in part for their dishonesty. But they are not the only ones who are underpaid. A young married man was recently sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment for embezzlement; the judge, however, remarked that his salary was quite inadequate to his position. His defalcations were far more than would have brought his salary up to par. Once committed to a dishonest course, the descent is easy, rapid and fatal. Underpayment does not pay, whether the employer be a Government or an individual. A reckoning day is at hand for such as defraud the hireling of his wages, and become guilty of spoiling their lives.

THE THIEF CASTE.

In country places, and perhaps also in towns and cities, it is not uncommon to employ a member of the thief caste as night watchman; his fellow thieves respect the property of those who employ one of themselves. We say at home, "Set a thief to catch a thief." Here they set a thief to prevent thieving.

HOW TO GROW FAT IN A FAMINE.

While it is acknowledged throughout India what devotion the European Government officials and the missionaries of all nationalities—British, American, German, Swedish, &c.—displayed during the recent famine, it is freely and generally asserted that two classes grew fat upon the famine—the corn-merchants and the native officials, the latter systematically deducting for themselves a portion of the allowance made to the starving. If the amount fixed for each per day was seven pice (1¾d.) he would only get six pice, one being detained by the distributor.

At Jeypore, the picturesque capital of one of the most prosperous native States, we called upon Dr. McAlister and Rev. J. Traill, of the United Free Church Mission, who, with their helpers, carry on a fine work there, notwithstanding that they have not been able yet to obtain permission from the Maharaja to build a church. The meetings on Sunday mornings are held in the school-house, and in the afternoons on the open verandah of Rev. J. Traill's bungalow. After a very interesting conversational meeting, conducted by Dr. McAlister with his Biblewomen, an attentive congregation of native Christians on Rev. J. Traill's verandah, listened to the impressive words of Rev. J. Reid, of Dundee, who, as a delegated visitor, had the privilege of baptizing a new convert.

A native elder then rose to his feet, expressing in warm words his feelings with regard to the missionaries. He said that though, as workers, they encountered the greatest difficulty in the caste system, yet they saw a hopeful disposition in the younger generation to overlook these distinctions. When the missionaries first entered the country, the Hindus looked upon them as enemies, having come to abolish the dearest thing they possessed, even their religion; but in the course of the years they found that love alone prompted their actions, and in no time was this so visible as during that fearful famine in which so many missionaries laid down their lives for the suffering natives. He laid particular stress upon the fact that they owed a debt of gratitude to the missionaries through whom those who abused the confidence placed in them in the distribution of the famine funds, were found out and removed.

RETURN OF FAMINE CONDITIONS.

The outlook in the Panch Mahals and northern districts of the Bombay Presidency is very sad indeed. The official returns show that the number of those receiving famine relief amounts to 94,787. Rats and locusts are playing havoc in some of those districts, and crops are reported to have withered, or to have been removed for fodder. Add to this the prospective famine of water, and the saddest picture is complete. Appeals are being issued on behalf of the Bhils (one of the aboriginal tribes), who have suffered most acutely from failing crops and devastating rats.

In a letter from Mrs. Dennis Osborne, written less than a week before her sad bereavement, she said:—"Yes, it seems that famine is again looming up in the Bombay district as well as in other parts of India. Hundreds of the distressed are flocking into Poona for help. If you had been at our home this week, you would have got an idea how to relieve the starving. It is impossible to send them from our gates without help in grain or pence."

Day of Prayer for Ireland.—The Irish branch of the Evangelical Alliance has issued an appeal earnestly inviting Christians to unite in setting apart Monday, March 17 next, as a day of special prayer for Ireland. It is hoped that on this occasion meetings will be held throughout the country, and that in all private and public devotions there will be a confession of the power of error and evil, the prevalence of intemperance and Sabbath desecration, also the serious political and social disturbances affecting large districts of the country, and that prayer will be offered for the speedy establishment of the kingdom of Christ throughout the length and breadth of the land.

The True Melchizedek.—II.

"Such a High Priest became us" (Heb. vii. 26).
"We have such a High Priest" (viii. 1).

AGAIN and again the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews quotes the prophecy of the Priest after the order of Melchizedek (Psa. cx.), but he is unable to proceed, for they to whom he writes are dull of hearing. And yet there is a significant advance, and some new fact or teaching is laid bare, at each recurrence of the name.

Its first introduction is in connection with the fact that Christ glorified not Himself to be made a High Priest, but He that said unto Him, "Thou art my Son, to-day have I begotten Thee" (that is, from the dead—Acts xiii. 33). "As He saith also in another place, 'Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek.'" Two important conditions of the eternal priesthood are emphasized here: (1) That Christ was called of God to be a High Priest; (2) that it was in resurrection that his high priesthood commenced. "This day have I begotten Thee . . . Thou art a Priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek."

The next point is, that through unparalleled suffering He has proved Himself obedient. In the previous chapter (iv. 15) He is said to have been in all things tempted like as we are—apart from sin.* Here it is shown that, having been perfected through suffering—having accomplished the exodus of which He spoke with Moses and Elijah on the holy mount of Transfiguration—He became the Author of eternal salvation to all them that obey Him; to them that walk, however imperfectly yet with sincere endeavour, in the path of obedience trodden by Him who was "called of God a High Priest after the order of Melchizedek." The phrase "for ever" is omitted here (v. 10) as not coming within the writer's present field of view, and not dividing attention with the thought contained in the name Melchizedek, "King of righteousness, and King of peace." (Compare the omission of the words "after the order of Melchizedek" (vii. 21 R.V.) because there the emphatic consideration is the perpetuity of the priesthood confirmed by the oath of God.)

But those addressed were unskilful in the word of righteousness, and unprepared for the ministry of the High Priest, whose office it was to maintain the people in communion with God. They were dwarfed Christians, children, when they ought to have been men. Therefore, the Spirit warns them that not to advance is to backslide, the end of which is apostasy and reprobation.

But the Apostle is persuaded better things of them, and as they had begun well, so he urges them to show the same diligence to the fulness of hope unto the end; and to be followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises. And as he had already (ii. 9) spoken of Jesus as crowned with glory and honour, as the earnest of God's purpose to put all things under the feet of man, so now he concludes his encouraging appeal by reminding them that Jesus as our Forerunner has already entered within the veil, "made a High Priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek."

Now therefore, having warned, instructed, and encouraged them, and having gained their ear, the apostle will go on (vii.) to open up to them the significance of the brief mention of the typical priest Melchizedek, the absolute and far-reaching superiority of his order of priesthood to that of Aaron, and its eternal fulfilment in Jesus the Son of God.

* The three temptations, in the order given by the Evangelist Luke (ch. iv.), comprise all possible temptations to body, soul, and spirit.

And first he affirms that Melchizedek (typically speaking) abides a priest continually. But before he reaches this affirmation he enumerates a series of particulars concerning him. He is a priest of God Most High. As a priest he met and blessed Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings. He has nothing to do with sin-offering, peace-offering, burnt-offering. He comes forth to meet, and to refresh with bread and wine, not a trembling sinner but a conquering saint. He meets with blessing, the heir of promise, returning from the slaughter of the kings. "We are more than conquerers through Him that loves us."

But even the patriarch Abraham meets his superior in this royal priest, who is not primarily the monarch of an earthly kingdom but of a spiritual, being first by interpretation King of righteousness, and after that also King of Salem, which is King of peace—peace the fruit of righteousness. Our Priest, our Advocate, our Paraclete is Jesus Christ the righteous, and He therefore is our Peace (1 John ii. 2; Eph. ii. 13, 14; Rom. iv. 23; v. 1).

The inspired writer makes no mention of the father or mother or genealogy of Melchizedek. By the omission of these, and of his birth and death, he is regarded as like unto the Son of God, who is from eternity and to eternity.

The ideal priest, so briefly, yet so pregnantly, sketched by the Spirit of inspiration, represents the only order of priesthood which is worthy of, or possible to, the Son of God, and therefore Jehovah declares Him a Priest for ever, after the order of Melchizedek.

The greatness of Melchizedek is further set forth by the consideration that the patriarch Abraham acknowledged his superiority to himself by paying to him tithes out of the chief spoils. A vivid contrast is drawn between the Melchizedek and the Aaronic orders of priesthood. For as the oak is in the acorn, so Levi was in the loins of his father when Melchizedek met him; consequently Levi, in Abraham, paid tithes to the priest of an order antecedent to his own, and thus unconsciously acknowledged its superiority.

The un-oathed covenant of Sinai was superseded by the antecedent covenant with the patriarch Abraham, in which Jehovah interposed Himself with an oath; the un-oathed Aaronic priesthood, under which the people received the Law and undertook to obey it, of necessity was done away when God Most High proclaimed with an oath the priesthood for ever of his Son, "the brightness of his glory, the express image of his person, upholding all things by the word of his power, who when He had by Himself purged our sins sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high."

The last point emphasized (vii. 23) is that while the priests of the Levitical order were many because they died, the Priest of the Melchizedek order is only one, because He lives eternally; his priesthood cannot pass to another; wherefore He is able to save to the uttermost, for evermore, them that draw near unto God through Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them.

The demonstration of the excellency and superiority of this order of priesthood and of the Great Priest (x. 21, R.V.) the only one of that order, is concluded by showing that such a High Priest became us—is exactly the one we need—holy, guileless, undefiled, separated from sinners—and made higher than the heavens; who needeth not daily, like those high priests, to offer up sacrifice, first for his own sins and then for the people's, for this He did once when He offered up Himself. For the law maketh men high priests who have infirmity, but the word of the oath appointeth the Son, who is perfected for evermore."

As Jesus exercised the ministry of Prophet when He was on earth, and as He will take his great power and reign as King when He comes again, so now, during the interval between his Ascension and his Return, He is fulfilling the glorious priesthood to which He was designated by Jehovah; a High Priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek.

Our salvation from sin depends upon this ministry of Jesus, our High Priest in heaven, concurrently with that of the Holy Spirit whom we received at our regeneration to dwell in us for ever. Yet is it too much to say that there is no aspect of the work of our Lord Jesus, which is so usurped by Romanists and Romanizers, and which is so neglected in the teaching of Evangelicals, as the eternal and untransferable Priesthood of the Great Priest over the house of God, in heaven itself, whither He has entered by virtue of his own shed blood? Is Church Attendance Declining?—V.

By Rev. J. GUINNESS ROGERS, D.D.

A CORRESPONDENT calls my attention through the Editor to two reasons for the non-attendance of business men at public worship which may, he thinks, have escaped my notice. I will give them in his own words: "First, the tendency of ministers of religion to devote their sermons to the discussion of political or social problems instead of the faithful proclamation of the Word." Second: "The modern business man, whilst aware of the fact that the preacher of Christ must live, and even live in comparative comfort, does not quite see why he should be under the necessity of piling up a fortune in the service of Him who had not where to lay his head." The second hardly seems to need serious consideration. The number of men in the Christian ministry to whom the charge can by any possibility apply is so exceedingly small that they can hardly be supposed to exert any very serious influence upon Church attendance.

The other objection to the pulpit is of a much more practical kind, and goes to the very heart of our subject. What it means is that preachers are left without congregations because they themselves fail in their primary duty. This raises a very wide question as to the proper function and responsibility of a Christian ministry. On this point there may be some differences of opinion.

Those who take the broader conception, and hold that a Christian minister has to deal with social, political, and even literary questions in the pulpit must of course consider whether such a possible diminution of his influence as our correspondent suggests is not too heavy a price to pay. I should myself be the last to set up a narrow theory as to the office and work of the Christian minister. But whatever else he may do, there is one thing which he must not leave undone, and that is the preaching of the Gospel.

The existence of the evil it is impossible to deny. It seems to be an accepted maxim with some that the pulpit, instead of being exclusively devoted to the conversion and edification of souls, is to be used also for the ventilation of humanitarian ideas. So far is this carried, that humanitarian teachers are admitted into Christian pulpits, regardless as to whether they themselves maintain a true allegiance to the crucified Christ.

We have had, of late years, a growing tendency on the part of great organizations to secure a Sunday for the advocacy of special schemes. We have a "Temperance Sunday," a "Peace Sunday," a "Citizen Sunday," and I know not how many more of the same order. The appetite grows by that on which it feeds, and hence the list of these Sundays on which there is, to say the least, a danger that the primary work of the preacher may be thrown into the background, is continually on the increase.

To attract crowds is not the chief end of the Christian ministry—in truth, it is only to be welcomed at all as affording the opportunity of leading them to Christ. To say that crowds are drawn, therefore, is no answer to the objection with which I am dealing, in so far as it implies the failure of the pulpit to fulfil its proper function.

This is, doubtless, what the objector means. So far, I am in agreement with him, and yet I feel that the questions which he has raised are not to be finally settled in this summary style. It is pretty clear that no law can be laid down for the regulation of the preacher's choice of subjects. This is pre-eminently a case in which each one has to give account of himself to God. All that we can venture to attempt is to press home upon the individual conscience the tremendous responsibilities resting upon the ambassadors for God, who have accepted an office the first duty of which is to preach the glorious Gospel of the grace of God. If it be true that God so loved the world that He gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish, but have everlasting life, then it is the most wonderful truth which has been made known in the universe. To the ministers of Christ there should be no doubt about it. They have undertaken the office in order that they may publish it and beseech men everywhere to accept it. Whatever else they do, necessity is laid upon them—woe is unto them if they preach not this Gospel.

A PROFOUND MISTAKE.

One of the most melancholy features in the case is that this substitution of other themes suggests a secret disbelief, or, at least, uncertainty as to the efficacy of the Gospel itself. Such scepticism would probably be disclaimed, and yet it may be lurking in the minds and hearts of some who are all unconscious of its presence. Surely it is indicated in the cry for "a new presentation" of the old truth, one which shall be more adapted to the demands of the new and enlightened age in which our lot is cast.

The sermons of the type to which our correspondent objects look very much like expedients for giving their discourses the attraction of that freshness which they think the simple presentation of the Gospel cannot possess. I am convinced they are labouring under a profound mistake. No doubt if they have begun to take pessimistic views as to the present position of the Gospel—for what could be more pessimistic than the suggestion that it has lost something of the power of earlier days?—that is pretty sure to communicate itself in tone, if not in substance, to their own teaching. Faith is, after all, at the root of true spiritual optimism, and wherever that sane and healthy spirit prevails, it is pretty sure to have its influence on congregations. It is on this positive side, however, that I personally prefer to insist.

We spend a good deal of time and strength in criticisms of the teachings and methods of others which might be used to much greater advantage in enforcing or illustrating the kind of teaching which the Church and the world need. By all means let us have variety of method and, where it can be got, novelty of treatment. Far more important even than these points is the constant insistence upon that which is vital and permanent. Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

THE SINE QUA NON.

The experience of to-day is continually affording new proof that there is nothing so effective in the way of public teaching as the simple and earnest proclamation of this familiar truth. Even preachers who have given themselves to the elaboration of the more intellectual aspects of this message, have often been surprised to find how much more remarkable have been the results attained by some plain preacher who had no distinction either in thought or style, but whose heart was possessed by the great Christ-passion, and who, because he spoke out of the fulness of the heart, spoke with power. It is quite certain that we need both classes of preachers, and it is worse than folly to institute invidious comparisons between them. The one class we do not need is that which does not put the Gospel of Christ in the very forefront of all its teaching.

Samuel and Saul.

Samuel's True Heroism.

(1 Sam. viii.)

By REV. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

WHEN Samuel cried to the Lord about the demand of the people for a king, in the Divine answer it was made clear that the cherished ideal of a lifetime would have to be abandoned. The distinct impression was borne in on the prophet's mind that he must renounce his high purpose, abdicate his position, and step down to become subordinate to a king. "Now, therefore," said his Almighty Friend and Confidant, "hearken unto their voice."

At the same time his sorrow was greatly mitigated by discovering that God was his Fellow-Sufferer, and that the sorrow of the Divine heart was infinitely greater than his own. "They have not rejected thee, but they have rejected Me." It is a great honour when a man is summoned to enter into fellowship with God in the awful pain and grief which men bring on his tender and Holy Spirit.

THE SUFFERING OF GOD.

Surely none will count the phrase extravagant which attributes suffering to God on account of his rejection by human hearts which refuse his reign and do despite to the Spirit of his Grace. Did not Jesus suffer when his own received Him not, when his brethren believed not, when the city, which He loved with patriot devotion, refused to shelter under his shadowing wings, and when his chosen Apostles forsook Him and fled? The very abandonment of his self-sacrifice proved the tenderness of his yearning love, and this could not have been present to so large an extent within Him without exposing Him to excessive suffering on account of human sin. It has been beautifully said of a modern writer: "There is a common saying that cruelty and cowardice go together, so also do self-sacrifice and tenderness. They are different sides of the same idea, and all the delicacy of Christian tenderness is perceptibly an outgrowth of the Cross. It seems as though, till Christ had lived and died, that fulness of human sympathy was impossible." Now, if that be true—if the Cross of Christ has exhaled through the world the aroma of tender sympathy—how strong this element must have been in his Holy Nature, and how acutely He must have suffered when the keepers of the vineyard cast Him out and slew Him. But He did not suffer alone; they that saw Him saw the Father. He taught us that God was not impassive; but that He yearned, sorrowed, loved, as human fathers do, only with heights and depths of intensity which are indeed Divine.

> Thou who hast borne all burdens, bear our load,
> Bear Thou our load, whatever load it be;
> Our guilt, our shame, our helpless misery,
> Bear Thou who only canst, O God, my God,
> Seek us and find us, for we cannot Thee.

The prophet says that God was pressed beneath the sin and rebellion of men, as the groaning waggon is pressed beneath its sheaves.

SAMUEL'S NOBLE BEHAVIOUR TOWARDS THE PEOPLE demands our notice.

The request of the people for a king was, no doubt, in part based on Deut. xvii. 14, which seemed to anticipate just such a crisis as had now arisen. In Hannah's song, also, there had been an unmistakable prophecy of the day when Jehovah should give strength to his king and exalt the horn of his anointed (1 Sam. ii. 10). But the present request had been sprung on Samuel prematurely, and with undue passion and haste. Instead of seeking to ascertain the mind of God, the people had made up their own mind; instead of consulting with the aged prophet on the best policy for coming days, they dictated the policy on which they had set their hearts.

Under these circumstances, and with the express direction of God, he protested solemnly to the deputation of elders, and through them to the people, showing the manner of the king that would reign. It was impossible that a king demanded in such a spirit as characterized the people could be a man after God's own heart. They wanted one who, in his stature and bearing, in his martial prowess and deeds, should be worthy to compare with neighbouring monarchs. This was much more to them than character, obedience of God, or loyalty to the Mosaic code. And as they desired, so it was done unto them. Ah! how often it happens that God grants us according to the insistence of our strong and vehement self-will. He gives us according to our request, but sends leanness into our souls (Psa. cvi. 15.)

DANGERS THAT SAMUEL FORESAW.

All the Oriental extravagance and prodigality of human life, which were the familiar accompaniment of royalty in neighbouring countries, were destined to reappear in the court of the Kings of Israel. They would enforce the service of the young men to fabricate their weapons, fight their battles, and minister to their royal state. They would exact unremunerated labour in the tillage of their lands. From the daughters and wives of the people they would demand confectionaries and bakemeats, and other elaborate luxuries for the royal appetite. Vineyards and oliveyards, farms and lands, would be confiscated at their caprice. A system of heavy taxation would be imposed on the produce of the land, and on the flocks and herds which covered the pasture land; while the people would have to stand still and see their hard-earned money squandered on the pleasures and self-indulgence of the palace. A brief experience of this kind would lead to a universal outcry, as the nation awoke to its grievous mistake; but the step so rashly taken would be found to be irreparable. "Ye shall cry out in that day, because of your king which ye shall have chosen you; and the Lord will not answer you in that day."

A VAIN REMONSTRANCE.

Samuel's protest and remonstrance were, however, alike in vain. "The people refused to hearken unto the voice of Samuel; and they said, Nay, but we will have a king over us, that we also may be like all the nations, and that our king may judge us, and go out before us and fight our battles." They trusted in man and in the arm of flesh, their heart departed from the Lord, and in the sequel they were destined to see their king slain on the fatal field of Gilboa, their land overrun by the enemy, and the national fortunes reduced to the lowest possible ebb.

Does thy heart cry out for a king, for one who shall reduce the conflicting passions of thy nature to unity and order; beware lest thou choose after the sight of thine eyes, or the hearing of thine ears; let not sense or appetite make the selection; take heed of the lust of thy flesh, the lust of thy eyes, or the pride of thy life! I was told when in Russia that in one of the villages in the Baltic provinces a man is imprisoned in the strong bars of an iron cage, who approaches each person on entering the chamber where it is fixed, and, presenting a silver rouble, says, "This is God." Very few state the truth so boldly; but of how many such a statement would express the very fact! Let thy King be the man whom God hath chosen, the Man of Calvary, whom He hath exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour. He will not exact from, but bring to thee. He does not impoverish, but enrich. His sceptre is the broken reed; his steed, a foal; his crown, of thorns!

When Samuel saw that the people had made up their mind, he dismissed the assembly, and set himself with remarkable magnanimity to do the best he could for them. He did this in obedience to the Divine summons, which lay along the line of his own thoughts.

A NOBLE CHARACTER.

This is very remarkable, and justifies the remark of Ewald: "Samuel is one of the few great men in history who, in critical times, by sheer force of character and inimitable energy, terminate the previous form of a great existing system—at first against their own will, but afterwards, when convinced of the necessity, with all the force and eagerness of their nature; and who then initiate a better form with the happiest results, amid much personal suffering and persecution."

During the early years of his life, and well on into the maturity of his power, Samuel sought to vitalize the existing institutions, which were ready to his hands. Only slowly, and against his wishes, he awoke to realize that he must abandon further efforts in this direction, and set himself to build up an entirely new organization. In doing this he had to sacrifice his previous convictions, and do violence to his better judgment; he had to pull down the very structure that he had been at such pains to establish; he had to be second, where he had been an unchallenged first. But when once he realized that there was no alternative, he became the most devoted and efficient organizer of the new age; just as Dr. Chalmers, when he found that it was impossible to secure what he sought within the borders of the Established Church of Scotland, stepped out from its pale, and began to build the Free Church, which has become one of the greatest churches of the age.

"And," continues Ewald, "if David's visible deeds are greater or more dazzling than Samuel's, still there can be no doubt that David's blaze of glory would have been impossible without Samuel's less conspicuous, but far more influential career; so that all the greatness of which the following century boasts goes back to him as its real author."

THE CRISES OF LIFE.

There are supreme crises in the lives of some of us which search us to the quick. The people whom we have loved, have suffered and sacrificed for, suddenly turn from us. They want something else, and something more. We realize that we must abdicate, and are tempted to do it with grudging courtesy and an ill grace. Why should we make way for others, why renounce our rights and refuse to press our claims! At such times let us remember Samuel's heroism; let us acknowledge that God's will is leading us by a right way; let us care for the flock over which we have been placed as overseers more than we care for ourselves; let us adapt ourselves to the new order; nay, let us expedite it with all the grace and grit that we can command, knowing that the blood of our self-sacrifice will, by God's blessing, be the best cement of our handiwork.

"Our Daily Bread."

SUNDAY, March 9. Genesis xliii.

"THE famine was sore"—"bereaved"—"he sought where to weep." What threads of sorrow are interwoven with human life! At the beginning it was so, and so it has continued, and to the noblest minds of our race it has ever been the problem of problems. Certainly it is the fruit of sin; but it is equally certain that God has permitted it for some wise reason, which shall abundantly justify Him when the whole mystery of Providence is made clear.

God draws a cloud over each gleaming morn:
Would we ask why?
It is because all noblest things are born
In agony.

Only upon some cross of pain or woe
God's Son may lie;
Each soul redeemed from self and sin must know
Its Calvary.

Yet we must crave for neither joy nor grief,
God chooses best:
He only knows our sick soul's best relief,
And gives us rest.

For neither life, nor death, nor things below,
Nor things above,
Shall ever sever us, that we should go
From his great love.

But how clear it is that pain has called into exercise some of the noblest traits of human character. It is evidently so in this narrative. The common sorrow brings out a chivalrous thoughtfulness in Judah, and a profound sympathy for Jacob's anguished heart in all. We can see these rough men taking a new interest in Benjamin, and yearning after the imprisoned Simeon with unwonted affection. The fountains of tears that were opened in Joseph's soul cleansed it from any beginnings of pride or ambition, which his sudden rise to fame and fortune might have brought him. We have all had similar experiences. The cutting of the pruning-knife has been very severe to bear, but we have been better without the dead wood; and though a little of the sap of life may have been spent, the loss was gain.

MONDAY, March 10. Genesis xliv.

It is a terrible revelation to the Benjamins amongst us when the cup is found in their sack. They had been so favoured, so loved, so screened; they had never gone to the excesses of Reuben and Judah; they had given rise to no evil report, like the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah (xxxvii. 2). And when they are suddenly convicted of sin, the remorse and agony are terrible. This accounts for the soul anguish of men like Cyprian, Augustine, Bunyan, and Spurgeon. They have not gone to such excesses as some, and yet their soul-agony has been most poignant and acute, and such a condition of mind cannot be satisfied apart from an exhibition of the truth of the Atonement, wherein relief is given from the sense of guilt.

The intercession of Judah for Benjamin is one of the tenderest and most pathetic incidents in the Bible. The manner in which he touches on the tenderest chords of the heart is wonderful, and reveals the depths of sympathy and love that underlie very ordinary and apparently commonplace characters. In these words of Judah, we find such intercession as man may offer for a fellow man; but they are only a feeble and insufficient copy of the intercession of our Lord. He pleads for us not only as having identified Himself with our cause, but as having died on the cross on our behalf. He is more than Brother; He is Saviour. He not only offers to do what we could never do, but He shows his hands and his side, scarred with the marks of Calvary; and God forgives not only because He is merciful, but because He is just and faithful—faithful to his promise and just to his Son. If we may dare to say so, the forgiveness of the soul who trusts in Jesus is not optional, but necessary.

TUESDAY, March 11. Genesis xlv.

Joseph's forgiveness of his brethren is as beautiful an incident as the intercession of Judah. When he was quite sure of their repentance, i.e., their change of mind, there was no longer any reason why he should withhold the revelation of himself, or his free and full forgiveness. It was a tender and touching scene. Unspoilt by the presence of strangers, the scene of reconciliation welded together the dissevered brothers, cleansed away the last fear and aloofness, and prepared the way for mutual regard and trust in the coming years.

And will Christ's forgiveness of those who have wronged Him be any less sincere? The behaviour of God's saints is an insufficient illustration of the character of God Himself. Whatever elements we find in the prism of moonlight, we shall find also in the prism of sunlight, for the one is the reflection of the other. Love is not of earth, but of heaven; it is a ray from the heart of God, who is Love. We may rise from what is best in man to the nature of God, assured that He will not be less good than the creature whom He has made. "If ye, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give good things to them that ask Him."

But Joseph's forgiveness lacked one thing. There was no evident atonement beneath it, and therefore the brethren feared that it might be withdrawn (Gen. l. 15). Now, whatever may happen in the dateless ages of eternity, that can never happen to any of us. We shall never feel that God's forgiveness may have been founded on caprice. The fact of Calvary, where Jesus was made sin for us, will ever guarantee our blessedness.

WEDNESDAY, March 12. Genesis xlvi.

All the circumstances of Jacob's life clearly pointed out the wisdom of going down into Egypt. The door was closing behind him in Canaan, and opening before him into Egypt—and always in life we may count on this double indication of God's will. The closing and the opening doors are the sure witnesses that one chapter of our life is done, and another about to open. But it is very reassuring to the soul, hesitating on the margin of the unknown and untried, to hear the voice of God, saying, "Fear not to go down into Egypt." So often Egypt had been a trap and snare to his fathers that he might well hesitate; but there was no need to fear when God Himself gave the marching-orders. There is no fear for the soul, though it go into the midst of temptation and trial, when God clearly bids it go. And He guarantees to bring it up again. When He is with us in our descent into the valley of shadow, we may count on his escort through its darkness, and his deliverance from its perils until we reascend into the realm of light.

Yes, "Joseph shall put his hand upon thine eyes." Thou shalt see those whom thou hast loved long since and lost awhile. They shall greet thy pilgrim spirit emerging from the land of its sojournings to the abode of rest and plenty. Thou shalt weep upon his neck "a good while," but the character of thy tears will be altered; they will not be those of hopeless anguish and separation, but of reunion, restoration, and and eternal joy. Be of good cheer! God is keeping thy dear ones in his holy keeping; and if thou couldst only see their state, their usefulness, their fruitfulness in the land, where they reign as kings with the Son of God, thou wouldst stay thy tears.

THURSDAY, March 13. Genesis xlvii.

The pilgrim Jacob stood before the great Pharaoh in the heart of that wonderful land, the monuments of which seem to defy the hand of Time. The contrast between the fleeting years of our human pilgrimage and the permanence of the Pyramids, the Sphinx, the river, the constellations that the Egyptians studied so carefully, seems to point the moral of man's insignificance. What is he, the creature of a few brief years, in the presence of these enduring monuments? But wait! Hear his speech! Notice the emphasis laid on that word pilgrimage! Is not this a confession that human life is but a passage across the expanse of time, that its bourne and home are not here, that it is conscious of a capacity for existence where time is not counted by ages? Yes, we know that we shall outlive the universe itself, and that we are therefore greater than matter, than things. We desire a better country; that is, a heavenly. God is not ashamed to be called our God, because He has prepared for us a city.

In the meanwhile, we need feeding, nourishing, and to be provided for. But in this, also, God will not fail us. There is nourishment and salvation for us all (12, 25). Every day will bring its daily bread; every need its sufficient supply; every temptation its way of escape.

The Lord Jesus is the true Joseph; He is both Saviour and Bread-Giver; and, probably, in all these scenes we are provided with prophetic anticipation of the time when He shall make Himself known to his brethren, and nourish them through the millennial age, which is knocking at the doors.

FRIDAY, March 14. Genesis xlviii.

This chapter proceeds with deliberation, because it foretells the enrolment of the sons of Joseph, born before Jacob's arrival in Egypt, on an equality with the rest of Jacob's children; and explains why the younger took subsequent precedence of the elder.

In death the soul looks back as well as forward. It remembers the vision of the ladder, on the bare moorland, as though it was but yesterday that it started on its memorable journey. It remembers the graves, where it has hidden its beloved from view; they stand out on the landscape, as Rachel's to the closing eyes of the patriarch. It recalls the care of the Angel of its pilgrimage, who redeemed from all evil, and led by a right way. What a survey life's close brings before us, of the incidents that have composed our history—some we would give worlds to obliterate, some we love to dwell upon, some we shall carry with us into the life of the other world. Let us so live that we may have as little as possible to regret. Better remember Rachel's grave, and death from natural causes, than the grave of love, the grave of peace, the grave of one whom we have killed by our neglect. If we would die well, let us watch and pray, let us walk in the constant thought of God, let us count that nothing is trivial or unimportant, since on the least may impinge unalterable issues.

Again we have the strange precedence given in Scripture to younger sons. One only is depicted as going into the far country to waste his substance; but Jacob, Ephraim, David and many others show that the last may be first, and the first last. By character you may reverse the order of nature.

SATURDAY, March 15. Genesis xlix.

It must have been a grand and solemn sight to see those strong mature men gathered around the bed of their dying father. His had been a great and epoch-making career, and his sun set in splendour, casting long shadows, and leaving a halo on the sky long after sundown.

As we read his predictions of the future destiny of his children, we are arrested by the fact that, apparently, the entire history of their descendants was affected for good or ill by the virtues or vices which were characteristic of their fathers. The sin of Reuben, for instance, was destined to react disastrously on the tribe that bore his name, perhaps because his character was to be reproduced in it. The vine-like beauty of Joseph was, in the same way, to affect his descendants; and because his salient features were about to re-appear in them, they were to take a foremost place in the future deeds of the chosen people. How solemn is the lesson for us all. Scientific men talk about heredity, and acknowledge its potent force in the history of families. But long before science invented the term, the thing itself was recognised.

Whatever may be the evil entail to which you have succeeded, be sure to live in such a manner that those who follow you may not succeed to an inheritance of shame, but of honour; not to a ruined estate, but to a fair possibility of glory, honour, immortality, and eternal life. Let the evil succession of years stop with you, and let the things that are true, honourable, lovely, and of good report be yours, and your children's.

London Medical Mission.

AT a prayer meeting held recently in Exeter Hall, the new superintendent of the Mission, Dr. William Warren, of Melbourne, and his wife, were cordially welcomed to their new sphere of labour. In October last Dr. Henry Soltau resigned the superintendence, in order to join Dr. Barnardo, who had invited him to render help in his great work at Stepney. He remains on the Council of the Mission.

At the meeting referred to, a cordial letter was read from Dr. Saunders, who was the first superintendent, and subsequently president of the London Medical Mission. He warmly welcomed Dr. Warren, who had been a colleague of his in this very work in the first year of the existence of the Mission. Dr. Heywood Smith, as senior member of the Council, followed with warm words of greeting, expressing the great regret at losing Dr. H. Soltau, which was felt by the Council, workers, and the people of the district. Mr. MacAdam Eccles followed in a similar strain.

After prayer by several friends, and singing, Dr. Warren spoke. He related how, over twenty years ago, he had been engaged in similar work in Endell Street and Liverpool, and subsequently in Spain, at Barcelona, until failure of health rendered it imperative that he should seek a change of climate and of work. He went into private practice in Melbourne, and found many opportunities for Christian work, both among his patients and in mission operations in that city. The Lord blessed him to the souls of many, and also prospered him in his profession. He has thus been able to respond to the invitation of the Council, though the position carries but a small salary.

Mrs. Warren spoke of the clear guidance of God in bringing them back to England after so many years in Australia, and mentioned that she and her husband had been instrumental, during the last ten years, in starting a Training Home for Lady Missionaries, during which time 120 had passed through their hands, and were now working for the Lord in different countries among the heathen. But quite recently this work had been gradually taken out of their hands by the starting of denominational training homes, and by the sudden drop in the number of candidates applying for training, through the serious events that had recently transpired in China.

The meeting concluded with prayer, after brief words of welcome from a lady who had known Dr. and Mrs. Warren in Melbourne. Dr. Terry, the acting superintendent of the Mission, and Dr. Owen, the superintendent of the Lambeth branch of the work, also spoke, remarking upon the manner in which God is still blessing the work in the salvation of souls, and how great is the need in these days, when poverty and distress and illness at this time are increasing.

Ladies' Irish Association.

THIS noble Society, which has been at work since 1821, is sorely in want of funds to carry on its labour of love. Our Scripture readers tell of a Saviour who is all-sufficient to meet the need of every sinner, and make their words more welcome by speaking in Irish to those who still love their mother-tongue. A blessed work is done by night-schools, and by assisting clergymen in poor parishes to maintain Protestant teachers, where otherwise the instruction would be wholly of a Romanist character. A third object is the relief of distress among those who have known better days, by distributing clothes and assisting widows and orphans in time of trial. Help is also given to the families of poor clergymen. Information will be gladly furnished by the Secretary, 24, Clare Street, Dublin. Clothes or money may be addressed to me at Cromlyn, Edgeworthstown, Ireland.

Homes for Motherless Children. — The Twentieth Century addition made to the Homes for Motherless in 1900 cost £1,400, of which £300 is still unpaid. It is hoped that this may be given by March 9, a lady friend being willing to give the last £50. The founder is Mr. R. T. Smith, 90, Thornton Avenue, Chiswick.

Country Towns Mission.

THE work of the Country Towns Mission has long been held in esteem for its thoroughness and directness. The efforts of the missionaries in the smaller towns and villages of the country have borne rich fruit. Day by day these devoted evangelists visit the homes of the people, reading the Scriptures, and endeavouring to make known the way of salvation.

From a Cornish district comes a report which says:—"E. K., eighty-six years of age, who fell asleep in Jesus, was returned as a hopeful convert by this Mission about eighteen years ago. At one of my cottage meetings, when the Lord pardoned her sins, I remember seeing her rise from her knees and jump for joy, praising God for his mercy to her. She afterwards joined a Christian church. She had been bedridden for about five years, and, though weak and blind, she was one of the brightest of Christians, with her faith in God strong. It was quite an inspiration to all who knew her,' so says the minister of the church to which she belonged."

Village visitation is not infrequently of an arduous character, but there is room for much encouragement in many parts of the land. A worker in Hampshire writes:—"I have visited through eight villages, five of these twice over, besides several hamlets and outlying farm-houses. In some of these I was told no one was in the habit of calling to pay them a visit. I have seen some interesting cases in which the Word seemed to have come home to the heart. The Lord's people have very much enjoyed the visits. I have paid extra attention to the sick and aged."

The missionaries are ever ready to adopt fresh means that seem likely to prove effective in impressing the people. "I was asked," writes a worker in a Gloucestershire town, "to bring a tent to a low locality, where much unsuccessful effort had been expended to get the people to church or chapel. It was hoped the tent might prove an inducement. It was so rough at the opening services that we had to call in the help of the police, but after that, by taking due precaution, we were able to go on. Every night for a month, and twice on Sunday, the tent was filled with just the class of people wanted, and sometimes there were as many outside as inside. The clergyman of the parish rejoiced to see it, and came and gave a helpful address. The power of the Spirit of God was felt there: almost every night souls were convicted and some came out decidedly for the Lord."

The offices of the mission have lately been removed; Mr. G. H. Mawer, the secretary, should now be addressed, 12, Serjeant's Inn, Fleet Street, E.C.

Dublin Visiting Mission.

VISITING in the city of Dublin is by no means an easy undertaking. The difficulty arises in part from the ignorance of the people, and in part from the sad way in which the working-classes are huddled together in wretched rooms of tenement houses, their surroundings tending towards degradation rather than godliness of living.

By the work of visitation the people are sought out, their prejudices and suspicions overcome, and their confidence won. By means of the funds collected, a permanent staff of sixteen trained men and women is retained on regular mission work, visiting in the city, holding meetings and classes, and in turns itinerating in country districts, at village fairs, &c. Children are gathered in this way for the Ragged Schools, where some 400 are daily taught by mission teachers.

Cabmen, dockers, and sailors have had their share of attention. Groups of men at dinner hour, parties of sailors on board ship, singly and in numbers the toilers of the quays—can be approached. The openings for the missionary are many, and his work among them particularly hopeful. The Dublin Visiting Mission is connected with the Society for Irish Church Missions, and communications may be addressed to the Secretary, 35, Upper Fitzwilliam Street, Dublin.

Stratford Conference Hall.

THE annual meeting in connection with that busy and thriving centre of evangelistic activities, the Conference Hall, Stratford, E., is a function always fraught with interest and encouragement to those who maintain Gospel work amid populous working-class districts.

At the gathering held on Wednesday week, Mr. C. Boardman, who presided over a large attendance of friends and supporters, gave a brief but entirely satisfactory account of the operations. From the printed report it is evident that the hearty and vigorous workers connected with the Hall have continued, with fruitfulness, their earnest labours in the spiritual interests of the outside masses. The evangelistic meetings in the large hall, and the various undertakings which have had their origin therefrom, are in a flourishing condition.

ENTHUSIASTIC MISSION BANDS.

Many departments of Christian effort are maintained by the useful organization of members known as the Mizpah Band. Lantern services, testimony and missionary gatherings, have been regular sources of attraction and helpfulness, and temperance work has also occupied an important place. A typical extract from the diary of a member reads:—

"A 'bus conductor came into the office one morning and said, 'I want to sign the pledge, please'; this he was soon able to do, and after the name had been affixed, he said, 'I want to ask another favour; will you pray for me?' He was soon on his knees, pleading with God to forgive his sin, and imploring strength to overcome the drink. Any Sunday now he may be seen at the services, his cheery face witnessing that God heard and answered prayer." A number of speakers, assisted by the Crusaders' Brass Band, have continued services in the district on Lord's Day mornings, and several week-day evenings. At these services large numbers of tracts are distributed, and the workers in that spirit of fervent evangelism which is among the happiest characteristics of the Conference Hall people, are quick to seize opportunities for pointing the anxious to the Lord Jesus Christ.

Another strong force of missioners is the well-known Male Choir, whose work, however, is not confined to Stratford, their abilities and zeal having created a wide demand for their services. In addition to singing many pieces with charm and expression, some of the members whose life stories are packed with experiences beyond the common, give striking and effective testimonies, which awaken interest and serious thought.

Other bands of workers deal with the spiritual needs of different sections of the poorest classes; the common lodging-houses, for example, are visited every Lord's Day by bands of speakers and singers, who meet with great encouragement as they deliver their message to the Ishmaels of society.

FOUR GOLDEN LINKS.

Following the custom of other years, the annual meeting was chiefly devoted to addresses for the stimulus of Christians. After Mr. Boardman's address came a pointed sermonette from Rev. Evan H. Hopkins, who spoke from Rom. xv. 29 on "Fulness of Blessing." "Our great need is Christ Himself—not a creed, however sound; not a church, however orthodox; not a system, however perfect—but the Lord." Mr. Hopkins connected his address with "four golden links" from the words of his text: "Christ, the Gospel, blessing, and fulness of blessing." He concluded with an appeal for personal consecration. "We may have it all set out with beautiful clearness in our minds, but have we the rich experience?"

Rev. Albert Swift, of East Dulwich Congregational Church, who has during recent months given a series of Bible readings at the Conference Hall, with much acceptance, delivered the concluding address, which was a luminous utterance on the transforming power of the Holy Spirit in life, character, and service.

An Aggressive Church,

AND ITS PASTOR.

IT was in October, 1899, that the Dulwich Grove Congregational Church called Rev. Albert Swift to be its pastor. The invitation was unanimous, and the choice gave satisfaction to all concerned. Mr. Swift is not a child of Congregationalism, but a convert to its methods and polity. Being converted in Wesleyan Methodism at the age of fourteen, in two years he was placed on the plan, "on trial," and was soon received as an accredited local preacher.

When eighteen he desired to enter the Wesleyan ministry, but it was found that he had overgrown his strength, and he was considered ineligible. Turning aside from the inviting paths of a promising business career, his energies were spent in evangelistic labours, and (in association with Rev. G. Campbell Morgan for several years) nearly every part of the country was visited. Subsequently Mr. Morgan settled down to a pastorate, and, in 1891, his friend married, and proceeded to the United States.

Here he entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church. His first charge was a small church at Bradley Beach, a village adjoining Ocean Grove, the historic Methodist Camp Meeting ground. Later, a move was made to New Lisbon, on the border of the New Jersey pine forests, where some real missionary work was done. He was next appointed junior pastor of the Calvary Methodist Episcopal Church, New York, the largest Methodist church in the city. Here the young minister had an exceptional training in pastoral work and church organization, his colleague being Rev. A. B. Kendig, D.D., one of the most successful pastors in the denomination. During his ministry the needs of the young people always claimed a large share of his attention; and though not associated with the Christian Endeavour movement in the States, he performed valuable service in connection with the Epworth League, a kindred organization. To him it was always a matter of regret that the League was instituted in place of Christian Endeavour by the Methodist Churches of America.

In 1899 Mr. Swift and his family removed once more to England, but it was not without many regrets that he bade farewell to his numerous friends in the States and returned to the homeland. For some time before leaving America Mr. Swift had questioned himself as to whether he should still continue in Methodism, and after much prayer he decided to exchange its ministry for that of the Congregational type, trusting God to open up the way in due time to a pastorate of the order toward which he believed he was being divinely led. Joining New Court Chapel as a member, he remained in fellowship for a period of nine months, during which he rendered good service on the staff of this paper. Then, as already stated, he received and accepted a unanimous call to East Dulwich Grove. The public recognition of the new pastor will be fresh in the minds of many. Taking to his new sphere of service all the evangelistic passion of his former labours, he has displayed an enthusiasm which no failure could damp, and an ardour which no disappointment could chill. The whole energy of his consecrated manhood has been thrown into the work of an ambassador for Christ.

In his presentation of the Gospel, Mr. Swift adheres to the belief that the Christian religion is more than an influence, touching the life at certain times and places; he emphasizes the fact that it is a new life with a new purpose and ideal—an ideal involving a passionate personal devotion to Christ, growing out of constant communion with Him, and an ideal which leads Christians to identify themselves wholeheartedly with the purposes of Christ in the redemption of the world.

Mr. Swift's two years' ministry at East Dulwich is a remarkable record. In 1899 the church was receiving aid. Now it is entirely independent of Union assistance. The membership, at that time 180, now numbers 330. On all sides there has been an extension, and through the pressure of a steadily-growing work, pastor and deacons have been compelled to face the necessity of providing accommodation for the numbers who were unable to gain admission to the services. The school was equally crowded, and without further accommodation children must have been turned from the doors. To meet the need, a church-extension and debt-extinction scheme was launched a few months ago, and the work of enlarging both church and school was put in hand. The alterations comprise the placing of side galleries in the church, and the removal of organ and choir to a position behind the pulpit, providing 340 additional sittings. In the rear of the church a ladies' parlour, and pastor's and deacons' vestries have been erected. A gallery in the school provides four additional class rooms, with another over the new heating chamber. These, together with the vestries, add upwards of 200 seats to the capacity of the school. The entire cost of the extension, it is expected, will amount to something like £3,500. The task of raising this sum has been heartily taken up by the church, and there is great hopefulness that when the result of the re-opening effort is made known the entire sum will be covered by cash in hand and written promises.

REV. ALBERT SWIFT.

Wherein lies the secret of this success? is a question which readily suggests itself. Without doubt it is in the maintenance of a true evangelistic ministry—unsensational, yet always intense, bringing everything to serve the one object of winning souls for the Master. Mr. Swift's bright and genial personality, and his genuine brotherly feeling towards his people, has, in turn, drawn out their frank confidence and affection, and created a homely atmosphere in every circle of the Church's activity. As one of his deacons once remarked to us: "He takes his share in every department of the work. He never says, Go; it is always, Come!"

In the midst of absorbing work, Mr. Swift finds time to render assistance to organizations outside his own church at Dulwich. Last year he was President of the South London Union of Christian Endeavour, and during his term of office visited every society affiliated to the Union, and initiated a forward movement productive of widespread blessing. His earnest efforts and skilful organization in this connection were cordially acknowledged at the annual meeting of the Union, when Mr. Swift was presented by the young people with a beautifully illuminated address. Influence over young people is a marked feature of his ministry. Our readers will remember his contribution to our recent series of articles upon THE CHURCH AND THE CHILDREN,* in which he described a new and effective method of shepherding the juvenile converts of last year's Simultaneous Mission.

The reopening services of Mr. Swift's church commenced on Monday last, when there was a large rally of members and friends. In the afternoon Rev. C. Silvester Horne, M.A., Kensington, conducted a service, and preached a powerful and impressive sermon on the subject of Jonah and the Gourd. (Jonah iv. 9-11).

A social gathering in the Lecture Hall followed, after which opportunity for inspecting the additions and alterations to the church was taken advantage of. From every point of view the utility and effect of the alterations are beyond praise, and the sacred edifice well merits the admiration which on Monday was expressed on every hand. At the evening gathering, the church was filled, and the heart of the pastor must have been greatly cheered as he witnessed so warm an expression of loyalty and practical sympathy, not only from his own people, but from friends connected with neighbouring churches.

The proceedings were under the presidency of Mr. SAMUEL FIGGIS, who spoke words of hearty congratulation to the congregation on resuming the worship of God in so beautiful a building. He recalled his association with the church in its early days. The seed sown twenty years ago is bearing fruit to-day; and the speaker urged upon the young men and women particularly to gather round their pastor and to energise and encourage him in his toil. Mr. Figgis promised to contribute £50 toward the renovation fund, an announcement which was cordially received by the audience.

Rev. THOMAS NICHOLSON, in the course of a helpful address, appealed for a thoughtful consideration of a more momentous undertaking than the erection of buildings on earth—the structure of the spiritual edifice which goes on unseen, and results in Christian loyalty, love, consecration and devotion to the service of Christ. Rev. H. J. HAFFER, a former pastor at East Dulwich, brought hearty greetings from Congregationalists at Harpenden, and gave an earnest and timely address.

In the course of a statement relative to the building fund, Mr. Swift spoke of the inception of the scheme, and the heartiness with which it has been taken up by the congregation. He expressed the hope that before long the whole of the amount necessary would be forthcoming.

The proceedings throughout were of an inspiring nature, and augur well for the future. Friends far and near will wish for pastor and church a continuance of that Divine favour which has been so manifestly bestowed in the past.

North London Gospel Samaritan Mission.—The past year was one of much encouragement to the workers of this Mission. The gatherings in the hall in Grove Road have been seasons of happy service, and to the joy of Christian fellowship has been added the joy of witnessing the power of God in the conversion of sinners. The ladies of the Mission hold services for the children weekly; while the Christian Endeavour Society has proved a source of much blessing. The efforts in the open-air have been productive of much good, and many have cause to thank the Mission preachers for their proclamation of the Gospel. With the object of extending the usefulness of the mission, a "sister" has been engaged for visiting the poor in their homes and ministering to their varied needs. The hon. pastor of the Mission is Mr. Henry Bird, 83, Isledon Road, Holloway, N.

THE LATE

Rev. George C. Needham.

EVANGELIST AND BIBLE TEACHER.

A LONG and useful career in the work of the Lord has been brought to a close by the death of Rev. George Carter Needham, which took place on February 16, at Narberth, a suburb of Philadelphia. Many years ago it was said of him that he was noted as a conscientious and industrious worker, well qualified in the best sense of the word for the calling of an evangelist. His life and work in later years confirmed even more fully this high estimate of his character.

Though mainly identified with the United States, Mr. Needham was a native of Ireland, having been born on the shores of the Bay of Kenmare. As the household were closely surrounded by Roman Catholic influences, religious questions were constantly in the front; and this family of ten boys and girls enjoyed the inestimable blessing and privilege of careful Evangelical Protestant training. In after years he recalled that as early as his sixth year he was decidedly impressed through hearing one of his elder sisters tell over at home what she remembered of a sermon on the Second Coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. While he was still a youth, Ireland passed through the great revival of 1858 and 1859; but it was not till 1861, when the wave of blessing seemed to a large extent spent, that George Needham received such a share of the outpouring as enabled him to rank himself among the open followers of the Saviour. He was then in his eighteenth year; and the value of the early training was abundantly seen in all his after life. He was the child of many prayers, notably those of his mother, who died when he was but eight years of age, and the family has been one fruitful in Christian service.

Entering on business life in Dublin at the age of nineteen, his high Christian character was soon recognised and valued by his employers. Though naturally of a timid disposition, he dared not be silent on behalf of his heavenly Master; and at the end of a year of testimony among his acquaintances and neighbours, he came to the conclusion that he was under a definite call to give his life to Christian service. Several years of evangelistic work in Ireland proved that the young man had chosen wisely, and an invitation to visit England was accepted. At Kelvedon, in Essex, Rev. Charles H. Spurgeon met him, and found so much to commend that he rather discouraged an idea Mr. Needham had formed of entering the Pastors' College, recommending him rather to give uninterrupted attention to evangelization. Accepting this advice, the evangelist went on with his work, drawing his theology all the more simply from the Bible, because he had not come under the personal influence of human preceptors; and showing year by year, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, a deepening insight into Scriptural truth.

In 1866, Mr. Needham accompanied Rev. (now Dr.) H. Grattan Guinness on a visit to Ireland, during which signs of the Divine blessing abounded. People flocked to the services in thousands, and conversions were numerous. In 1867, he met Mr. D. L. Moody on the first visit paid by the great evangelist to this country, and formed a friendship which endured while life lasted, the bond of mutual affection being a strong one. The new connection opened up the way shortly afterwards for Mr. Needham to pay a visit to America, in the company of one of his sisters who was out of health, and greatly desired to meet other members of the family then living in the United States.

A letter of introduction from Mr. Spurgeon helped him on his arrival; but the ability and earnestness of his work were his best credentials, and the three months for which the visit was originally planned were extended until the postponement became indefinite. Marriage with a Massachusetts lady led to practical settlement in the United States. During a honeymoon visit of three months to Chicago, the couple were guests of Mr. Moody, and enjoyed the pleasure and privilege of fellowship with Major Whittle and other leading American workers and preachers.

The outstanding feature of Mr. Needham's utterances was an unusual power of elucidating Scripture. When conducting an evangelistic mission, he always left a deep impress on the minds of converts and helpers through the system of careful instruction which he followed. God owned and blessed the use of his own Word. This was seen in all the principal cities of the United States, the after instruction of young people being specially provided for by the formation of branches of the Y.M.C.A., as well as in a wider sense by the preparation of suitable literature. Many large conferences of Christians were arranged at suitable centres for the consideration of prophetical and other Biblical topics, as well as the discussion of questions affecting Christian teaching and effort.

THE LATE REV. G. C. NEEDHAM.

From Photograph by Messrs. A. and G. Taylor, Manchester.

Among wider efforts, Mr. and Mrs. Needham paid an extended visit to Japan, on the invitation of leading Christian workers, for the purpose of conducting Bible conferences among missionaries, teachers, and their families; holding evangelistic meetings among the English-speaking communities, preaching to the young men of the high schools, and visiting and instructing the native congregations. Open doors were found on every hand; and the visitor was enabled to do much in the way of directing and leading the youthful church of the island empire. During visits to the home lands he found his native Ireland a fruitful field, and in England also many friends joyfully gathered round one whose useful career they had followed with prayerful interest and thanksgiving.

Mrs. Needham, who has accompanied her husband on many of his journeys, has proved herself a true helpmeet in the Lord, and an able coadjutor. Her pen has been fruitful in writings, of warning to the sinner, and of upbuilding to the saint. Belonging to the old Puritan stock of New England, she had, like Mr. Needham, been well versed in the Scriptures during her childhood. To this, study and meditation added a facility for communicating to others her own clear understanding of the truth. For her, many prayers have gone up in the dark hour of bereavement, that the comfort with which she has so long and so often comforted others may bring her now into an understanding of the dealings and purposes of the Lord. Like Barnabas, Mr. Needham was "a good man, full of the Holy Ghost." We ourselves cherish many holy and happy memories of days of fellowship with our dear friend and his wife, on both sides of the Atlantic. The loss to the church is a great one, but in the truest sense his works do follow him.

Earthquake in Russia.

THE accounts I receive from my beloved friends in Baku about the terrible destruction by earthquake of the town of Shemakha, and of a number of villages in the Caucasus, claim our sympathy. There are altogether 4,500 houses destroyed; of Armenians twenty-nine lives have been lost, but of Mohammedans over 1,000. One friend writes that "about 100 villages have been shaken, and the earth is still shaking by volcanic upheavals. Many thousands are without home, camping in the fields, and the temperature is unusually cold, with snow falling. The people are needing food and warm clothing."

Shemakha was a flourishing town on the height of the Caucasus, which I have several times visited, and where the preaching of the Gospel was not in vain. There was a community of Evangelical Christians who dated their life from the visits of Count Zaremba and other labourers, and whose light shone brightly in the towns and villages of the mountains.

When, on one occasion, I visited the Christians in Shemakha, they told me how an earthquake had destroyed part of the town, and that eighteen men of their community had been killed by the fall of their preaching-hall, just when they were assembled for service on Lord's Day morning. A beloved Armenian pastor, Hambarzum, stepping out from his room, on the point of opening the service, saw before him the roof falling down, and people killed on the spot. They afterwards rebuilt the houses, and the traces of the earthquake were obliterated; and the town flourished as a fruit-growing and silk-weaving centre.

Only in September last I was with Mr. and Mrs. Morgan in Baku, and we were then contemplating a visit to Shemakha, but our time being very limited we did not carry out our intention. My friend, Patwakan Tarrajanz, has spent some weeks preaching and visiting the sick and needy, so that there has been no lack of a clear testimony. He writes that distress is very great, and he will be pleased to distribute any help that may be entrusted to him. His address is Patwakan Tarrajanz, 29, Shemakhinskaja, Baku, Transcaucasia.

Demon Possession in Russia.

FOLLOWING on the description given in my last of the Gift of Tongues, I want to narrate the essence of a most interesting conversation at the breakfast-table with Baron von Uexküll and others.

He introduced it by speaking of an Esthonian lady, a governess, who was called in to see a dying man. As she spoke of Christ he cursed, and refused to hear anything of the Gospel. To all appearance he died the same night. When she went to the house on the next day he was lying on the bed apparently dead. However, she felt impelled to lay her hands on him, with the result that he recovered animation, and awoke not only to consciousness, but to a devout faith in the Gospel, in which he died some six hours after. I do not quote this as an instance of the raising from the dead, because he might have been in a coma; but it is a remarkable incident, specially his reception of Jesus Christ.

There was another story told by a Christian physician, who has a house for the treatment of nervous diseases, of a little boy of six who was brought to him as having tried to hang himself. The child said that as he was playing near his mother's house a man came to him and told him what he must do. Evidently this was a mere impression on the child's mind, as there was no man of the description about the place. The child seemed in constant dread of this person returning, until prayer brought him peace.

The Baron also told of a man of his acquaintance who occupied a farm on his estate, and who was under the power of what seemed to be a nervous disease. The Baron asked him to kneel in prayer, and repeat the words of petition after himself, which the young man did, until he came to the name of Jesus—this he refused to repeat. When the Baron insisted on his saying it, and with a great effort he did so, he fell on the ground with a scream. The Baron bade the evil spirit come forth, which it appeared to do, leaving the man exhausted but well.

A similar instance was related of an old and wealthy count, who was subject to fits of ungovernable passion, and was the terror of his wife and children. But when, in answer to definite prayer, God gave power to his servant to command the evil spirit to go forth, he became calm and gentle, and afterwards died in the full faith of Christ.

On one occasion, Count Pashkoff, with some other believers, prayed for four hours for a man who all the while was mocking them, and saying that their efforts were useless, that there was not one demon only in possession, but many. Finally, when in despair the Count said, "Lord Jesus, we have no power at all to drive forth this evil spirit. Do thou do it," there was an evident going forth of some evil influence, and the man became subdued and quiet.

Another terrible incident was told me by the Count of a man whom he knew in the early days of his religious life, and whom the neighbours had imprisoned in a large iron cage, the bars being of terrific strength. And whenever any were brought in to see him, he held out towards them a silver rouble, saying, "This is my God, this is my God." I confess that these incidents have greatly impressed me. I wonder how far it would be right to deal with certain forms of impurity and drunkenness as being cases of demon-possession. It may be that there is more of this demon work among ourselves than we know, and specially in cases of mania. The Baron told me that once, when visiting an asylum, there was a great movement among the patients on his entrance of the wards, as though they recognized in him the power of the living Saviour.

My friend, Baron Nicolai, also says that in his judgment there is a great indifference between demon-influence and demon-possession: and reminds me that Dr. Howard Taylor has said that in China he was accustomed to diagnose the symptoms of demon-possession in the same way as of any other disease.

These things make me feel more and more the desire to be not only influenced, but possessed by the Holy Spirit. They invest the Day of Pentecost with an altogether new significance. It may be that the evil around us is to a larger extent than we have ever realized the result of the distinct operation of Satan and his agents, and therefore our one need is to seek such a mighty infilling and possession of the Spirit of God that the power of the evil one may be cast out by a stranger.

A godly man, who is just now greatly afflicted in the town where I am writing these words, confesses to be always conscious of an evil spirit who is perpetually beside him, and is constantly denying the truth of Christianity, and the Deity and power of Christ. He has been a bright and useful servant of the Lord Jesus, until this has befallen him, and he is greatly tried by it. What depths of Satan there are! What mysterious influences may not be affecting the currents and movements of our time! We may be in the presence of mighty spiritual forces, which we are endeavouring to combat by wholly intellectual methods, forgetting that only Spirit can cast out spirit.

I am passing no personal opinion on these matters. But it seems as if suddenly I had been brought into contact with the conditions of the early Church. Here again is the mighty power of Divine manifestation, and here the forces of the evil one. They drive one to first principles, to read the Bible again from a new standpoint, and to pray to experience more and more the power of the Divine Spirit, that one may be able to try and cast out the spirits.

Prohibition in Canada.

[FROM A CORRESPONDENT.]

CANADA bids fair to maintain the lead in the temperance cause. During the last half century there has been a wonderful decrease in drinking. All over the land buildings which were once public licences are now closed or doing service as private dwellings. The decrease, too, in licensed taverns has been great. Twenty-five years ago there were in Ontario 4,793 tavern licences; to-day there are 2,621. During the same time the shop licences have been reduced from 1,307 to 308, the wholesale licences from fifty-two to twenty-one; while the thirty-three vessel licences have been abolished altogether. Ontario is undoubtedly one of the most progressive provinces in the Dominion in these matters, but in the other provinces the march is also onward.

At present there is a strong movement looking toward prohibition in differents parts of the Dominion. Twenty months ago the Province of Manitoba passed a stringent prohibitory measure, the legality of which was at once challenged. From court to court this Act was carried with varying degrees of success, until two months ago the Privy Council of England declared it constitutional. The Act is now before the Provincial Legislature for enforcement at the end of the licence year; but there is some fear that Premier Rablin will evade responsibity by a referendum. The prohibitionists are most determined that this shall not be, and demand that the Act be enforced like other laws on the Statute-book. In Prince Edward Island, too, is an Act waiting for the end of the licence year to become law.

At the moment of writing the chief interest centres on the Province of Ontario, where a measure similar to that of Manitoba is before the Legislature. This will be submitted to the people on October 14, and, if sustained, will become law in May, 1904. To make this Bill valid a majority vote will be required; but the majority must be more than one-half of the votes polled at the provincial elections, which will take place before the referendum. Strong protests are being made against this condition by members of the Dominion Alliance, because a referendum will not call out so large a vote as the general elections. The president and the secretary have issued a circular calling a provincial convention to consider the matter, in which they say that "prohibitionists will be thus handicapped so as to make their success almost impossible." These fears are, however, not general, and prohibitionists anticipate a large majority on the voting day.

The Jerry McAuley Missions.

By MAURICE GREGORY.

IT has been my great privilege recently to pay a number of visits to the Jerry McAuley Missions in New York. The first visit was to the original mission in Water Street. Some time before I arrived there I felt nervous about my watch and pocket-book, and wished that I had left them behind. The previous evening I had been at dinner at the house of a friend "up town," and he had been telling me how little visible drunkenness there was. If he had gone down to Water Street he would have seen plenty of it. When I got to the meeting, I was at first somewhat disappointed, for about sixty per cent. of those present were smart, respectable-looking men, apparently well-to-do men of business, and their clerks. Several such were on the platform. The rest of the audience was composed of poor wrecks, one or two of whom had clean faces, and tidy, though wretchedly poor clothes.

My disappointment, however, was changed into absorbed interest as the meeting went on, and these smart business-men gave their experiences one after another of being saved from the very lowest depths of drunkenness and debauchery, from theft, and in some cases from delirium tremens. Almost every one finished his "experience" with the statement of the number of years, months, and days since the Lord Jesus Christ had lifted him out of the horrible pit, and we had the whole range from one who had been saved from even the desire for drink for "twenty-three years, nine months, and eleven days," down to one of the poor tidy men aforesaid, who tremblingly thanked the Lord Jesus Christ for his saving power for twenty-four hours. Everything was very quiet and orderly, with perfect freedom from sensationalism, and the possibility of salvation from the lowest depths was looked upon in a cool, business-like, matter-of-fact way that was both novel and refreshing. One poor fellow, who looked as though he was on the verge of dissolution, got up and said that for a long time past he had felt that there was no hope for him, but after what he had heard that night he could say so no longer.

Several came out at the end of the meeting to be quietly prayed for and talked with by those present, and I understand that this has been going on steadily night after night, and month after month, and year after year for over thirty years. Jerry McAuley himself died some years ago. His portrait is that of a refined, intellectual-looking man; but he kept his old drunkard's nickname to the end, as a help to others who were like what he once was. A large motto, "No compromise with sin," faced the audience, and "cant" or insincerity in religious expression was several times almost sharply denounced.

At one of the meetings a judge presided, who was one of the converts of the mission, and who had risen to his present position from the lowest depths. The police under the administration just going out of office in New York are said by some to be a corrupt body of men. I do not know how far that is true, but it was most interesting to me to note the interest that would light up their faces when I mentioned Jerry McAuley's Missions, and how perfectly they knew where they were, even if I was a mile away.

Rev. G. Soltau's Bible Lectures.—At the Friends' Meeting House, Harlesden, Rev. George Soltau is giving a series of Bible lectures on Tuesday evenings dealing with the Books of Genesis and Exodus. Those who have attended have found the addresses highly instructive and helpful, as Mr. Soltau has brought out of his treasury "things new and old." The lectures are to be continued each Tuesday during March, at 8 p.m.

BRITISH SEAMEN ON THE WESER.

Writing of Gospel work among British seamen at Bremerhaven, Geestemunde, Nordenham, Brake, and Bremen, Mr. J. Jones says:—"Our head-quarters are at Bremerhaven (11a Lloyd-strasse), where we have regular Sunday meetings and other work. In the other four ports there are no Gospel services or meetings of any kind, and the seamen are surrounded by temptations, without a helping hand stretched out to assist them. Their case is much worse than that of sailors in English ports, and we are nearly powerless to help for lack of funds. If we had the means we could stay a night in each of these ports every week, hold a Gospel meeting, and help in other ways. A few sets of slides, including copies of Gospel hymns, and a lantern, are much needed."

ENGLISH-SPEAKING YOUNG MEN IN PARIS.

Will you allow me to make a last and urgent appeal on behalf of the extension scheme of our Anglo-American Young Men's Christian Association, which the directors have thought better to close by April 1 next? We have only been able to realize £646 (collected and promised) out of the £3,000 urgently needed for the execution of the scheme, whereby we wished to afford our British and American young men in Paris suitable, larger, and attractive rooms, to which they could resort for their spiritual welfare as well as for material and intellectual comforts, thus to draw them away from the innumerable fascinating snares which they meet on all sides in the beautiful, gay, frivolous French metropolis. CONVERSIONS IN BRAZIL.

The latest intelligence from Sao Paulo (Mr. R. J. Young, Largo da Liberdade, 62) is of a most cheering character.

"One reward that has come to us is the salvation of three souls here. The first to declare his faith in the Lord Jesus is a Spanish shoemaker who had, for many weeks, been attending the meetings in the hall at Braz. He listened seriously and attentively, and deliberately chose to forsake all his sins and to receive Christ as his Saviour. He has since then been running well, although much tempted and tried. His wife, seeing the remarkable change in him, is almost persuaded, and we hope to see her, too, born of God's Spirit.

"Mr. Glass and Senor Jose and his wife are fighting valiantly at Santos, and are doing good work. In the midst of great temptations and pressure, God has enabled them to win six precious souls during one month. Santos is not only unevangelized, but is a hotbed of spiritualism, and of all sorts of spiritual wickedness, not to mention the unbridled licentiousness that prevails there. Therefore the conversion of these souls—five men and one woman—means a severe conflict with the powers of darkness, but thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. We ask you to continue to pray for Santos and the workers there. Their November report is: meetings, 23; attendance, 1,484; tracts, 832; visits, 916; seven persons professed conversion, though two of them have since gone back; Bibles, 38; Testaments, 94; Gospels, 214."

"ALL THINGS TO ALL MEN."

Reporting on his work, Mr. John Christian, an evangelist of London Society's Malayalam Mission, writes: "This year I went to many Christian houses, and knowing their spiritual condition, I told them of the right way of living the truly Christian life; and, in addition to that, I also visited Hindoo houses numbering about 1,620, and to each individual soul I spoke of the blessed Saviour. Among these the Brahmins and the Hindoos (the high caste) are somewhat learned, and, therefore, the work among them must be of a learned nature. But the others, such as Pulayas, Pariyas, Kuravas, and Elavas (low caste), being of an opposite nature, must be taught in a manner by which they can easily understand. As a result of my work among the high caste some are willing to read the Bible. I sold ten Holy Bibles, and about thirty other Biblical books. In my work among the low caste, I find many convenient places where we can start new missions. But their masters (the high caste) are a stumbling block to their being converted to Christianity. Both among the high and the low, lantern pictures are found to be very useful."

A USEFUL TELUGU PAPER.

The valuable help rendered by the Press in missionary work receives new confirmation in a recent letter from the Canadian Mission at Cocanada, India. Referring to the Ravi a little paper published in Telugu, Rev. H. F. Laflamme writes:—

"The paper is reaching, with the Gospel message, a large class of men whom it is very difficult to get at in any ordinary way. They do not attend any church, they are too proud and high to stand and listen to the Message in the street, they are not sufficiently interested to buy any books or literature on the subject. So the only way to take them is in some such as this, and it is effective too, as many words from all over the country go to confirm. Of course, it is not so direct and definite as the preaching of the Word, but it has a wonderful effect in the way of breaking down and heading off opposition, and of creating an atmosphere that is helpful to the reception of the Truth. You know how desirable that is. If the Press of a people is antagonistic, then we have one of the mightiest foes arrayed against us. The effort in connection with the Ravi is to capture that stronghold for Christ. We have a good, pure, and strong advocate of all that we know will be pleasing to Him in this sheet."

CHINESE Y.M.C.A. IN CONFERENCE.

The third National Convention of the College Young Men's Christian Association of China was held at Nanking, November 7-10 inclusive. The Chinese delegates, who numbered 131, were a singularly representative body of native Christians, comprising pastors, preachers, teachers, and students of fifteen different denominations, from eight provinces. The foreign delegates numbered nearly forty, and represented fourteen missionary societies. Representatives from Japan, Korea, and Hongkong were also present. Over five hundred Chinese students, pastors, teachers, Christians, and missionaries from Nanking and surrounding districts were also in attendance.

The objects of the Convention were (1) to discuss and pray over problems and methods of winning young men for Christ, and (2) to consider the place that Christian young men must hold in the work of evangelizing China. The addresses given, in many instances by missionaries of wide experience and recognised ability, were of a practical character, dealing with the cultivation of the spiritual life as indispensable to fruitful service and the methods to be adopted. The inspiring and heart-searching messages given by Mr. John R. Mott, on "Christians of Reality," "The Use of the Tongue," and "Be Filled with the Spirit" made a profound impression upon the minds of many. Over seventy men signified their decision for Christ, while 150 Christian young men recorded their determination to claim victory over specific besetting sins. Another striking practical result of the Convention was the contribution of over 1,000dols. Mex. (about £100) by the Chinese delegates for the work of the National Committee. J. S.

Armenian Mission in Bulgaria.—As a refugee for Christ's sake from his own country (Armenia), Rev. H. Y. Yardumian has organised the Armenian Evangelical Mission among his own countrymen and others scattered over Bulgaria. The fact that so many persecuted Christians from Armenia found a refuge among the free institutions of Bulgaria opens up special opportunities for carrying on Christian work among them. Mr. Yandumian is at present on a visit to England, desirous of awakening the interest and sympathy of Christians at home in the needs of his countrymen, and with this object in view will be glad of opportunities for addressing congregations. He may be addressed at 62, Constantine-road, Hampstead, N.W.

Mr. Inglis at Chicago.

MR. CHAS. INGLIS has been in Chicago during the last five weeks, holding special services.

The first part of the time the meetings were held in the Chicago Avenue (Moody's) Church, and it was a cheering sight to see that place crammed on Sundays, with large audiences through the week. Many have found Christ during the services, and numbers are rejoicing in a newly-found Saviour. One special feature of the work at the Moody Church is the great gatherings that they have every Saturday with Mr. Newell and others.

Mr. Inglis during the Saturday nights of January was addressing something like 2,000 Christian workers on the Sunday-School lesson. Since the mission closed in the Moody Church he has been having a united mission in some of the churches on the north side of the city.

The spirit of hearing has been very marked, so much so, that he has been lecturing and preaching from sixteen to twenty times a week.

The afternoon Bible readings, especially for the well-to-do people, God seems to have signally owned, and many of God's people are realizing that the Old Book is a new Book to them.

Since leaving Chicago, he has been preaching to large numbers of men in Washington, and hopes to address the students of Princeton University at Princeton, N.J., and to visit Bridgeport, Conn., for missions. He was expecting to reach England in March.

Seamen at Zanzibar.

YEAR by year the many-sided work of the Zanzibar Strangers' Rest continues to be owned of God in the making known among the multidude of sailors visiting the port of the plan of salvation through Christ.

The need for such efforts as Mr. and Mrs. Knapman are making is often emphasized; only recently a ship carrying 270 men was in the harbour, and of this number—all British sailors—only one professed to be a Christian. On another vessel were two Scotchmen, who were firemen, to whom Mr. Knapman gave a copy of the Psalms. The following Sunday one of them went to the Rest, and said: "The night you were on board, after I turned in, I read the 23rd Psalm. It was my mother's Psalm." At the mention of his mother's name the man burst into tears and told the sad story of the power of Satan in his past life. After a long talk he returned to his ship, and the workers had reason to believe that he was led into a new and better life.

THE SAILOR'S CURSE.

Drink is the sailors' curse even more abroad than in England, and the hearts of missionaries are constantly being saddened by the sight of their own countrymen slaves to this passion. One man—a qualified doctor—whom they had befriended told them he had frequently sold his shirt for whisky.

The work among Arabs and Swahili has steadily increased, and as the missionaries become better known to the native population their confidence is gained, and they go to the Rest for any help they require, as well as to hear the Gospel. Many of the Arabs who attend Mr. Knapman's classes are dealers in ivory, &c., and as they sail back to their own country they carry in their pockets some portion of God's Word, and in their hearts some messages of salvation heard at the Rest. Mrs. Knapman finds much to encourage her in her efforts among Arab ladies in their homes, who eagerly welcome her visits.

To further develop the work among the Mohammedans, it is necessary to acquire other premises. Many who realize this need have promised their support to this special object, and it is hoped ere long the new building will be secured. A sum of £500 is needed, £300 of which has been promised on condition the remainder is raised. The secretary of the Rest is Mr. J. Theodore Isaac, 44, Coolhurst Road, Crouch End, London, N.

About a Doll and a Machine.

I THINK the above title ought to attract both boys and girls to read what follows. The girls will naturally want to read about the doll, and the boys about the machine; so now we will begin.

If any of you have ever passed certain shops in London where sewing-machines are sold, you will have noticed some nicely dressed wax figures, like big dolls, which appear to be turning the machine-handles. (Mind you look out for them next time you go into town.) I heard of a little girl who was so impressed with the novelty, that when she got home she placed her dolly's hand on her mother's "Singer," and expected that the machine would begin to move! She did not know that the one in the shop was turned by electricity, so that it was the machine that worked the figure, and not the figure that worked the machine. I suppose you think she "must have been a silly child," and, perhaps, she was; but out of her foolishness, let us try to learn a little wisdom.

When father or mother asks, "Who broke that window?" (or vase, or whatever it may be that has met with an accident), they sometimes receive the reply, "Oh, it got broken a long time ago!" But that does not answer the question, "Who broke it?" Windows and ornaments don't "get broken" by themselves, do they? Its all very well to read in story-books about wicked fairies and naughty sprites amusing themselves by doing mischief; but however convenient they might be, so that we might put all the blame on to them, we do not come across them in real life. When mischief is done, we may be sure that somebody (or the cat!) did it; and I hope you will always be straightforward enough to own up to it if the fault is yours, like George Washington did when he spoiled his father's cherry-tree.

Now the lesson for us to learn to-day is that things do not move of their own accord, which is a shorter way of expressing the thought contained in Isa. x. 15, "Shall the axe boast itself . . . or the saw magnify itself . . . (or) the rod shake itself . . . or the staff lift up itself?"

Neither the doll nor the sewing machine could move until some independent force was brought to bear upon them. They cannot move themselves, nor "get moved," unless some body or some force moves them.

When boys and girls are sent to school they are supposed to work. But now and then we find some who wish ever so hard that their lessons would "get done" without their doing them, or "get learnt" without their learning them. They would like, when they grow up, to find their minds well stored with knowledge, so that they may succeed in their future life; and they would give anything if some good fairy, electric or otherwise, would fill their minds with facts and figures, as their stockings are filled with good things on Christmas eve, without any effort on their part.

But that cannot be, any more than a machine will work without some motive power. It is no use to put your hand upon your work and imagine that it will move of its own accord, and push you along with it. You must apply your energy to it, or it will not be done, or move at all. In the shops, it is the machine that transmits force to the doll; but, in your case, you must put your force into your work.

I know it is not easy to feel always in an industrious mood, and there are times when we wish our lessons or our sewing would somehow "get done" without our troubling about them. But they won't! If they are to be done, we must do them.

The foolish virgins who took no oil in their lamps wanted their wiser sisters to give them theirs; but they could not—they needed it themselves. And if you and I are to get on in life, we must depend upon our own efforts, and not upon other people's, nor expect some lucky chance to make up for our idleness.

When I was a child, we had to repeat a text every morning at family prayers. One day I gave this one: "If any will not work, neither shall he eat"! I heard a titter in one corner of the room, and after prayers my big brother made the unkind remark that such a text "sounded well from a kid who had never done a day's work in his life"; and he went on to suggest that I had better give up my meals until I did some! But there is food for the mind to be thought of, as well as food for the body; and if we want to partake of that in after years, we must work for it to-day, and to-morrow and every day.

Another little boy I knew was, like myself, very fond of play. He was an American, and being on a visit to this country, he did not go to school. When the friends, with whom he and his mother were staying, asked him if he never did any lessons, he replied, "Well, I guess there's so much play to be got through, there's no time for work!" I'm afraid we needn't go so far as America to find boys and girls who think like that. Perhaps they are in your own home. But that is not the way to succeed, is it? The doll could not move the machine because it had no life. No more can you move your lessons along, or put knowledge into your mind, unless you put some life into your efforts, and remember it is you who must move your work; you must not expect your work to move you.

There are other lessons, too, besides those in school-books, that have to be learned. I mean those that belong to the heavenly life that Jesus came to teach. He said one day to those around Him, "Strive to enter in at the strait gate," which means that even in spiritual things we must not be careless or idle. We cannot gain salvation by working for it; if we are not converted, we are like the lifeless doll, "dead in trespasses and sins," until Christ, who has done all that can be done to open for us the gate of heaven, puts a new life into us, so that we may start upon the heavenly road. But even then it will require all our best attention and energy to "walk the narrow way," and to watch against the temptations that Satan will put before us to entice us off into side roads and by-paths of sin and wrong-doing.

I am sure you will agree with me that it requires effort to be always industrious, truthful, unselfish, and honest, when it would often be so much easier to be otherwise. The Christian life leads along an uphill road, and we cannot

> Be carried to the skies
> On flowery beds of ease.

Christ gives us salvation as a free gift which we are to "work out." The same hymn I have quoted above (which begins, "Am I a soldier of the Cross?") goes on:

> Since I must work if I would reign,
> Increase my courage, Lord.
> I'll bear the cross, endure the pain,
> Supported by thy Word.

So let us ask Jesus to give us his power to resist evil, and to be diligent in serving the Lord; until at last we receive the reward that He has promised to them that love Him. Uncle Tom.

Christian Endeavour Topic.

Sunday, March 9, 1902.

The Secret of Endurance (Heb. xi. 24-27; xii. 1-13).

WE must not only begin, but continue, if we would be saved. "He that endureth to the end, the same shall be saved." Many start in the Christian course, who, like the seed sown on the rocky ground, are scorched when the sun arises. It is said of Moses that he endured, and of Daniel that he continued.

Moses endured through many years, and through great trials. Can we not imagine all the pressure that would be brought to bear on him when first he began to ventilate his project of leaving the palace, and identifying himself with the people of God? How earnestly would the noble lady plead with him who had brought him up, and treated as a son! How eagerly would his foster-brother, the heir apparent to the throne, remonstrate with him! How strongly would his tutors and governors appeal to him not to throw away his splendid chances! "Why," said they, "do you not keep your position, and utilize it for the good of your people? It is always easier to succour them from the elevation of a throne, than when you stand on their level." What a storm beat on his head, when finally the die was cast! And yet he remained steadfast to the duty which was impressed on him as the will of God.

And how? What was the secret of his unswerving loyalty to duty? The answer is given in the assurance that he saw Him, who is invisible to all eyes save those of faith, and love, and purity. "The pure in heart shall see God." Above the splendour of Egypt and the age-old throne of Pharaoh, he beheld the great white throne of God, and the enduring glories of the eternal. From these he derived his inspiration, and his marching-orders. To his faith, they were more imperative and real than the riches of Egypt or the wrath of the king; and even in the awful conflict which followed, when he directed the successive blows of the plagues, and the exodus of Israel, his courage never wavered, because of the under current into which he had struck his keel.

In the following passage we are reminded that the same principle must be called in to our own daily help. We, too, have many things that might break down our persistency. With some it is strong opposition and persecution, continued day after day; with others it is the allurement of sense, the captivating charms of human love, the rewards and gains that are offered as the price of turning back from our high quest. Oh, why should we climb the rocky crest, when so many are content with the softer valleys? There is but one help to continuance, we must look oft unto Jesus with the same faith that Moses exercised.

Look oft to his example, that He endured the contradiction of sinners against Himself, and, turning his back on the joy that was set before Him, took the way of the Cross. Look oft to his supplies of grace, that we may be reinforced and recruited with strength to hold out, as oil may be poured secretly on the fire which is being drenched with water. Look oft to the reward, which He offers to every faithful servant, that he shall sit down with Him on his throne, as He overcame and sat down with the Father on his.

The punishment of our sin was borne once for all on the cross: but still we are chastened. Our Father chastens us that we may be delivered from the love and power of evil, and brought into a submissive, filial attitude. This, too, sometimes daunts us. Why should we be chastened all the day long, and have to drink from the brimming cup of tears? There is no help for us, unless we live by faith, looking to the recompense of reward, the "afterward."

Look up and look on! Young brother or sister, the God whom you trust will in some manner deliver you. Only do not allow any vail to come between your eyes and that face which looks down on you with a perfect and unchanging affection. F. B. M.

C.E. NOTES.

Both senior and junior societies at Woodberry Down Chapel, N., are making progress. The members take a practical interest in home and foreign missionary work, as is shown by the maintenance of Sunday evening services for poor children, and the making of garments which are sent to missionaries for distribution.

* * *

A remarkably interesting outcome of an Endeavour picnic in New South Wales is recorded. One of the visitors noticing camps of blacks scattered around the the pleasure resort of La Perouse, decided to attempt the preaching of the Gospel. A society was organized among the blacks, and the Endeavourers built a small church. One of the members of the committee offered herself as a resident missionary. There are now two missionaries and ten helpers who are taking the Gospel to the numerous camps.

Subject: The Ethiopian Converted (Acts viii. 25-40).

Golden Text: Rom. x. 10.

THE Lord had a purpose of grace toward distant Ethiopia, even that the Lamp of his Truth should shine forth in that dark land; so He beckoned Philip from Samaria to Gaza, that he may lend his torch for the kindling (2 Cor. iv. 6; Matt. v. 14, 16).

Philip the evangelist, in the full swing of an important and successful work, which had grown up around him in Samaria, was called to undertake an apparently aimless journey into an unfrequented place, alone. The command—brief, sudden, and unexplained—was met by "the obedience of faith"; and it was not until he reached the appointed stopping-place, and a cavalcade was in view, that Philip received from the Holy Ghost his next definite order (Psa. xxxvii. 23).

The Ethiopian chamberlain, a proselyte of the Jewish faith, was returning from Jerusalem (Deut. xvi. 16) to the district now called Nubia and Abyssinia, with all the pomp and retinue suited to his exalted position in the court of Candace. ("In all ages eunuchs have had great influence in Oriental courts; hence the word came to mean probably an office-bearer, as in 2 Kings ix. 32, marg., 'chamberlains.'") Jerusalem, whence he came, was filled with the new doctrines preached by the Apostles. The name of Jesus of Nazareth had been magnified; signs and wonders had been wrought in his Name; Stephen had been martyred; and persecution had scattered the followers of Him whom they believed to be the Messiah. Is it any wonder that he should have purchased a roll of the prophet Isaiah that he might inquire for himself?

The Seeker Sought.

The exalted statesman in the chariot and costly attire was earnestly seeking Christ. The wayfaring man whom God had guided to the side of the chariot was seeking to win souls for Christ. The knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ was the aim of both, God's love, like the chariot in which they sat together, learner and teacher, carrying them along the lines of his "eternal purpose" (Eph. iii. 11; Song of Solomon iii. 10), "paved with love."

Their theme (1 Peter i. 10, 11), "The angels' wonder" (12). Philip could tell how these same Scriptures had but lately been fulfilled in the life and death of Jesus (John xii. 20, 21), and the Ethiopian believed his report, promptly professed Christ before his retinue, and returned to the Queen's Court flying the colours of the Cross of Jesus (1 Cor. ii. 2). New life, new joy, blessed hope! a torch-bearer for the Lord (Psa. lx. 4). In Christ he held the key to all Scripture (John v. 39).

Note in the Ethiopian (1) An earnest desire for a fuller knowledge of God and his Word. (2) A spirit athirst for "the living God" (Psa. xlii. 1, 2, with John iv. 23; vii. 37). (3) Willingness to learn (v. 31; Heb. xiii. 2). (4) No journey too long, or too costly; no court duties too binding; no equipage too grand, to keep him back from seeking eternal life (John v. 38, 39).

Note in Philip (1) A will in line with the will of God. (2) Selflessness in the Lord's service. (3) Unquestioning obedience to his Captain's orders (2 Sam. xv. 15). Like Abraham (Heb. xi. 8).

Questions.

1. If either man had neglected the leadings of the Spirit, what results?

The blessing and reward both missed. Other hands could do the work (Eph. ii. 10).

If the hands that He touched
Did but do his bidding,
How little it matters what else goes by.

1. (v. 34) Why were not these difficult questions asked of the Apostles in Jerusalem?

We do not know. But we do know, certainly, that wherever there is a sincere seeker, "God is able" to find a teacher, even though He has need to requisition supernatural help for human needs. An angel called Philip (v. 26).

Lessons.

1. To seek Christ with the devout zeal of the Ethiopian, and follow Him with the ready obedience of Philip (Titus iii. 1), "adjusted" (2 Tim iii. 17).

2. To do all we can to kindle the torches God has placed in our way (Matt. v. 14).

3. To be willing to carry the torch He has given us wherever Jesus wants it—at home or among heathen, in Sunday-school or among the worldly and careless (2 Cor. iv. 6, 7).

4. How do we carry our torch? "So shine" (Matt. v. 16).

Jesus bids us shine . . .
You in your small corner, I in mine.
